It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

The Tariff Bill.

tingent expenses. This, truly, is an enormous profit! Out of thirteen millions and upwards, they have left to themselves about half a million; and out of that, have to keep up all the machinery, and pay all other contingent expenses. If these facts be true, and I have never met with the man that dared question them, I think it is time for gentlemen to cease their slang about extravagant profits. I think the great profit consists in making our country independent of foreign Powers, and in giving employment to so many industrious citizens, and furnishing such a steady market for the produce of our farmers. I might as well, while on this subject, make a remark in reply to the member from my State, [Mr. POLK,] who made such a flourish the other day about profits. He seems to have gotten hold of a few isolated scraps of testimony which, to me, and nineteen-twentieths of my fellow-members upon this floor, have been locked in profound secrecy. He, it seems, has been permitted to peep in, and has made a selection of such scraps as he fancies will suit his own views. Yes, sir, out of a mass of testimony which we are told the office of the public printer, ample as it is, is not capable of printing for us, unless every thing else be laid aside, the member from my State has the hardened effrontery to stand up here, and read to us a few miserable, meagre, scraps of his own culling, from his huge bundle, while the balance is withheld; and in this vainglorious flourish he fancied he had made us "flutter"—at least he said so. Now I confess I was "fluttered" into a laugh, to see a man so despicably weak, as to believe that the scraps of testimony which he had pillaged, would have the least weight with any member on this floor. The member discoursed about "profits," as if he knew either head or tail of the subject.

Sir, said Mr. ARNOLD, I have just two ideas on this subject of profit, which I wish to suggest to the committee. The member talks about forty per cent., and thirty-three per cent. &c., and argues that the business ought to be put down and destroyed, because it yields this enormous profit, as he calls it. Now, I am told by gentlemen who know all about this business of profit, that the member is totally mistaken in his facts; but, for the sake of the argument, I am willing to admit his facts. In what attitude, then, will the member be placed? Why, sir, in what I should consider a very unenviable attitude. He will be exhibited as striving to put down an employment which gives to those who pursue it a profit of forty per cent.; and the great profit is the reason which he assigns for wishing to destroy it. This system of political ethics is wholly inexplicable to me. The very reason given by the member for desiring its destruction, is the very reason that makes me desirous of building it up, and placing it upon a permanent basis. Is this profitable employment confined to any section of the country, or to any class of citizens? I take it upon myself to say here, in my place, that it is not; but that it is open to every section and to every class. Every man in the United States is perfectly at liberty to pursue this business, and every man will receive exactly the very same protection by the laws of the United States. How, then, sir, is this law unequal and oppressive?

But one other view of this subject proves conclusively to my mind that it is not so profitable as the member pretends to think. It is this: If it were so profitable, yielding to those engaged in it 40 per cent. we should not find capital so slow to enter it; but, sir, we should see a general rush into the business. I am told by several gentlemen, that plenty of money can be hired at five per cent. Capital is like water; it will level itself. And it is idle to tell me, that, in a country where you can obtain capital at five per cent., any branch of business can go on long making 40 per cent. The capital invested in the less profitable employment will as inevitably seek the more profitable, as that water will run down an inclined plane. Sir, it must, in the nature of things, be so. Any other course would be in direct conflict with all laws, moral and physical. I repeat, the idea that a business is so very profitable, is palpably contradicted by the fact, that idle capital, or capital vested at a very small profit, lies thick around, and refuses to enter into this business.

The next branch of domestic industry to which I will call the attention of the committee, is the manufacture of hats. And this, sir, brings to mind a part of the speech which the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] made the other evening. Whenever the subject of hats or wool is mentioned for some time to come, I shall think of that speech. The gentleman was quite discursive, and full of variety. The manner in which he connected the hating business or wool-dealing, with certain gentlemen on this floor, was not the least unaccountable part of this most unaccountable speech.

The gentleman commenced this part of his argument by telling us that there were certain anonymous letter writers from this place to various points of the compass; that these letter writers, generally, were not to be relied on; but, nevertheless, they did sometimes, by accident or design, hit upon the truth. He said, one of these letter writers had stated it as a fact, that Governor Marcy had given orders to the friends of the Vice President elect, more commonly known on this floor by the title of "The Regency men," that they must go against the present bill. The gentleman said he did not believe one word of this, but in the very next breath he alluded to the fact that Governor Marcy was a family connexion of a gentleman in Albany who was an extensive dealer in wool: [I understand Governor Marcy's father-in-law is a hatter by trade, and, I suppose, this is the way in which he becomes a wool dealer.] I am not acquainted with the gentleman from Georgia further than to know him when I see him. In passing we sometimes speak, and sometimes do not. But my friends had taught me to believe that he was a gentleman, a man of handsome acquirements, and possessed great frankness, a high sense of honor, and an ample stock of good feeling. Sir, he may be a gentleman. I do not know myself very well what are the component parts of a gentleman; but, to say the least of it, I do not think, on the occasion referred to, that he displayed an overstock of candor. Let us analyze him a little on this subject, and see how he will look when taken to pieces. He told us that these letter writers, with a very few exceptions, were not to be relied on; but he made a quotation from one of those letter writers. Now I ask, sir, if a candid man would have made a quotation from that which he believed himself to be false? I think every candid man must answer in the negative. But this honorable gentleman did do in the face of this House; he quoted from one of these letter writers, and told us that he believed the quotation was a falsehood. But he immediately goes on to state another fact in connexion, which shows that he himself either believed the letter writer, or wished to make others believe him. This, then, is a specimen of the gentleman's candor, and I must do him the justice to say that the supply of candor in his speech is about as ample as he imagines truth to be among the letter writers.

Now, sir, let us see how his honor will compare with his candor.

The gentleman from Georgia seems to think he has a claim upon the regency men, as they are called here, and demands their votes in favor of the present bill, upon the score of gratitude; but for fear, I suppose, that his claim of gratitude will not be sufficient, he holds out a menace, of which I will say more anon. What estimate the gentleman from Georgia puts upon the character of the members who were specially alluded to by him, I will not pretend to determine; I will leave that to be setted by him and them. But I will say that, before I could venture to make such an appeal, an appeal so direct, so personal, so gross, that every honorable man who heard it must have been shocked and disgusted; I say, sir, before I could venture to make such an appeal to any member upon this floor, I must consider him a spaniel with a collar around his neck. Sir, what did the gentleman say? I will not pretend to repeat his words, but his allusions were so direct and palpable that there was not a member upon this floor that did not understand them. He appealed to gentlemen upon this floor expressly as partisans; he reminded them of services which had been rendered to their friends; he called to their recollection many votes, where, as a partisan, he had stood shoulder to shoulder with them; he even went so far as to enumerate the miserable and contemptible Wiscasset case, and declared that, as a partisan, even on that occasion he had voted with them. Now, sir, we are to understand the honorable gentleman—he himself so intends we shall understand him—that his vote was given, on all the occasions referred to, as a mere partisan, without regard to principle. He now asks his reward; he now calls upon the regency men here to vote for this bill as partisans, and thus, by party votes, without regard to principle, to sacrifice the dearest and most vital interests of their constituents; he tells them that they can pass this bill if they will, and he holds them responsible for its failure; he broadly intimates to them that if they expect their friend [Mr. Van Buren] to get any votes in the South for the Presidency, they must join with the South in destroying the system of domestic industry. Sir, if these things had been reported to me, I should have been incredulous to them; but I saw with my own eyes the orator who spoke, and heard with my own ears the words spoken. But enough of this unpleasant subject for the present; I will commence the hat-making business again.

"The home consumption of hats made in the United States is, per annum, equal to $10,000,000
Exported, 500,000

$10,500,000

Say ten million five hundred thousand dollars, as the annual value of the manufacture of hats.

"And, on the information of practical men, extensively engaged in this business, they have reached the conclusion that eighteen thousand persons are directly employed in this business, viz.

15,000 men and boys,

"Who receive, in money paid for their labor, the sum of four million two hundred thousand dollars a year; $4,200,000.

"The materials used in the manufacture of hats consist of wool of various qualities, and of furs, which are of domestic and foreign production; also gums shellac and seedlac, glue, sulphuric and nitric acids, coppers, verdigris, and dye-woods; with trimmings of leather, cloth, and silk, of foreign or domestic manufacture.

"It is now about thirty years since the first duty was laid on imported hats; and, since that time, (that the domestic manufacture might be encouraged, and thereby established) the original duty has been considerably increased, by which American hatters were first enabled to make a stand against foreign manufacturers, and finally to drive them out of the market, by furnishing better and cheaper hats than the people of the United States had been supplied with, before an adequate protection was afforded in the duty levied on hats; the exports of which now make a handsome item in the treasury statements. A foreign hat is rarely seen in our country, except in the use of persons just arrived from foreign places, because of the imposing fact, that American hats, regard being had to their quality, are manufactured at a less price than must be paid for them elsewhere. Such are the results of protection extended to the hatters of the United States, that it directly employs eighteen thousand persons, who earn in wages four million two hundred thousand dollars, or, at an average of nearly two hundred and forty dollars for every person, per annum, and subsists, in the whole, from fifty to sixty thousand individuals; and all this, while the consumer receives a better article at a reduced price.

"But, to guard against foreign speculators, and excessive supplies of foreign hats, your committee consider it essential to the interests of American consumers as well as manufacturers of hats, that the present duty should be fully maintained. Though not very high in its amount, it is effective in its operation, and the consequences have been as just stated; the principle of which your committee believe is equally applicable to other important branches of domestic industry. But do away that protection, and the irregularity of the home market would throw thousands of hatters out of employment, who, with their families, are now comfortably subsisted by the labor of their hands.

"The committee would, in conclusion, remark, that the duty on foreign wool (which is extensively used by them, certain kinds being much better fitted for the manufacture of hats than our own) is equal to sixty-five per cent. on its cost, while the duty on hats is only thirty per cent., and the excess duty on wool, so far as it goes, has an injurious effect; they, therefore, would suggest such increase of duty on hats, and especially hat bodies or hat felts, made in whole or in part of wool, as may meet the duty imposed on the material used, which they believe would be advantageous to the American people in general.

"All which is respectfully submitted.

"CLARKSON CROLIUS, Chairman.

"The manufacture of caps is also a very extensive and important interest in the United States. There is one factory at Albany, which, in dressing and preparing furs and skins, and in the making of caps, employs about six hundred persons, on an average, throughout the year, and pays out two thousand dollars in weekly wages, or one hundred thousand dollars per annum, for labor only. There are two or three other factories of such articles at Albany, and several in other places. The whole value of the manufacture of hats and caps in the United States (for men's wear) may be put down as equal to about $15,000,000, fifteen millions of dollars, a year. [Permanent committee.]"

The next subject, sir, to which I will invite the committee is that of salt. I have heard some demagogues make a great outcry about the oppressive duty on salt. I have had occasion before now to examine this question of duty on this article of universal consumption, and have come to the conclusion that the amount of duty has very little to do with the price to the consumer. If it makes any difference, it is in favor of the consumer.

In confirmation of what I here state, I submit the following well authenticated facts, which have not, and I presume cannot, be controverted or denied. By these statements, it is shown most clearly, that if the duty on salt has any effect, it is to reduce the price to the consumer. Gentlemen ask, how is this possible? I say, the fact is so; and, with me, an ounce of fact is worth a pound of theory. But I think the reason why the fact is so, is very palpable. When you take the duty entirely off, or so reduce it as to let in the foreign article, the foreign importers make an effort, and throw into our market vast quantities of salt, even sometimes at a great sacrifice, for the purpose of breaking our salt factories down. When the duty is light, this they are certain to do; but as soon as they get clear of the rivalry of our works, they then immediately raise the price to the consumer; and thus in a short time repair their losses, in breaking our establishments down. We, in all such instances, in the end, pay the price of destroying our own citizens. But if, by a heavy duty on foreign salt, we even raise the price for a time, the profit of the business induces men of capital to embark in it. The more profitable, the more will go into the business; and thus, by an active home competition, the article is furnished to the consumer at as low a price as it possibly can be manufactured for; and, in the long run, we find we can always get it cheaper than we can from the foreign importer after our salt works are broken down. Mr. Jefferson said that we ought to encourage our own citizens against foreigners, without regard to price. I think every true American would be willing to make a small sacrifice for the purpose of building up a great and permanent system, which would make his country independent at all times, and under all circumstances, of foreign Powers; and particularly when he sees and knows that that system, if not at once, will, in a short time, give him a better and a cheaper article than he gets from the foreigner.

From 1807 until 1813, there was no duty on salt at all. During this period, the price varied from fifty to fifty-five cents. In 1813, a duty of twenty cents was levied. This duty remained until 1830, at which time, such was the domestic competition, it sold from forty-five to forty-seven cents, considerably lower than when there was no duty at all. In 1831, the duty was reduced to fifteen cents, and the price of the article was immediately raised to the consumer to fifty cents; making to the consumer a clear loss of five cents per bushel, and to the British importer a clear gain of ten. Facts are stubborn things; and these are facts that no man can or dare dispute.

During the late war, salt sold in Baltimore as high as six dollars per bushel. Our suffering during the late war for this most essential article taught us the folly of depending upon foreigners for this essential necessary of life; and all hands said then, we have an abundance of materials within ourselves, and we will manufacture for ourselves; for, said they, we never have an assurance how long peace will last, and whenever war comes, why then this foreign supply of salt, as well as of every thing else, is completely cut off, and we are left perfectly destitute. But it seems, Mr. Chairman, that we have very nearly forgotten the salutary lessons of the late war, and, like the sow, we are ready to return to the wallow.

I beg leave to read to the committee some most interesting details on the manufacture of salt.

The importations of 1831 are estimated at about five and a half millions of bushels. By comparing the present price of salt with a duty of ten cents per bushel, it will clearly be seen that the consumer was supplied with this important and necessary article of consumption, taking the years 1828 to 1830, at fifty cents, when the duty was twenty cents per bushel. By the prices current of the present year, at a duty of ten cents, the consumer will pay an advance of twenty per cent. This establishes one plain fact, that, instead of the reduction of the duty on salt supplying the citizens of the United States at a lower rate, it has had the effect, from the vacillating policy of the Government, to discourage the necessary exertions of those who are concerned in this important branch of American industry, which, of course, has produced the difference in price. Your committee think they hazard nothing in saying, that if the duty on salt were entirely taken off, the price would increase, in the ratio of the present year, to at least seventy-four cents per bushel, as in former years, when no duty existed.

As a source of revenue, and as an encouragement to the domestic manufacture, the first Congress which assembled under our present constitution were induced, on the 20th of July, 1789, to pass an act imposing a duty of six cents per bushel on salt imported into these United States. At the next session, 1790, it was increased to twelve cents per bushel.

These enactments operated as a bounty for individual enterprise, not, however, in the estimation of Congress, equal to the hazard of investment. In 1797, the duty on foreign salt was augmented to twenty cents per bushel. This proved insufficient to call forth the capital and enterprise of our citizens: necessity seemed to require that Congress should act on every article that appeared to languish under what was then called a protecting duty. Despairing of its ultimate success, on the 3d March, 1807, salt was declared free of duty from and after the 1st of January, 1808. This continued until the 1st of January, 1814. During these years, salt ranged from fifty to one hundred cents per bushel, higher than at any other period from or since the formation of the Government, (the period of the war excepted.) It may be worthy of remark, that the same act which renewed the duty for the encouragement of our own manufactories of salt gave the bounty or drawback on the fisheries. The war of a second independence brought forth the energies of the country, and, from the close of that struggle down to the repeal of the last act laying a duty on salt, it ranged lower than at any other period since the adoption of the constitution.

The Permanent Committee believe that some additional statements concerning the manufacture of salt may be useful.

A petition to Congress, on behalf of the manufacturers of salt, in the county of Kanawha, Virginia, signed Lewis Summers, Joel Shrewsbury, sen., Lewis Ruffner, James Bream, Joseph Lovell, A. Donnally, and Isaac Noyes, dated 9th of January, 1828, and published by order of the Senate, January 21, 1828, stated, among others, the following facts, which are briefly condensed for common reference.

In the early settlements of the Western country, salt was as high as five dollars per bushel, and for several years it fluctuated from two to three dollars; but the works at Kanawha being commenced, it fell to one dollar. And even during the last war with Great Britain, such was the domestic competition, that it averaged less than eighty-seven and a half cents, though selling at five or six dollars on the seaboard. In some instances it rose to one dollar, (at the works,) because of the great demand for the Northwestern army, and the operations of speculators; but increased production enabled the manufacturers to extend their supplies to new customers, and considerably checked a general increase in price. At that time twelve thousand bushels were made weekly at Kanawha.

Since this period the salt works in the Western country have been much increased; and so great was the competition, and large the supply, that salt was sold as low as fifteen or twenty cents per bushel, in casks ready for shipping, in 1825; and in 1826, even at twelve and a half cents. This necessarily caused a stoppage of many of the works. There were sixty-one wells of a capacity to supply one hundred furnaces, but only fifty-six were in operation. The average price of 1827 is stated to have been twenty-four and a quarter cents; and the actual cost of manufacturing, including barrelling, &c. nineteen and a half cents. The salt made was 787,000 bushels, employing four hundred and seventy-one regular laborers, using 1,695,000 bushels of coal in the evaporation of 64,000,000 gallons of water. The capital employed was estimated at 548,000 dollars, and the agricultural products annually consumed by the working people valued at 47,600 dollars, using 24½ tons of wrought iron and 100½ tons of cast iron, paying for mechanics' bills 7,950 dollars a year. We recite these particulars to show how one branch of industry interlocks itself with others. And further should be added the labor and cost of transportation, in making barrels,* and building wagons, boats, &c. employing many and various other persons. In this petition, the whole products of the salt works of the United States, for 1827, were estimated at 4,113,600 bushels, one-half of which were in the Western country. By the returns of the marshals in 1810, the quantity of home made salt reported was 1,238,365 bushels, worth 1,149,725 dollars, or almost one dollar a bushel in that year, when there was no duty on salt; and it will appear that the duty has not had any apparent effect on prices, nor do we believe that it has had any real one; for a brisk domestic competition acts against the foreign supply, and reduces cost to consumers; and so it has been in respect to every class of protected articles.

Of the 4,564,720 bushels imported in 1826, no less than 3,533,796 bushels were from Great Britain and her dependencies, 2,354,549 from England direct.

The petition above referred to contains some powerful reasoning against the then apprehended reduction of the duty on salt; but the Permanent Committee believe that their present business is confined to the facts as stated, and do not wish to pass from them into argument just now.

On the 22d of October, 1830, the salt manufacturers of Kanawha again petitioned Congress for a restoration of the duty on salt.† They estimated the capital vested in this manufacture at 6,964,988 dollars, and showed the capacity of the United States to increase domestic supplies; they computed that 3,653 persons were directly employed in the business;‡ who, among a multitude of supplies from the farmer, required about 600 tons of iron annually. They state a fact of ordinary occurrence, though seldom sufficiently noticed by political economists and statesmen, that, on a failure of supplies from Kanawha, (which had kept down the prices at from forty-five to fifty cents,) foreign salt, at Cincinnati and Louisville, immediately advanced to seventy-five cents. But the extraordinary exertions of the Virginia manufacturers, stimulated by the high price, soon brought it down again. They say that the protection given to domestic salt has not diminished the foreign trade in the article, as the tables show. Its chief effect has been to reduce the price of salt, the diminished price being the loss or profit to foreign manufacturers. A large part of the salt brought to the United States is imported in lieu of ballast. The price of iron, salt, or molasses, for example, has never risen, unless for a moment, because of higher duties imposed; nor the price of molasses, salt, or coffee, permanently declined, because that the duties have been lessened. Practical results are decidedly against the theory that duties must needs be "taxes." It is the force of the domestic competition which settles that question, as is fully shown in the report of the committee on the manufactures of iron; and other facts known to every man of business who has examined the subject.

A memorial to Congress, from sundry inhabitants of Massachusetts, published by order of the House of Representatives, January 23, 1827, presents the following facts:

That, during the revolutionary war, salt was sold for three or four silver dollars per bushel; that, after the war, the manufacture increased until the duty was taken off, but the State of Massachusetts, (recollecting "revolutionary sufferings,") to aid the manufacturers, exempted the salt factories from taxation. In 1813, the duty of twenty cents per bushel being laid, the manufacture revived, and became extensive; great improvements being made in it, to save labor as well as advance the quality of the article. The water is pumped into vats from the ocean; and the vats are covered, to avoid the effect of rains, or of dews at night. In Barnstable county, only, there were then 15,000,000 feet of such vats, worth 1,300,000 dollars, and having more than 1,000 owners. The price of salt, which had been as high as sixty cents, having fallen to thirty-three cents at the works, the competition between the domestic and the foreign supply, in the language of the memorialists, became "severe," and they asked Congress "what good reason there could be for destroying their only manufacture."

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

In the year ending November, 1828, 1,160,000 bushels of salt were made at Salina, Syracuse, Geddes, and Liverpool, in the State of New York. This paid a revenue to the State of twelve and a half cents per bushel, and left a clear profit for the year of $138,620.

From March, 1827, to June, 1829, the monthly product of salt at Kanawha was 75,000 bushels, inspected.

In 1829, the Kiskiminetus salt works, in Pennsylvania, employed two hundred road wagons.

At the beginning of the year 1831, there were 17,545,760 square feet of salt works in Massachusetts.

The following brief notices of the salines on the Kanawha, as generally applicable to those west of the mountains, are interesting:

At the point where the salt factories are established, the Kanawha river is about one hundred and fifty yards wide. The "salt region" extends fifteen miles along the river, and the quantity of salt manufactured may be extended to an indefinite amount.

The salt water is obtained by boring through a great rock, to the depth of from 300 to 500 feet. Copper or tin tubes are introduced to keep out the fresh water which lies above the salt; and the latter rises as high as the surface of the adjoining river, though all communication with it is cut off. The salt water is then raised to the top of the bank of the river, about forty feet, by forcing pumps, and conveyed to the furnaces as required. Bituminous coal abounds on the spot, and is used for the purpose of evaporating the water. Some of the salt water thus obtained is so strong that it will hold very little more salt in solution.

These works, at present, employ about eight hundred men, as salt-makers, coopers, boat builders, &c. The average price of salt has hardly exceeded 30 or 35 cents per bushel, at them. By means of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and other channels of cheap transportation, supplies of salt may be obtained from the West in future emergencies, such as happened in the last war.

The Kanawha salt is purer than the Liverpool.

The fishing business in the waters of the Chesapeake failed last year, and there was some excitement, because of the stock of salt on hand, and its anticipated fall in price, on account of the reduced duty to take place on the 1st January last; but the salt in the hands of the fishermen rather made a profit than a loss, when the duty retired five cents a bushel! And now, (Dec. 9,) we see, that though the duty will be only ten cents on the 1st of next month, the price of Turk's Island salt is six cents higher than it was in March, 1830, when the duty was 20 cents, and three cents higher than when the duty was 15 cents, which duty will be only 10 cents three weeks hence.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

There has been a small decline in the price of Liverpool salt, in sacks of four bushels, since March, 1830, but all other salts show no other change since that time, except against consumers.*

SUGAR.

The next subject to which I will call the attention of the committee, is the manufacture of sugar. Sir, it is proposed by this bill to reduce the duty on sugar one-half cent per pound. This looks like a small sum when we advert only to the duty on one pound; but when we come to apply it to millions, it becomes a question of vast importance; and, as my honorable friend from Louisiana [Mr. WAITE] said the other day, there is no telling what may be its effect; they may be able to go on; they may be overwhelmed with ruin by it. The manufacture of sugar, I have been often told by gentlemen familiar with that subject, yields a very precarious and uncertain profit. Its success depends upon many circumstances, about which it is impossible beforehand to make any certain calculation. Some years the profits will be pretty handsome; some years the losses will be very severe. But, sir, I wish to state to the committee the amount of capital which is invested in this business, and to show its intimate connexion with other branches of agriculture, and with the agriculture of the Western States particularly.

It is stated, upon the best authority, that in Louisiana alone there are more than five hundred sugar plantations. These plantations employ a capital of at least fifty millions of dollars. Now let us see how this capital operates on the agriculture of the Western States.

We will take one of those plantations, capable, in a good season, of producing 400,000 pounds of sugar; we will first examine the amount of capital invested, and the manner of its investment.

The first item I find is land, 1,500 acres, $75,000
The next is ninety hands, at 600 dollars each, 54,000

* When it was proposed to repeal the duty, Mr. VINTOX, of Ohio, stated, in the House of Representatives of the United States, that a reduced duty would not affect the cost to consumers, though destroying a large amount of domestic capital and employment.

Mr. DONNISON, of Virginia, said that he had seen $12 given in his country for a bushel of alum salt, and recollected when it was reduced to $5, because of the improvement of the mountain roads; but that the price remained at three dollars until the Kanawha works displaced the foreign article. He had seen the time when twenty-four bushels of wheat would not pay for one of alum salt; and, at the same place, he had seen salt so reduced in price, that a barrel of it would not pay for a barrel of flour. He supposed that a bushel of foreign salt had not been consumed in more than half of his (congressional) district for the fifteen preceding years; and thought, if such salt was wholly excluded, the whole quantity required would be furnished without inconvenience.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, referred to many proceedings of the Revolutionary Congress, to encourage the manufacture of salt, and, at the date of these resolutions, he said that the business had been commenced in his neighborhood, by evaporating sea water. That the capital now vested in the manufacture in Massachusetts amounted to 1,734,576 dollars, making, annually, 503,686 bushels of salt, equal to the best alum, or Turk's Island. That the repeal of the duty in 1807, though almost ruinous to manufacturers, rendered only a small and temporary benefit to consumers. That there were more than eight hundred small factories in his district, whose competition had reduced the price to thirty cents for fifty-six pounds of salt, (the duty being then twenty cents on that quantity,) and he estimated the whole capital employed in the domestic manufacture at eight millions of dollars.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the capital upon one sugar plantation, the largest portion of which is in perishable property, and is constantly wearing out and giving way, and must of necessity be supplied from the Western and Southern States.

The annual disbursements of this plantation are estimated at $10,700; and, sir, I derive these facts from well authenticated documents, which have not been, and, I presume, cannot be, disputed. How, then, is this $10,700 yearly expended? I will show you, sir.

The first item is $3,000, for provisions, such as

	$10,700

This, sir, is the annual expense of one of these plantations, distributed among the farmers, the mechanics, the horse and slave-driver; and even the medical gentleman comes in for his share, and a snug little sum of five hundred dollars goes to the support of Government, by way of taxes. The expense of one plantation, to be sure, does not make a very imposing figure; but let us see what are the annual expenses of five hundred plantations. Why, sir, it is just the little sum of five million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, principally distributed among the farmers and mechanics of the country. Sir, if I were legislating here upon local principles, looking to the immediate interest of my constituents alone, without regard to the general prosperity of my whole country, to destroy this interest would be the last thing I should think of doing, to promote theirs. What view any gentleman upon this floor from Tennessee; what view any gentleman here from the waters of the great Mississippi, can take of this question, which will cause him to vote for destroying the sugar plantations, is passing strange to me. We have great difficulty in the West now in finding a market for our surplus produce; and, in my opinion, if, by our legislation here, we were to destroy the manufacture of sugar in Louisiana, the policy would be perfectly suicidal. Destroy this system, and the rich alluvial bottoms of the Mississippi will be at once converted into fields of cotton, corn, and rice, and the whole agricultural community up the Mississippi, and its tributaries, will feel the shock most ruinously. The supply of agricultural products is already much greater than the demand. This preposterous act of ours—and gentlemen must excuse me, for I cannot call it by any name less offensive—instead of increasing the demand, will greatly augment the supply. I repeat, sir, that to me it is matter of profound astonishment, that any man, representing upon this floor the interest of any portion of Tennessee, should, by his vote, paralyze the operations of the sugar plantations.

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

[JAN. 24, 1833.]

Such a man must be manacled in party politics, and compelled to subserve the views of men rather than the good of his constituents. From such politicians may God preserve our country!

I have said, Mr. Chairman, what would be my course if I were legislating with a view to the interest of my constituents alone. But, sir, I am proud to announce to the committee that I go against destroying the sugar plantations, upon other and more enlarged considerations than merely because they benefit my constituents. I go against destroying them, because they form a link in that chain of policy which alone can make us independent of foreign Powers. Destroy these plantations, and you at once place us at the mercy, and make us dependent upon foreign Powers for every pound of this most essential and universal article of consumption; and in a short time we shall be compelled to pay at least double what we have to pay now. Sir, I call upon gentlemen to reflect before they destroy a system which has given us a better and a cheaper article than we ever had before. I recollect very distinctly when my constituents had to give for common brown sugar twenty-five cents per pound. They now get a much superior article for half that price. On these subjects of great national policy, the system must be taken altogether. The man who has to legislate on them ought to be able to survey the whole Union, and see how it will operate. It is in vain to legislate to promote the interest of one section of the Union, to the disparagement of all others. This partial and local system of legislation, I am proud to say, my constituents do not desire. They would feel the most profound contempt for any man who pretended to be a politician, and who was thus contracted and limited in his views of policy. They would laugh him to scorn; they would tell him that, in their estimation, he occupied in the political world the same station which the dry-land terrapin occupies in the animal world. Sir, my constituents are for the Union, the whole Union; and when they instruct me to vote to protect the sugar manufactures in Louisiana, it is not because they are immediately and directly interested in those manufactures, but because, as I before said, it is an important link in the great chain of national policy. For the same reason, sir, they have taught me to believe it was right to give protection to the cotton and woollen manufactures of Massachusetts. Massachusetts is one member of our national family. She is the venerable sister who rocked the cradle of our independence. I meet with no man who does not admit that Massachusetts did as much, if not more, than any State in the Union, in achieving that independence of which we all so proudly boast. Sir, in that protracted, but glorious struggle, she not only freely expended her treasure, but she consecrated the cause of liberty, by pouring out the blood of her noblest sons. She has been a great sufferer in building up this very policy which we are called upon to destroy. But gentlemen, in answer to all this, very phlegmatically say, Massachusetts has behaved badly in latter times. I agree, sir, that, at one period "in latter times," she did put on a good many airs; she scolded and flirted, and said many hard words; but she never has gone as far as some of her sisters have gone, before and since, although, in my humble opinion, she has had much greater cause of complaint than any of them have had. Massachusetts was emphatically a commercial State. Her vocation was upon the ocean. She was carrying on "free trade" with all the world, much to her own advantage as she thought, when she was interrupted by the introduction of the "American system" by Virginia. Gentlemen must not make wry faces when they are told that the seeds of this system were sown by Virginia. Sir, the restrictive system, the non-intercourse laws, and the embargo, which fell with such a heavy and disastrous hand upon the commerce of Massachusetts, had their origin in the Virginia doctrines of that day. These measures greatly crippled and weakened the commerce of Massachusetts. Yea, sir, they cost her millions. Before she had time to recover her wonted energies, she was again driven from the ocean by the late war. A succession of adverse events crowded upon her, one close upon the heels of another, until utter ruin seemed to be her certain doom. Her citizens were thrown completely out of employment; they saw every thing decaying and falling into ruin around them. These things produced very great excitement, as a matter of course; and the orators of the day said many foolish things, I have no doubt, and some of the people committed some foolish acts. But, sir, at their maddest period, they never went, by a stone's throw, as far as South Carolina has now gone. During the war we ascertained our weak points. We saw, as I before have stated, that we were dependent upon foreign Powers for the essential articles for carrying on a war. We of the South and West saw and felt the great necessity of building up some system of policy which would make us completely independent of all foreign Powers. The Virginia policy of protecting domestic manufactures by laying high duties on foreign goods imported here, was adopted in 1816, with increased energy. By this time, however, Massachusetts had recommenced her old and favorite pursuit, and was fairly again before the breeze, prosecuting a most vigorous and profitable commerce. But here, again, she was doomed to another sad reverse of fortune. We commenced building up the American system. We told Massachusetts that she must divide her profits with the manufacturer and the farmer. In short sir, by legislative act after legislative act, we drove her almost entirely from the ocean, and compelled her, in self-defence, to take shelter in the workshops. Yea, sir, we coerced her to commence manufacturing; and what her hand findeth to do, she does with all her might. She became reconciled to her fate, and determined to make the most out of manufactures that she could. And now, sir, just as she and others, who have, under the protection held out and extended by our laws, ventured all they have in that system, are beginning to realize some of its benefits, she and they are told by us, you must now turn your attention to something else; you must abandon your millions vested in manufactures; your profits are entirely too great. It is true, we could pursue the same business if we would; the tariff, or protecting laws, give us the same protection south of the Potomac that they give you north of it, but we do not choose to avail ourselves of these advantages, and we have determined you shall not. This is the state of things upon which we are now called to act, and I appeal to gentlemen to pause before they make this sacrifice. I, for one, cannot find it in my soul to do it; I consider it a ruinous step to the whole nation; I consider it most dishonorable and dishonest to withdraw now our plighted protection from those States who, under the presumed good faith of an American Congress, have embarked their all in the system. Sir, I represent liberal and enlightened freemen on this subject, and I will not do an act so totally unworthy of them as this would be; an act which they would disdain to do; an act which I should feel merited their frowns and their scoffs. My constituents, sir, have no feelings of ill-will to gratify towards Massachusetts, or any of the other States, and especially none towards Massachusetts. They feel that their interest can in nowise be promoted by destroying the prosperity of any of the New England States. Sir, since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, I have found none more willing to do justice to my constituents than the Representatives from Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Vermont. My constituents know these things, and appreciate them. Many other most interesting views might be presented to the committee on this subject, but I feel that I have detained them already too long, and

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

will, therefore, pass on by merely glancing at one or two other subjects.

WOOL.

I will now, very briefly, notice the growth and manufacture of wool; and the first thing to which I will call the attention of the committee on this subject, is, the amount of capital vested in this business.

It is useless, sir, for me to make any comment upon this item; I therefore content myself with merely calling the attention of the committee to the amount of capital employed, the number of persons engaged and supported by it, and the amount of agricultural products consumed by it. He that runs may read, and every man can estimate for himself what the effect upon the community, particularly the farming community, will be by destroying this branch of our national industry.

The probable number of sheep in the United States is 20,000,000, and worth, on an average, two dollars per head, - $40,000,000

The sheep farms, generally, do not support three sheep to the acre, summer and winter, though the land be pretty good, and well managed. Of the 20,000,000 sheep, it is supposed that about 5,000,000 are in the State of New York, having had 3,496,539 in 1825, the latest returns at hand; and it is known that many of these sheep are fed upon lands worth from sixteen to thirty dollars per acre; and in Dutchess county, in which are over 500,000 sheep, the lands on which they are fed are worth about twenty-five dollars per acre. It is then probable that the average worth of farms in the United States capable of supporting three sheep to every acre throughout the year, is ten dollars the acre: 20,000,000 of sheep will require 6,666,666 acres, at ten dollars, - 65,000,000

Capital in sheep, and lands to feed them, $105,000,000

The 20,000,000 sheep produced 50,000,000 pounds of wool annually, the average value of which, for three years, 1829, 1830, and 1831, exceeded forty cents per pound, or $20,000,000. (The crop of 1831 was worth more than $25,000,000.) The crop of wool, having reference to the whole quantity made into cloth of various qualities, is worth $40,000,000, which is about the gross annual product of wool and its manufactures in the United States. If the woollen goods imported, valued at $6,000,000, be added, there will be allowed for each person in the United States three and a half dollars worth of woollen goods per annum, including blankets, carpets, &c., as well as clothing.

The fixed and floating capital vested in the woollen manufactures in the United States, such as lands, water-rights, buildings, machinery, and stock on hand, and cash employed, may be estimated at - 40,000,000

Capital directly vested in the growth and manufacture of wool, - $145,000,000

The proportion between the amount of wool used in the factories, and worked up by household industry, is as three to two, and, on the average, it will employ one person to work up 1,000 pounds of wool annually, or 50,000 persons in the whole.

It is reasonable to suppose that each laborer subsists two other persons, say 150,000 in all, deriving a direct support from the woollen manufacture, or otherwise.

Each person will consume at least twenty-five dollars worth of agricultural products annually, or $3,750,000 worth of subsistence.

The average product of farms cultivated for the supply of food does not exceed two dollars and fifty cents per acre yearly, after subsisting the cultivators, and those dependent on them. It will therefore require 1,500,000 acres of land to feed those manufacturers and their dependents, worth, say, fifteen dollars per acre, is - 22,500,000

Capital involved in the growth and manufacture of wool in the United States, - $167,500,000

The annual value created by, or accruing to, agriculture, because of the growth and manufacture of wool, may be thus shown:

Wool, - - - - -	$20,000,000
Provisions to manufacturers, - - - - -	3,750,000
Fuel, timber, and other products of the land, supplied - - - - -	500,000
Charges for transportation, and food of horses and other animals employed, because of the factories, - - - - -	500,000
	$24,750,000

The following should rightfully be added to show the whole operation of the woollen manufactures in the United States:

For every 100,000 pounds of wool manufactured there is a constant employment, equal to the labor of six men, in the erection and repair of buildings, millwrights' and blacksmiths' work, and in the building and repairing of machinery, whether for wool worked up in the factories or in families, say 3,000 men, whose labor subsists at least 9,000 other persons, 12,000 in all, and consume each twenty-five dollars worth of agricultural produce annually, is - 300,000

Making the whole number of persons employed because of the manufacture of wool, 162,000, and requiring of the product of manufacture, for materials and subsistence, the very large amount per annum of $25,050,000. And it should be observed that there is no foreign market to which we can send our $25,000,000 worth of wool, and breadstuffs, and meats. It would all be as if annually lost to landholders and cultivators, were the home market destroyed in abandoning the manufactures of wool; and those who are now consumers of the products of agriculture must, of necessity, become producers, and lessen the prices of grain, &c.

COTTON.

The next subject is cotton.

The principal ground of complaint in the South is the fall in price of their great staple, cotton. A very brief statement of facts will set this upon its proper footing. A general remark, applicable to all branches of business, will apply to the growth of cotton in the United States:

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

that the demand has by no means kept up with the supply. The whole crop of cotton grown in the United States, in 1816, was about 68,000,000 pounds; the price of cotton that year was twenty-nine cents per pound; it fell the following year to twenty-six cents; in 1818 it rose to thirty-three cents; thus giving a most extravagant profit to the cotton grower of the South, and had the effect that great profits always have upon every employment in this country, where every citizen is at liberty to embark in any business that he may believe most profitable. Thus it was with the cotton business: and from 68,000,000 pounds in 1816, it has now increased to more than 300,000,000 pounds; and, as a matter of course, prices began to come down; and down and down they come, until that business is not much more profitable than other branches of agriculture, though I am told it is still something more so; and I have no hesitation in saying it would be much more decreased in price than it is, were it not for the home market which our manufactories create.

It is estimated that these manufactories of cotton consumed upwards of one-fifth of the whole cotton crop in the United States. South Carolina ought to reflect that, since 1816, the cotton-planting business has spread itself into the Southwestern States, and that they grow almost two pounds where the Atlantic States grow one; for instance, in 1831, the Atlantic States produced 148,000,000 pounds, and the Southwestern States produced 227,000,000.

These facts, to my mind, show conclusively the reasons why the price of cotton is down at its present low ebb, and they show equally that if it were not for the manufactories, which consume annually about 77,000,000 pounds of raw cotton, the price would be made lower than it is.

The capital employed in the cotton manufacture in the United States at this time, is estimated at $44,914,984. There are 23,300 men employed in this business, and 39,000 women, and 5,121 children under the age of twelve years. The wages paid to these men, women, and children, per annum, is $12,155,722.

The number of persons subsisted directly by the cotton manufacture is 131,481.

1,641,353 pounds of starch are consumed by them annually; 17,245 barrels of flour for sizing, are consumed by them.

46,519 cords of wood are used by them.

24,420 tons of mine coal, and upwards of 9,000 tons of charcoal, are consumed.

I omit many items, and enumerate these merely to show the intimate connexion between the agriculture and labor of the country and the cotton manufactories. Nothing can be more interesting than this subject, and, if I had time, I would pursue it through all its various ramifications, and show its effects upon the community; but I must pass on.

GLASS.

I will read a short, but very interesting paragraph on the subject of manufacturing glass in the United States.

"On the whole, it seems quite reasonable to believe that the value of the glass manufactured in the United States is

The amount of persons employed is	-	$3,000,000
Do. do. subsisted, -	-	2,140
Do. wages annually paid,	-	10,800
	-	720,000

And this pleasing fact is manifest, that, while the workmen obtain high wages, by which they and their families are plentifully and comfortably subsisted, there has been a general decline in the selling price of glass, as compared with what it was before protection was afforded to this interesting manufacture, of about fifty per centum; and, further, that a large part of the materials used would have had but a small value, if any value at all, except because of these factories in many places.

"In the preceding amounts of persons employed or subsisted, or wages paid, no regard is had to the very numerous individuals employed by, or making profit upon the supply or preparation of materials, in the transportation of them, by land or water, the factories, or in the carriage of the articles made, to the markets for them; the value of all which must be much larger than the sum paid to workmen employed in the manufacture itself, which probably subsists, directly and indirectly, not less than 25,000 persons; affording for the whole an average annual value of $120 each, including, of course, interest on capital earned."

I have taken a very hasty view of some of the most important branches of American industry. The observations which I have made, have not been upon the details of the bill before us. That part of the subject has been most fully and amply investigated by several gentlemen who have preceded me in the discussion. I think it has been conclusively shown that, if this bill pass, the whole system of which I have been speaking, must fall to the ground. If gentlemen are really desirous of understanding the details of this bill, I beg them to commune freely with my friend who sits near to me, [Mr. ARLETON,] who will take a great deal of pleasure in giving them any information on that subject; and I believe all parties admit that no gentleman upon this floor is more competent to the task.

Upon the whole, after diligent inquiry, after a patient examination of the whole system of protecting our own labor from foreign competition, a thing which all other nations do, I have been brought irresistibly to the conclusion that it has benefited the farmers; that it has benefited the mechanics; that it has benefited our commerce, foreign and domestic; that this system, (by a voluntary tax, if, indeed, it be a tax at all, when by it we get cheaper and better articles than we ever did before,) I say, that this system, while it has protected our own citizens, has supplied the current expenses of Government, has paid off an immense national debt, which otherwise must have been paid by grinding and oppressing the people by the most odious of all systems—a direct tax.

To show that it furnishes to the consumer cheaper and better articles of use and consumption among them, I need only enumerate a few leading articles of necessity.

Coarse cottons, when we had to rely on the foreign manufacturer, sold at from twenty to twenty-five cents. By the act of 1816, a duty of eight and three-fourths cents was imposed on the foreign article. This nearly excluded it, and made the business very profitable to our own citizens. The consequence was, as it always will be in this country of free and equal laws, that there was a great rush of capital into this business. The law held out equal advantages to every citizen in the United States, whether he lived in Georgia, Virginia, Pennsylvania; or Massachusetts. And I have been told by an honorable member of this House from North Carolina, that he knew of one establishment in that State, employing about one hundred thousand dollars of capital, that yielded its proprietor a profit of about twenty per cent.; and the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CLAYTON,] I think, told us at the last session, in a speech which he delivered upon this floor, that he owned an establishment which yielded him a profit of fifty per cent. I am very much pleased at these profits of my southern neighbors, and hope more of them will embark in the business. In Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, the competition has been so great, that the profits to the manufacturer have been very much decreased; and the price to the consumer throughout the United States has been reduced by this home competition from twenty to twenty-five, down to

The Tariff Bill.

from six to seven cents per yard; and this is the effect, in my opinion, which adequate protection will have upon every branch of our home manufactures.

Lead formerly sold, in the Atlantic cities, at six and eight cents per pound; but since a duty of three cents per pound has been imposed on the foreign article, we now get it in Missouri at three and a half cents.

Window glass formerly sold from ten to fourteen dollars per ton.

A duty of three and a half dollars per one hundred feet on foreign window glass has brought the price down to the consumer to four and four and a half dollars per ton, instead of ten and fourteen. Every cottager now, if he choose, may enjoy the light of Heaven, without admitting the bleak wind.

Cut nails were formerly worth from ten to twelve cents per pound. By a duty of five cents on foreign nails, we get much better nails now, at six cents per pound.

Copperas before the late war was very fluctuating in price, but most generally sold at three cents per pound. During the war it sold from seventeen to twenty cents. After the war we imposed a duty of two cents per pound on foreign copperas, and it now sells at two and a half cents per pound. And if we are wise, we never again shall be subject to the fluctuations of the foreign article, nor shall we be subject to the enormous price which we were compelled to pay during the late war.

When we imported our alum, we generally had to pay about seven and a half dollars per cwt. During the war the price rose to eighteen cents per pound. The price at present is three and three-fourths cents per pound.

Epsom salts were manufactured to a very limited extent, if at all, in this country, prior to 1824. While we relied upon the foreign manufacture, we had to pay from ten to twelve cents per pound. Under the act of 1824, a duty of four cents per pound was imposed on the foreign article. Under this protection, the manufacture of this medicine, of such universal use among all classes, and a timely dose of which has saved many a heavy doctor's bill, has sprung to very great perfection in our own country. At the time the duty of four cents was imposed by the act of 1824, the price, as I before stated, was from ten to twelve cents per pound. In 1826, it fell to seven and a half cents; and in 1831, a much superior quality could be bought at three and a half cents per pound.

If time would permit, this comparative view might be extended to almost every branch of this system which has brought our country to such an enviable height of prosperity.

But when these stubborn facts stare gentlemen in the face—when they are compelled to admit that the nation at large, and that every particular section of it is enjoying the highest state of prosperity, they then turn upon us, and say there is too much money in the treasury; and that, in order to exhaust and empty the treasury, this system must be pulled down. Sir, if other gentlemen thought on the subject as I do, we could soon employ the treasury surplus when there shall be one, much to the advantage of the people, and to the improvement of the country. I am now and always have been opposed to keeping much money in the treasury; but I would not tear down this system which has made us so prosperous and happy, and throw ourselves at the foot of British power and cupidity. No, sir, I would pursue a very different plan of emptying the treasury. I would build roads and canals. I would clear all our navigable water-courses of obstructions, so that the farmer might get to market with his produce. In short, I would carry on a judicious system of internal improvement. I would build up a system of education that should carry light and knowledge to every cottage in the remotest corners of the republic. Thus, sir, would this system make us independent of all the world; and, at the same time that it put money into circulation in the interior, it would greatly improve the physical and moral condition of the whole country.

But, sir, there is no surplus yet in the treasury; and I think my honorable friend [Mr. INGRAM] from the Committee of Ways and Means has shown, not only that there is not now a surplus, but that there will not be a surplus even as remotely as 1835. Sir, what are the facts on this subject? Why, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, tells us that, on the first of January there was a surplus of one million six hundred thousand dollars. Now, my friend, [Mr. INGRAM], who belongs to the financial committee of this House, and whose peculiar province it is to examine into the state of our treasury accounts, (and, without intending to pay him a compliment, I understand, from all sides, that he is completely master of this subject,) what does he tell us about this surplus of one million six hundred thousand dollars now in the treasury? Why, sir, he says that there are one million six hundred thousand dollars in the treasury; but he tells us that one million four hundred thousand dollars of this surplus is composed, to speak in the financial language of the day, of "unavailable funds." Or, in plain English, sir, this sum of one million four hundred thousand dollars is composed of notes upon broken banks, which nobody will have, and which are likely to be funds in the treasury for some time to come. These are some of the blessed fruits of using the local State banks as places of deposit for the public funds. And from the seed which seems to be sowing, since the edict has gone forth that the United States Bank must go down, we have a goodly prospect of reaping a very bountiful crop of these depreciated, these rotten, these broken bank notes. Banks in every direction, anticipating the destruction of the United States Bank, are springing into existence, like mushrooms, between the setting and the rising of the sun.

In New York, on the 2d and 3d day of the present Legislature, there were petitions for thirty-four new banks in that State.

In Pennsylvania, eleven have been petitioned for from the country, beside those in the cities.

In Maryland, the Governor recommends a State bank founded on State funds.

In Alabama, one has been already incorporated with a capital of two millions.

In my own State, one has been incorporated with a capital of three millions.

The Governor of Kentucky recommended one of enormous capital.

In Ohio, I believe one has been incorporated with a capital of seven millions of dollars.

In Louisiana, a bank has been incorporated, with eight branches, and very large capital; the amount not exactly recollected.

In North Carolina, a bank has been incorporated, with a capital of two millions of dollars, with branches at discretion; and thus, and thus we proceed, cramming every hole and corner of the country with this stagnant paper of local banks, which is not able to travel a Sabbath day's journey without being depreciated fifteen and twenty per cent. We are in a very fair way to have a new and ample addition of shin plasters, as they were called by the old farmers when I was a boy. Yes, sir! Fayetteville, Virginia Saline, Owl Creek.

These notes, once sent out, they must fall somewhere, and nine times out of ten they will fall upon the laboring, the innocent, unsophisticated part of the community.

But, sir, I must return to the question of a surplus in the treasury; I hope the committee will excuse this digression.

The Tariff Bill.

We see, then, that, of the one million six hundred thousand dollars in the treasury, one million four hundred thousand dollars must be deducted for broken bank notes, which will leave then only two hundred thousand dollars for the surplus. Another item, with which the Secretary makes out his surplus, is seven hundred thousand dollars, which is the money deposited under the treaty of Denmark, and which belongs not to the Government, but to our citizens, who are entitled to it as an indemnity for spoiliations which were committed upon them. This money is liable to be called for at any moment. It belongs to individuals, and can form no part of the surplus. This sum must be deducted, and then, instead of a surplus in the treasury on the first of January, we have an actual deficit of five hundred thousand dollars. Add to this the floating debt, or appropriations made heretofore by law, which are just as sacred as the funded debt, and which remain yet unsatisfied; and we have, instead of a surplus, an actual deficit of nearly six millions. The floating debt is five million four hundred and seventy-five thousand two hundred and two dollars and twenty-six cents. And the honorable gentleman proved conclusively, to my mind, that we shall not have a surplus in the treasury up to 1835. Who has controverted his facts or his argument? Did the gentleman from Georgia? Not one word. Did the member from Tennessee? He did not even squint at it. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania? Not at all. Who then has met the argument of my honorable friend? Why, the chairman of the committee has attempted it. And how, sir? Does he deny the facts? No. He insists that this was the way the treasury was managed in the days of Mr. Lowndes. Yes, sir, in those days when we were borrowing money to defray the ordinary expenses of Government, and could not possibly make the two ends meet. The gentleman has forgot that the administration was then striving to hide its poverty, and was keeping up appearances as well as it could, to the end that it might borrow money. This policy does not harmonize well with a surplus in the treasury. The honorable chairman seems to be disposed to conduct the finances of the nation upon the same plan that an individual would do when he would borrow money of one man to pay another. This is wretched policy in private life, and I cannot believe it is much better in public.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is shown most conclusively that the surplus in the treasury does not call upon us, at this time, to apply the pruning knife. So I cannot vote for this bill with a view of getting rid of a surplus in the treasury.

Some gentlemen talk of destroying this system because they say they are in favor of "free trade." Sir, do gentlemen know what they mean by "free trade?" If they mean what I expect they do, I take the liberty of telling gentlemen there is no such thing as "free trade." It never has, I expect it never will exist. All the parade which Mr. Huskisson has made about the free trade system in England amounts to nothing. I should be glad if gentlemen who talk about "free trade" would oblige me so far as to let me know what articles of our produce are admitted into the English ports upon the "free trade" principle. Our great staples are every one (unless cotton be excepted) virtually, if not expressly, prohibited.

But suppose England was in good earnest on the subject, and would take off all her restrictions, if we would take off ours, I ask gentlemen if they would be willing to do it? England has too much capital. Her system has too much age. She has too much experience. Her labor is too cheap, unless we want to reduce our laborers to the low and degraded condition of English laborers. Our laborers are not prepared to work at nine pence a day, as the English do; and I hope the time is far distant when they will be driven to that necessity. English manufacturers are at least two centuries in advance of ours. With all these advantages, it would not only be folly, but it would be perfect madness in us to enter into competition with England, on what gentlemen are pleased to call free trade.*

"As early as 1699, Parliament declared 'that no wool, yarn, or woollen manufactures of their American plantations should be shipped there, or even laden, in order to be transported from thence to any place whatever.' This was the commencement of restrictions on colonial manufactures.

"In 1719, the House of Commons declared 'that the erecting manufactories in the colonies tended to lessen their dependence upon Great Britain.'

"While the colonies were increasing in population, and endeavoring to secure to themselves, in some degree, the benefits of their own industry and economy, complaints were constantly made to Parliament by interested individuals, that the colonists were not only carrying on trade, but were setting up manufactures detrimental to Great Britain. These complaints produced an order of the House of Commons, in 1731, directing the Board of Trade to inquire and report 'with respect to laws made, manufactures set up, or trade carried on, detrimental to the trade, navigation, or manufactures of Great Britain.'

"In a report made in pursuance of this order, the commissioners found that certain trades carried on, and manufactures set up in the colonies, were injurious to the trade, navigation, and manufactures of the parent country.

"Among the manufactures were enumerated those of wool and flax, iron, paper, hats, and leather.

"The commissioners conclude their report by saying, 'from the foregoing statement, it is observable that there are more trades carried on, and manufactures set up, in the provinces on the continent of America, to the northward of Virginia, prejudicial to the trade and manufactures of Great Britain, particularly in New England, than in any other of the British colonies; which is not to be wondered at, for their soil, climate, and produce, being pretty nearly the same with ours, they have no staple commodities of their own growth to exchange for our manufactures, which puts them under great necessity, as well as under greater temptations, for providing for themselves at home; to which may be added, in the charter governments, the little dependence they have upon the mother country; consequently the small restraint they are under in any matters detrimental to their interests. And, therefore, we humbly beg leave to report and submit to the wisdom of this honorable House, the substance of that we formerly proposed in our report on the silk, linen, and woollen manufactures herein before recited, namely, whether it might not be expedient to give those colonies proper encouragement, for turning their industry to such manufactures and produce as might be of service to Great Britain, particularly to the production of naval stores.'

"The company of hatters in London complained that great quantities of hats were made in New England, and exported to Spain, Portugal, and the British West India islands; and, through their influence, an act of Parliament was procured, not only to prevent the exportation of hats from the colonies to foreign countries, and from being carried from one plantation to another, but to restrain, to a certain extent, the manufacture of them in the colonies. In 1732, hats were prohibited from being shipped, or even laden upon a horse, cart, or other carriage, with an intent to be exported to any other plantation, or to any place whatever. At the same time, no hatter in the colonies was allowed to employ more than two apprentices at once, or to make hats, unless he had served as apprentice to the trade seven years; and no black or negro was permitted to work at the business of making hats.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, let me give these "free trade" gentlemen a specimen or two of the duty which is laid on our principal staples:

Cheese, three dollars and fifty cents per cwt.

Cider, one hundred dollars and eighty cents per two hundred and fifty-two gallons.

Wheat, per quarter of eight bushels, varies; when it is worth sixty-one shillings, the duty is six dollars and sixteen cents; when seventy-two shillings, it is twenty-four cents; that is, when it is one dollar and eighty cents a bushel, and under, it pays a duty of seventy-seven cents a bushel; but when it rises to two dollars and sixteen cents a bushel, the duty is only three cents a bushel. This rarely happens.

Barley, oats, rye, wheat meal, flour, oat meal, Indian corn, pease, beans, &c. have duties in the same ratio to their value.

Printed cottons, seven cents the square yard; ours are eight and three-quarters cents the square yard.

Glass—

Crown, per cwt., forty dollars.

German sheet, per cwt., forty-eight dollars.

Hay, five dollars and seventy-six cents for eighteen cwt.

Hides, tanned, forty per cent. ad valorem...

Hoops, from one dollar and eighty cents to three dollars and sixty cents per thousand, according to the length.

Horses, four dollars and eighty cents each.

Lambs, prohibited.

Leather, and manufactures of, thirty per cent.

The duty on beef and pork amounts to a prohibition.

If any gentleman upon this floor will take the trouble to look into this British tariff, [holding up one in his hand,] and after that will insist upon his "free trade" system, I, to say the least, shall consider him incorrigible, and bent upon the destruction of our own farmers, mechanics, and laborers.

I will not vote for this bill now, because the ink with which the bill of the last session was engrossed is hardly dry on the parchment. And we are now called upon to do all that work over again. We spent too much time and too much money at the last session in passing that bill for me now to give my vote to destroy it before I have tried it. Sir, it is a universal principle with me never to condemn any thing untried; particularly any thing that cost as much time, as much labor, and as much money, as that bill did. How much time did we spend at that bill last session? The journals will speak on this subject. I should like to know how gentlemen can justify themselves to their constituents in the course they have pursued upon this subject. I remember well, that, last ses-

"The manufacturers of iron next claimed their share in the benefits to be derived from the colonies. They were willing the poor colonists should reduce the iron ore, with which their lands abounded, into pigs, and even bar iron, and that the same be brought to their doors duty free, provided they could monopolize the manufacture of it beyond this incipient stage. In the year 1750, Parliament permitted pig and bar iron to be imported from the colonies into London duty free, but prohibited the erection or continuance of any mill, or other engine for slitting or rolling iron, or any plating forge, to work with tilt hammer, or any furnace for making steel, in the colonies, under the penalty of two hundred pounds.

"More effectually to carry this act into execution, every such mill, engine, plating forge, and furnace was declared a common nuisance, and the Governors of the colonies, on the information of two witnesses, on oath, were directed to cause the same to be abated within thirty days, or to forfeit the sum of £500."—Pitkin's Political and Civil History of the United States, vol. 1, pp. 101, '2, and '3.

sion, whenever a proposition was made to adjourn, gentlemen cried no! no! We will never adjourn until this difficulty about the tariff, as they call it, was settled. Yes, sir; these very gentlemen kept us here until the 16th of July, for the avowed purpose of accommodating the difficulty between the North and the South. The whole country was ransacked for testimony on the subject. I spent day after day listening to long and luminous speeches on the subject. We finally agreed upon a bill. It contained some features I did not like. I thought it yielded too much to the South. I was apprehensive that the reduction of the revenue would be too great and too sudden. But I was told by the moderate men of both sides of the question that it was best to have it settled, and that it must be done upon principles of compromise; that this bill would settle the question, and that the country would be quieted; the Union would be preserved; and every body would know then what to depend upon. A few of the nullifiers and a few of the ultra tariff men voted against the bill. It was admitted that the bill made great and important concessions to the South. The reduction of the duties was very great, and particularly on articles of Southern consumption. The aggregate reduction was then, when all the facts were fresh before us, estimated at not less than five millions, and some rated it at eight millions. The bill passed by two-thirds of the votes of this House; and, according to the doctrine of the nullifiers themselves, this bill was a constitutional one. It was hailed every where as the harbinger of more steady and quiet times. It seemed to give such universal satisfaction, that I felt proud that I had voted for the measure, although I felt at the time that I had yielded too much to appease the South.

But, sir, to my utter astonishment, before we were warm in our seats here, the Committee of Ways and Means step into the shoes of the Committee on Manufactures, and have presented us with this bill, which levels at one fell blow the whole system of American industry; and gentlemen get up here and tell us that they do not intend to speak, but they intend to vote; that minorities may speak, but majorities must act. They seem determined to force the bill through the House per fas aut nefas. Here is a scrap of Latin for you too, sir; but I believe it does not require to be translated to the House. But if the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] had not been so kind and condescending as to explain to us his Latin and French* the other evening, I should have felt it necessary to buy myself a Dictionary of Quotations. I can get Latin and French enough of my friend Pishey Thompson, on the avenue, for a dollar and a quarter, to do me the whole season. But, if other gentlemen will follow the example of the honorable member from Georgia, I shall be saved that expense.

But to the subject again: I should be glad if gentlemen, who voted for this bill in July last, would condescend to tell me what new lights they have had on the subject since, that they will now vote to repeal that bill be-

* The Hon. Mr. MUEHLBERG, of Pennsylvania, in an eloquent reply to this speech of Mr. WILDE, in allusion to the number of Latin and French quotations, which he [Mr. WILDE] had made, said that he [Mr. MUEHLBERG] would make a quotation too, but it should not be in Latin or French, but it should be in the language of those from whom he said he was proud to say he himself had descended. He said it should be in German, and was this—

• "Thue recht, suerchte Gott, und sheu selbst den Teufel nicht."

He said he supposed he must follow up the example of the gentleman, [Mr. WILDE,] and give the translation. He said that much of the beauty and strength of the original would be lost in the translation, but he would give it.

"Do what is right, trust in God, and fear not even the devil."

fore it goes into operation. Sir, do gentlemen know that it will not answer every purpose for which it was intended? But gentlemen say we must save the Union; that South Carolina has taken her stand, and, unless we repeal the tariff laws, she will dissolve the Union. Yes, sir; South Carolina gave us until the 1st of February to repeal the laws; and if we do not, she will do it for us, by a process of nullification. And gentlemen here seem frightened almost out of their wits for fear that the awful crisis (1st of February) will arrive before we comply with her peremptory, unreasonable, and disloyal commands. If I had no other reason for voting against this bill, the attitude which South Carolina has assumed would be all-sufficient for me. I will not legislate with a bayonet at my bosom. I will not yield to the demands of nullification. I will make no compromise with those who trample the constitution and laws of my country under foot. No, sir! Let South Carolina strike her flag of rebellion; let her stack her arms; let her spike her cannon; let her say, and let her show us by deeds, that she is for the constitution, the laws, and the Union, and then, sir, I will listen most patiently to her story of grievances, whether imaginary or real; and I, for one, will do all in my power to give her satisfaction and contentment.

But, sir, is there any gentleman here who has told us, or who will now tell us, that this bill, if passed into a law, will be satisfactory to her? The gentleman from Georgia seems to be as familiar with the leading nullifiers of South Carolina as any body. He has told us a long story about having acted as second to some of them on the banks of the Savannah, and, from his deportment here, I should think he was following his old employment. He seems to be second to nullification here. At any rate, he seems to be her principal spokesman in this House. Has he told us that South Carolina will be satisfied with this bill? Not he. If we are to infer any thing from what he said, it is that she will not be satisfied. He avowed that no man had any right to pledge South Carolina to this bill. Here are we destroying the country in order to save the Union, and will most certainly fail in the object we are attempting. I consider any action by this House, at this time, as improvident and unwise, if not criminal. Any thing we may do here this session on this subject, will be considered as a concession to nullification. It will be considered throughout the country as a yielding to its demands by us as the representatives of the whole people. It will be hailed by South Carolina as a glorious victory. Whether she believes it or not, she will say she drove us into the measure; and by this very act of ours, this pernicious shrub may strike root in our soil; it may require much treasure and the shedding of much blood before it can be extirpated. It were cruel to them, in my opinion, to let them proceed further in their parricidal career. It were mercy to them to stop them now, even if it must be done by shedding of blood. Stop them peaceably if we can, but forcibly if we must. My advice is, to stop them now, and at once. In my judgment this would be noble economy of human life and of human blood. For, sir, if we, through a want of independence and decision, should, by any act of ours, give countenance to this wild, distracting, and jargonizing system, it may gather strength from one cause or another, and the union of the States may be dissolved, and the ploughshare of desolation and slaughter may pass fiercely over millions of our innocent and unoffending people.

I repeat, sir, that South Carolina has said she would be satisfied with nothing short of an abandonment of the protective system. To this I can never agree. Sir, would she in a few years, if we yield to her demands now, agree to pay even a revenue duty? She has furnished, in my mind, some indications that if she succeeds in prostrating the protection which is given to our own citizens, she will next refuse to pay even a revenue duty. Sir, there are some circumstances that look very much as if South Carolina had been tampered with by our great rival across the water. Things look a good deal as if she had taken it into her head that if she was once out of the Union, she would be able to form connexions more advantageous than those by which we are at present surrounded. And there are not wanting enemies to this Union, who, like the serpent, are twining themselves about her, and impressing it upon her that she is oppressed and badly treated here; and that it would be much to her advantage to separate from us. It is a notorious fact, that a foreigner by birth, and to this day, I believe, a foreigner in feeling and sentiment, has dwelt in her own bosom, and has been constantly pushing her forward to the attitude which she now occupies.

I hold in my hands the United States Telegraph of the 20th December last; and I invite the attention of the committee to an article in it, which I will read, and which, in my opinion, goes strongly to confirm what I have before said on the subject of South Carolina desiring a connexion with our old enemy and great rival across the waters. I will read the text, and then the commentary, both of which, in my opinion, are entitled to be specially noticed at this critical juncture of our affairs.

"My friend admitted all I said to be true. But," said he, "if we were not so perplexed with our finances at home, we would soon put a stop to the rising greatness and prosperity of the United States." "And how?" said I. "Why," said he, "we would instigate the Southern States to rebel against the other States; we would convince the people of the cotton-growing States that your tariff oppresses them, and we would offer them such protection and such commercial advantages, as would induce them to rebel; and in less than five years we would produce a separation of the Union." "But," said I, "probably you would be disappointed; you know you calculated on the Eastern States joining you during the late war, but you were disappointed, and probably you would be disappointed again." "No," said he, "we know better how to manage these matters; we could with our fleets protect them, and our merchants would take their produce and carry to them manufactured articles, duty free, for their own use, and for the purpose of smuggling into the other States, and thus, by these and other means, (which I understand to be a liberal application of secret service money,) we would soon put a stop to the increasing wealth, power, and independence of your country."

This, sir, is the text; now let us have the commentary. The editor says:

"The preceding is from the New York Advocate, and contains a part of a conversation between an Englishman and one of the great men in London, some years ago. It is published by the Advocate as, in its opinion, throwing some light on the late transaction in the South. We should have thought that a very small share of discretion would have prevented the Advocate from taking such a position, as it surely is not much calculated to aid his cause.

"If it be believed at the South, does the Advocate expect that such a belief will act as an inducement to the people of the South to relax in any exertion to get clear of the tariff? If it be believed by the friends of the tariff, will it encourage them to persistence in their measures, by showing that they have greater obstacles to encounter than they have previously thought they had?

"The Advocate has outwitted itself. We publish it for what it is worth."

This article, in my opinion, proves at least the freedom of the press in this country. The editor of this paper is the public printer of the United States to both Houses of Congress; and while we, the representatives of the people, are here in session, these sentiments have been published and proclaimed almost within the portals of the capitol. This paper, too stands at the head of the whole corps of nullifying newspapers; and I believe the editor understands the feelings and views of the nullifiers as well as any man does. When I first read the text in the Telegraph, before I got to the commentary, I felt sure that the editor had published this alleged conversation for the purpose of giving it his most decided reprobation. But, sir, to my mind, instead of reprobating, he has endorsed it. Instead of denouncing it as a slander, as I expected he would, he gives us to understand that it may be true, and that we had better mind how we deal with South Carolina. In my opinion, it warrants this construction most fully. Sir, we are told here that it is not much calculated to aid the cause of the Advocate. What is the cause of the Advocate, I ask? Why, it is the cause of the Union of the States. And the editor of the Telegraph pays the people of the South but a poor compliment when he insinuates that it is only necessary for them to know that Great Britain will give them countenance and take them into favor, to turn them against their own country. He says the publication of this alleged conversation is calculated to have this effect, if I understand him. At least, it would so operate in the South. I do not know how far the people of the South have lost their love of country; but if they can tamely submit to such an imputation as this conveys upon them, they must be pretty far gone. Such an imputation would inflame and excite my constituents to the highest pitch of indignation. They would lose no time in repelling it as a foul calumny.

Mr. Chairman, I have no unkind feelings towards my brethren of the South; and especially, sir, have I none towards the talented and eloquent sons of South Carolina. But, sir, while I say this, I must be permitted to say that for their political principles I entertain the most unyielding and the most uncompromising hostility. But, sir, the people of the South have my compassion rather than my enmity. I look upon them as laboring under a most fatal delusion. I hold the present administration culpable, to a very great degree, for the unfortunate attitude which South Carolina has assumed. For the last four years the whole tendency of the Government has been towards anarchy. Sir, the doctrines of the numerous veto messages which we have had within the last four years, have all tended powerfully in that way. They have created a deep-rooted jealousy among portions of the people, adverse to this Government and all its institutions. They have tended to array one section of the Union against another. They have been calculated to array one class of our citizens against another, and none of these more so than the doctrines of the bank veto. These things, I have no doubt, have had their weight with South Carolina. She thought, as the administration practised upon the disorganizing and jacobinical principles, that she might do the same. She saw Georgia trampling the constitution, the treaties, the laws, and the Supreme Court of the United States, under her feet. She heard the President tell the poor Indian that he must submit to Georgia, for that he, the President, had no power to stay her ruthless hand. She saw all these things, and she lent her aid in pushing them on. She thought that the President had gone so far in these directions, that it was impossible for him to retrace his steps, and that he would be compelled to stand by and see her play the game out by dissolving the Union.

But, sir, the President has found that he has lent an easy ear to the wicked counsellors too long. He finds, although he has been re-elected by a triumphant vote of his fellow-citizens, yet there is confusion, distrust, and dissatisfaction hurrying the Government to the verge of anarchy. He sees that if he goes on with these doctrines of the privy council, that inevitable ruin awaits the country; and I do verily believe that if they had been persevered in, this Union would have been dissolved before the end of this administration. The President saw the mistake he had committed. He saw that "State rights," a plausible name, which artful demagogues have used to conceal the odious principles of nullification which they were disseminating, must lead to nullification and a dissolution of the Union.

Permit me to remark here, sir, that it is in vain for any gentleman to attempt to draw a distinction between "State rights and State rebellion--State rights and nullification." In my opinion, they all mean exactly the same thing. Whenever the doctrines of "State rights," as insisted upon by the Virginia school, are acted out, they must necessarily end in nullification and State rebellion. Against these doctrines I have uniformly raised my voice, and shall continue to do so, regardless of the source from whence they emanate, or of the hue or of the form which they may put on. I say, sir, South Carolina was mistaken in supposing that the President had been so far led along by her and Georgia, and others that had gone so far into these State right doctrines, that he could not retreat, but must fold his arms, and look on and see her nullify the laws, and dissolve the Union. Yes, sir, in this South Carolina was mistaken, and I am proud she was mistaken, for I confess I had some misgivings myself.

Although I felt very certain the President wished to return to the sound doctrines which he had before so steadily maintained, particularly while he was in the Senate of the United States, yet I confess I did not see how he was to escape from the dilemma into which he had been drawn by his friends. I brooded for weeks over this sad and frightful state of things, by which I saw my country surrounded. I was almost ready to do that which no good citizen ought ever to do. I was almost ready to despair of the republic. The annual message thickened the gloom by which I was surrounded. To me, sir, it made darkness visible. But the overruling hand of Providence sometimes bringeth good out of evil. The bold, daring, and reckless movements of South Carolina aroused the old man from that false security in which his parasites had lulled him to repose. He saw the Government which he had been called upon to administer by a confiding people, on the crumbling verge of ruin. One more step, and that Government, and that people, would have been plunged into irretrievable woe and wretchedness. He made a sudden pause—and, to the utter astonishment of all parties, friends and foes, he whirled right about, and, at one leap, he cleared all the difficulties which lay in his way—veto messages, Georgia, nullification, and all, were quite thrown out of the view. He called a council of his prime ministers; and it was solemnly determined that the only expedient and safe mode of administering this Government was that which had been adopted by the father of his country, the good, the great, the illustrious Washington. The result of this council was the proclamation. Sir, you all know that I have never been in the secrets of the cabinet. This proclamation, therefore, took me by surprise. I was sitting one evening in the hotel, in silence and melancholy: I had been meditating on the distracted and wretched condition of my country, until I felt perfectly desperate, ready almost for any state of things that might come. I had arrived at the conclusion that a civil war was certain. Just as I was at the lowest point of depression and desperation, I was startled from my reverie by a friend, who asked me if I had seen the President's proclamation. Proclamation, said I--No. He handed me a copy. I immediately rose and went to my room, lighted my candle, and commenced reading. I found it replete with sound doctrines, which had always met my hearty approbation; and, by the time I had finished it, I found myself rising involuntarily from my seat, and, for the first time in my life, I was almost ready to shout huzza for Jackson! But when the first transport had passed away, I began to think it best not to halloo until I got out of the woods. I began to think of the doctrines of the bank veto. I began to think of the violated faith of the nation with the poor and helpless Indians. I began to think it was impossible that the President, after what he had said and done, could now be serious in promulgating these doctrines; the very reverse of which had been practised for the last four years. These reflections crowded upon me, one after another, until they fell like a cold and heavy sickness upon my heart. These doubts and misgivings remained with me until the President sent us his most excellent message, which followed up and reasserted the doctrines of the proclamation in a mild and dignified, but determined tone, which convinced me that he was in earnest; that he had taken his stand upon the same ground on which our beloved Washington stood during his administration. And so long as he stands upon this ground, he shall receive my decided and unequivocal support. And I believe this is the determination of all those gentlemen with whom it has been my pleasure most generally to act upon this floor.

I have nothing to hope, I have nothing to fear, from this administration. From the very first moment that I entered the political arena, the overwhelming popularity of the present Chief Magistrate was seized by every demagogue within my sphere of action, and wielded, by all, for my political, and, by some of them, for my personal destruction. To the truth of this, there are many here that can bear testimony. My political existence has been preserved by the virtue, the intelligence, and the proud and noble independence of the freemen of Tennessee. My personal existence has been preserved by the miraculous interposition of Him whose wisdom directeth, and whose power controls the destiny of all things.

Believing that the President, at this time, has taken a correct position; believing that he has taken the only position which can preserve this Union; believing that he has planted himself by the constitution and laws of his country, God forbid that I should throw the least obstruction in his way. No, sir; when the vessel of State is dashing among the rocks and whirlpools of political faction, it is no time for us, who really wish to save the ship, to be cherishing our individual grievances of time past: but every man should offer up, upon the altar of his country, all his personal and political injuries. I, for one, sir, stand ready to make this sacrifice. To sustain the constitution and laws of my country, I pledge this right arm, and, with it, the last drop of blood that warms and animates my existence.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 25.

The House having again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. ARNOLD took the floor, and continued till past 3 o'clock in conclusion of his speech against the bill, as given above.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, next addressed the committee. It was my misfortune, said he, not to be present at the commencement of the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE.] But we had some account of it last night in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] and I have heard much more from other sources; and, sir, judging from the impression made upon the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, whether skilful or not, seems to have cast his net far and wide upon the waters, to secure friends for the measure under consideration.

That gentleman appears to have referred especially to

New York, and to have appealed to her delegation; and particularly to the friends of the Vice President elect. I am sure, sir, that, whatever may have been the character of his remarks, had I been present, I should have had no occasion to complain of the language of the gentleman from Georgia—I rely too confidently on the uniform courtesy and urbanity of that gentleman, to believe that he would, on any occasion, violate the strictest rules of propriety and decorum: he must, however, pardon me, sir, for expressing my surprise and regret to learn that he should have referred, in any manner whatever, to one of those miserable effusions which are daily despatched hence by the many spies in Washington; that he should have condescended to notice an anonymous communication charging the Governor of our State with attempting to influence the votes of my colleagues on the question before us. The gentleman from Georgia, I understand, disclaimed all confidence in the story; I know, sir, that he is too candid and too just to believe in such fabrications. If gentlemen desire to know the opinions of the Governor of New York upon the question of a reduction of the duties, they are to be found in an authentic shape, recorded in his message to the Legislature of that State. But it is not necessary, sir, to detain the committee for the purpose of vindicating a character without reproach, and as far beyond the reach of the poor calumnies of any “spy in Washington,” as my colleagues are above the control of any influence but those which direct the judgments of patriotic and just men.

But, Mr. Chairman, an appeal was made to the friends of the Vice President elect; and I understand that it was intimated, at least, that to promote his popularity in the South, it was necessary for them to support the bill under consideration; in other language, whatever might be their principles, they must be surrendered to personal and political considerations. There are some propositions, sir—some appeals, that no language can render acceptable to those to whom they are addressed. No matter in what fascinating manner the gentleman from Georgia may have appealed to my colleagues, though the suggestion may have been wreathed in poetry, every member addressed must still have felt himself called upon to reject an appeal, implying such a destitution of manly independence and political integrity. I am at a loss to discover, sir, in what part of the political history of our State it is, that the gentleman from Georgia finds the evidence that her delegation have ever sacrificed principles for men. Is it, sir, in the political revolution of 1800, when New York aided so materially in establishing those principles of Government which have latterly found so many proselytes? Was it in any one of our contests from that time till 1812? Was it in 1814, sir, when our State was the theatre of war, when we had two frontiers lined with troops; and when on another quarter we presented an impregnable rampart against the assaults of threatened secession, then believed to be no better than rebellion? Is it in any part of this history that the gentleman from Georgia finds New York sacrificing principles for men? [Mr. WILDE explained.] It gives me pleasure, sir, to hear the gentleman from Georgia disclaim any intention to question in any way the principles or integrity of New York. I have again reason to express my regret that I did not hear the commencement of his remarks; they had been reported to me; others had referred to them in debate, and mine was certainly the impression generally made upon the committee. I am happy, sir, to be undeceived. I thought, sir, that the gentleman from Georgia, with whom we have so long acted, could not mistake the political character of our State. I need not remind him of our memorable contest in 1824, when, deprecating all humiliating allegiance to men, and disregarding personal considerations, the republicans of New York sacrificed themselves in an effort to sustain the principles which were established in 1800; when Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and New York, were almost alone in maintaining the republican maxim of "principles, not men." We were defeated, sir; but we have survived the contest: we are still acting together, and in a greater cause: and I trust that, whatever speculative differences of opinion may exist, we may, in a patriotic spirit of mutual concession, continue forever united in measures to preserve the harmony, the constitution, and the Union of our country. Our State has hitherto responded to every appeal to her patriotism and justice, and I feel assured, sir, that she will not be found wanting in the present most interesting crisis in our affairs.

The gentlemen from Georgia and from Ohio [Mr. Vinton] must pardon me for deprecating the character and tenacity of their remarks. The political allusions of the former to coalitions, past or prospective, and the pictures of the latter, of rivers of blood, and millions of our slaughtered countrymen, are poorly calculated to lead us to a calm, dispassionate, and just decision of the measure under consideration. The gentleman from Georgia must excuse me for saying that the course of the gentleman from Ohio is most politic, and best adapted to accomplish his purpose, which is to defeat the bill. If we are to be driven from a cool, candid, and just examination of this question; if geographical prejudices are to be substituted for national patriotism—passion and imagination for reason and judgment—then, sir, may we abandon all hope of any adjustment whatever, now or hereafter. I had hoped, sir, that we should have excluded from this debate all arguments addressed to our political hopes or fears; all appeals to our local jealousies. Our country has surely suffered enough in the last seventeen years, from the unhappy influence of personal ambition, whether of the East, the West, the North, or the South; our sectional prejudices have been appealed to, and our Union has been brought to the verge of dissolution. I had hoped, sir, that for once we might have a truce of politics; that for once we might meet on broad national ground; and, discarding every local, personal, or political consideration, debate and adjust a question upon which certainly the harmony, and perhaps the integrity, of the Union may depend.

Sir, the difficulties about this question are not so great as they were—not so formidable as gentlemen imagine. The chief obstacle is now removed. We now hear on all sides the republican doctrine, that our revenues must be reduced to the amount necessary for our federal expenditures. I congratulate you, sir, and every friend of his country, on this important concession of the opponents of this bill, on this great revolution in the sentiment of this House. The main point is settled; we have now only to adjust the minor questions of the amount necessary for our annual expenditures, the mode of the reduction, and the time when this adjustment of our revenues shall be made.

It is with regret, sir, that I differ with the committee who reported this bill, and who deserve so much credit for the zeal and ability they have displayed in adjusting the details of a very difficult measure. But in assuming fifteen millions as the amount of revenue necessary for our federal expenditures, they have, I think, made an unfortunate admission. Because we are out of debt, we must not be prodigal. The States are not in the same condition; the debt of Pennsylvania is in a ratio to a federal debt of one hundred and eighty millions; and we should not forget that the largest portion of the burdens of the country are necessarily authorized by our town, city, county, and State Governments. Our federal expenditures have increased faster than our population; the average for the first seven years after the adoption of our constitution was less than two million seven hundred thousand dollars; that for 1822—'3—'4, was about ten millions, including pensions; and that for 1829, '30, and '31, thirteen million two hundred and fifteen thousand dollars. My policy, sir, has uniformly been liberal in regard to our national expenditures, in some instances even more so than the committee that reported this bill. But I had supposed, that considering the increase of our expenditures for internal improvement subsequent to 1824, and that that branch of expenditure would be necessarily diminished, we might, without detriment to the public service, apply such diminution to those objects which have attracted the attention of the committee. I may be told, sir, of extraordinary expenditures for pensions, Indian wars, &c.; but how, may I ask, are we to employ the millions which must inevitably accumulate in the treasury before we can possibly reach, under any modification of the tariff, the minimum duties it is proposed permanently to establish? Your bank stock is an offset to your public debt, leaving your whole surplus for years to come applicable to any temporary excess of expenditure. Had the bill of the committee become a law as reported, in three years the probable excess of revenue, according to their own statements submitted, would have amounted to between thirteen and fourteen millions. Besides, we must consider the effect of substituting revenue rates for prohibitory duties, or duties having a prohibitory tendency. Reduce our imposts as we may, sir, we shall not avoid, for some years to come, a surplus of revenue beyond the wants of Government. Why then should we make provision for two millions additional revenue? If our revenue was stationary or retrograding, there might be some reason for it; but, with a population, trade, and revenue uniformly progressive, our difficulty is not how to provide for a deficiency, but how to guard against too great a surplus of revenue. Establish your minimum revenue where you may, and you will find it outstripping your estimate in a very few years, and demanding a further reduction. Our permanent expenditures will reach fifteen millions soon enough, without any suggestion or provision by the committee. The inevitable effect of providing a surplus of revenue, will be to encourage extravagance in our federal expenditures; the latter will always overtake the former, make it what you may; the proposition of the committee is essentially nothing less than a recommendation to perpetuate an additional revenue of near two millions from imposts.

We have another expedient, sir, from an opposite quarter, designed to augment, permanently, our revenue duties to the extent of three millions annually. We are to lose our income from public lands. We are not, sir, disregarding special obligations, about to adopt a more parental and enlarged policy in regard to our public domain. We are not rejecting all unnatural jealousies, and rejoicing, as we ought to do, to see our population spreading to the borders of Mexico, and to the extreme mountains of the West. We are not about removing every obstruction to the growth, prosperity, or improvement of every portion of our vast territory. No, sir; the proposition springs from no friendship to the rising West; it does not propose to discontinue the revenue from public lands, but to draw from thence an annual income to be distributed by the Federal Government among the several States; in order, sir, that this deficiency may be supplied by an augmentation of our revenue from customs, and that an equal tax may be levied upon the country in another form! Nay, sir, it is still worse; the States are to receive about three millions, that the people of those States may pay back annually into the federal treasury the same three millions, together with all the expenses of collection! Such is the scheme of finance recommended to us by gentlemen of intelligence and distinction. They must pardon me, sir, if I cannot perceive the substantial difference between this proposition and another for distributing our surplus revenue among the States, which, not three weeks since, this House, and wisely too, refused to consider by a vote of more than two to one. We shall not probably adopt this measure, at least for some years to come, unless we are prepared to do an act of palpable injustice to one portion of the Union, and to the country generally, by securing a permanent and extraordinary income to our manufacturers; unless we are determined to increase the discontents in the South, and to create a new source of jealousy between the old and the new States. Besides, sir, these lands were conveyed to us expressly to discharge the claims upon our federal treasury, growing out of the revolutionary war. As yet we have received but about forty millions, while we have expended about fifty millions upon our public lands. We have paid off seventy or eighty millions of revolutionary debt, for which they were pledged by our laws; disbursed many millions for pensions and unfunded debt, originating in the revolution; and we have actually, at this moment, an annuity charged upon the treasury for revolutionary pensions, Indian treaties, and land account, more than equal to the annual income from that source of revenue. It is not probable that we shall invade our treasury for this purpose, until some of these many obligations are discharged; nor can it be desirable to destroy all attachment of the Southern and Western States to the Federal Government.

If, then, sir, our annual expenditures are, for the present, estimated at about thirteen millions, and our income from public lands at two and a half to three millions, it will require little more than about ten millions from customs to meet all the necessary expenses of the Federal Government; particularly when we consider that for some years to come a surplus revenue is inevitable, and that any permanent increase of our federal expenses will no doubt be balanced by a gradual augmentation of our income from customs. We cannot, therefore, with justice to the country, authorize, at this time, a greater amount of duty on foreign merchandise than will realize from ten to eleven millions of revenue. Our importations for two years past have amounted to more than a hundred millions annually. If our minimum duties were now to take effect, it would be unsafe to assume that amount, as the imports were much larger than usual; but, as the minimum duties do not take effect for some years, and as the trade and consumption of the country will probably increase with the reduction of our imposts, it is not probable that the importations of future years will fall much, if any, short of those of 1831 and 1832, notwithstanding any reduction which may be made by a change in the credit on duties. Of the importations of 1831, (the year so frequently referred to,) amounting to one hundred and three millions, I find there were imported, of wool and woollens, fourteen millions and a half; of cottons, sixteen millions; of iron, and its manufactures, a little less than seven millions; of sugar and molasses, near seven millions and a half; and of all other articles coming in competition with the various other branches of our industry, about twelve millions; making a total importation, of what are styled protected articles, of fifty-seven millions of dollars; and of all other dutiable and free articles, forty-six millions. Of the total imports, about seventy millions of dutiable articles, chiefly of the protected class, are estimated to have been consumed in the country. While the exports of the country continue to be between sixty and seventy millions, independent of the profits and earnings of our commerce and navigation in the foreign trade, there cannot be, after 1836 or 1837, any considerable reduction from the above estimate. A duty of twenty per cent. upon the protected articles, and of ten upon the others, would yield a nett revenue of about eleven millions, which, with the income from public lands, would make an aggregate receipt into the treasury of near fourteen millions annually.

It is in vain, sir, for us to attempt to evade or to postpone this question. Our revenue from customs and public lands, now estimated at twenty-one millions annually, must be reduced to thirteen or fourteen millions. Our revenue from imposts alone must be brought down to about eleven millions; and without permanent prohibitory duties, which never will be tolerated in this country, a higher permanent duty on protected articles than twenty per cent. cannot be maintained, without producing more revenue than the necessities of Government require. In this state of things, sir, we may throw aside all our theories on both sides of this question. Whatever may be our opinions, they must yield to the actual condition of the country. We must surrender all our favorite speculations to the more substantial good sense and sound understanding of those who never refine—of that great agricultural interest which, happily for our country, controls its destinies. If thirty or forty, or even fifty dollars on every hundred consumed were required for the use of Government, that interest would cheerfully submit to it; but, sir, theorize as we may, if twenty be sufficient to satisfy the wants of the treasury, to twenty will our farmers have our permanent taxes reduced. The bill as reported contains many provisions which I should wish to have amended. Its discriminations, whether the policy be wise or not, are not adapted to a confederacy; political considerations will compel us, in the end, to equalize the imposts on protected articles, whether they are the productions of the North, South, East, or West. But the details of a tariff cannot be adjusted to please all, and I shall cheerfully support the measure, whatever form it may probably assume. I cannot, however, avoid noticing the discriminations in favor of iron and sugar, the policy and justice of which are, in my view, extremely questionable. I am aware that my colleague, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] the chairman of the committee, has defended the iron duty, as that article is necessary in war. He must pardon me for expressing my surprise that one of his intelligence and just views should have conceded an exception, which would sanction the doctrine of protection in all cases whatever. Of all articles, iron has the fewest claims to protection in our country. It was a manufacture before the revolution, and the excessive cost of transportation secures to it a monopoly of neighboring markets. No duty can be more unwise as a measure of public policy. No tax can be more oppressive to agriculture, commerce and manufactures. Brown sugar, too, is one of those necessities of life which should certainly not be taxed as it is, higher in proportion than other articles. Gentlemen who represent other interests complain of these discriminations; but I think the advantage is on the side of those interests which are reduced by this bill to the minimum rates, as they will hereafter remain undisturbed, while the duties on the others must continue to be a subject of legislation, until they are reduced to a corresponding rate. It is not for me, sir, to counsel those who represent the various branches of industry interested in the fate of this bill; but, in their position, I should entreat Congress to establish the duties on some permanent foundation, and to do it as speedily as possible.

We have been told, sir, that we passed a bill in July last, and that it is improper to pass another before that takes effect. Under other circumstances this objection would be a strong one; but I appeal to every gentleman whether that act does not leave an annual surplus of many millions, and whether it is expedient to allow the session to pass away, when we know that the revenue will exceed the wants of Government. We deceive ourselves, sir, if we suppose that the great revolution in our revenue laws, demanded by the extinguishment of the public debt, can be accomplished in one or two sessions. We must be inspired if we could regulate our indirect and fluctuating revenues so as to produce an amount equal, or even nearly so, to our expenditures. This question must employ Congress for many sessions to come. The act of July last, together with our revenue from other sources, leaves a surplus, varying according to the estimates of gentlemen, of from six to eight millions annually. It is neither prudent, wise, nor just, to postpone the reduction of our revenue, and permit an accumulation of twenty or thirty millions in the treasury to put in jeopardy every interest, and even the Union itself. We are also told that this is not the time for acting upon this question; true, sir, this is not the most proper time, for that time has passed; this question ought to have been adjusted, so far as our internal interests were concerned, two or three years ago, when our attention was first called to it by the President. It was the interest as well as the duty of all concerned in our manufactures to have come forward with patriotism, and to have submitted to a change which was rendered inevitable by the altered condition of our finances. Had such a course been adopted, we should have witnessed no discontent in the South; and I appeal to gentlemen whether they would not have secured for our manufacturers much higher imposts than they will ever be able to obtain hereafter. The longer this adjustment is postponed, the more embarrassing will it be to our internal interests. I pray gentlemen to reflect whether it can be for the interest of our manufacturers to have this question agitated from session to session. Let them consult our old and skilful manufacturers, those who are unconnected with politics, and a large majority of them will tell you, "we care not so much what your rate of duty be, but spare us the embarrassments growing out of your perpetual legislation, make it what you will; but establish your laws permanently, and leave us hereafter undisturbed." Such, sir, would be the language of every man who depends on his industry, frugality, and enterprise. It is surely time, sir, that we should cease to legislate on this subject. For seventeen years our manufacturers have been made, most wantonly too, the sport and victim of ambition. Not, sir, that noble passion, which seeks a glorious name by laboring to increase the prosperity of nations, and to improve the condition of the human race, but that contemptible sentiment, which tempts us to make the industry of our country subservient to political fortunes; to regulate our manufacturing policy according to the fluctuations of parties, and to advocate or abandon, as it may suit the purpose of the hour, any and every constitutional principle or public measure proposed, in order to secure the short-lived honor of administering the affairs of Government. It is time, sir, to make an effort to rescue our internal industry from the uncertain guardianship of such ambition, from the questionable friendship of all such politicians, no matter to what party they may belong.

This measure is opposed, sir, upon another ground: it must be postponed to another Congress, because South Carolina threatens to violate our laws! We cannot discharge our duty to our country, because South Carolina is about to engage in a war with our revenue laws! In adjusting our revenue to our expenditures, what have we to do with the terrors of her ordinance, or the defiance of her convention? Are we, sir, to be driven from our course, and to postpone our public obligations? Are we to continue some six or eight millions of unnecessary taxes upon the country, because a portion of the people in one of the four and twenty States have declared our laws to be unconstitutional, and their determination to resist them? Certainly not, sir. We are called upon to discharge the double duty of reducing our revenue, and of adopting measures to execute our laws: for however unwise I may deem the latter, while they continue they must be executed. No gentleman can be more opposed to this system than I am; I consider it the impoverishing offspring of public debt, which must perish when its parent dies. I believe these laws to be unwise and unjust, but I cannot persuade myself that they are unconstitutional. We have abused the powers to levy imposts and to regulate commerce, by imposing duties when they were not required by the treasury, and by pretending to countervail acts which were not in existence; still the acts of 1828 and 1832 are the laws of the land, and as such must be respected and executed. But, sir, while we are not to be driven from our course, on either of these great questions, by the attitude of South Carolina, I must disclaim all participation in those vindictive passions which some gentlemen have displayed in this debate. The condition of that State is with me a subject rather of regret than of angry feeling. Whether nullification shall perish or not, on the soil from whence it sprung; whether her cause shall fail or triumph, the commerce of that State must be suspended; public confidence must be destroyed; and her inevitable doom will be poverty and ruin, aggravated, perhaps, by the reflection, that the arrow with which she is wounded is "feathered from her own wing." But though, in adjusting this revenue question, we ought not to be influenced by the conduct, condition, or ultimate fate of South Carolina, there are some considerations which I trust will have their influence on every generous, every noble mind. If, sir, in discharging a great public duty, it should so happen that our legislating now might stay the uplifted arm of one of our countrymen, if it should stop the effusion of one drop of American blood, is there one, convinced of the propriety of this measure, is there one among us so callous to every impulse of humanity, so dead to every lofty sentiment of patriotism, as to postpone the bill, lest he might be suspected of yielding to South Carolina? Let us not, Mr. Chairman, mistake stubborn prejudice for stern patriotism; or, from some less respectable, less dignified motive, postpone our obligations to the country.

There are, however, other considerations more comprehensive which should not be overlooked; we cannot be indifferent to passing events—to the disturbed relations of the Union; we cannot be ignorant of the cause of the discontent which now prevails from this to the borders of Louisiana, nor ought we to disregard the consequences which may flow from it. It is difficult, sir, for us to persuade ourselves that we have been, for many years past, legislating on principles totally incompatible with the confederate form of our Government. The extinguishment of our public debt has suddenly arrested the progress of such measures, and substituted for debates about woollens, cottons, iron, and sugar, questions involving not only constitutional powers, but the fundamental distinction between a confederate and a national Government. We are now, sir, in a new latitude; we have a broad horizon; unskilful observations or false reckonings may lead us into difficulties and dangers which we are unwilling now to suppose possible. In taking an enlarged view of the condition of our finances, of our form of Government, and of the object of the high duties we have imposed, we must be convinced that, whether wise or unwise, right or wrong, constitutional or not constitutional, the benefits or injuries of high protecting duties cannot be common to all the States, and that we must return to imposts for revenue, or abandon all hope of preserving the Union in harmony and prosperity. Waiving all argument, let us admit that such measures are wise and just in France or Great Britain, would they still be so if these Powers belonged to a confederacy? Suppose that, in some convulsion like the past, the Governments of that continent were to be overturned by some man greater than Napoleon—some second Washington; that, instructed by an admirable example, the various States of that continent had determined to set aside their partial alliances and leagues; had assembled in convention, and voluntarily associated in one general union; that they had resolved to terminate forever their internal wars by removing the causes, by abandoning their commercial restrictions, and by establishing a common treasury, army and navy, for the common defence. Suppose that Spain, Italy, Switzerland, France, Great Britain, nay, all Europe, reserving to each State its jurisdiction over its internal concerns, had surrendered these few but great powers to a common Government, and had formed a European Federal Union, would it be wise or just in France and Great Britain, forming with other States a mere majority, under the pretext of levying taxes for the use of the common treasury, to impose restrictions on the other members of the confederacy? Would any statesman sacrifice the rights of a part, and the peace of all Europe, in a speculative experiment to force the growth of manufactures in one quarter of their Union? Not less unwise and unjust is this attempt of ours to apply this policy to a confederacy of States spreading over a vast continent, and embracing almost all the climates and productions of the globe. We may appeal to past authorities; we may resist this reform from session to session, but a struggle to perpetuate this policy, if persevered in, must terminate in a dismemberment or a consolidation of the Union; either of which would be fatal to the peace and prosperity of our country, and would visit upon the people of this continent internal wars and all the calamities incidental to Governments depending for their existence on military power—Governments ruling in defiance of public opinion. Continue this contest, adhere to past legislation, and you will have questions infinitely more alarming than nullification; you will hear more of the revolutionary doctrine of secession, and, what would be equally fatal to the Union, you would have grave propositions for a convention of the States. Whatever form, sir, a question of this kind may assume, whether of secession or convention, the contest between the North and the South must inevitably terminate in “an appeal from the cancelled obligations of our constitutional compact to original rights—to the law of self-preservation.”

It is easy, sir, to avert all these calamities, and to put an end to these debates about secession and convention, by revising our revenue laws with amity and justice, and by adhering to the spirit as well as to the letter of our federal constitution. Reduce the revenue to the expenditures of the Government, arrange the taxes on equal and just principles, reform the abuses of past legislation, leave the States undisturbed in their jurisdiction over their internal concerns, and confine our Federal Government to the few but great powers necessary to defend our country, to extend our intercourse abroad, and to enlarge the resources—the power and glory of the Union: make these reforms in the administration of our federal concerns, and the peace of this American continent, and the union of this great republic, will continue undisturbed and unbroken for generations to come.

Though other views have been, in this debate, attributed to New York, these are the results which will induce her to persevere in her efforts to adjust this question. To accomplish these great purposes, she will, as heretofore, when our Union was threatened, unite with the other members of our confederacy in a spirit of patriotism and justice. In some portions of our State we have anticipated the necessity of a change in our revenue laws. You have been told by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. INGERSOLL] that a revolution of opinion commenced with us many years ago. We have since seen it extending into other districts, and spreading through New Hampshire and Maine. The time has now arrived when we may all concur. The condition of our finances, and the inevitable necessity of reducing our revenue, enable us to unite in a spirit of mutual concession to restore harmony and to preserve the Union. The attitude of our State is happy and imposing; she has no special interests to tempt her to substitute local for general considerations; her associations, commercial and political, and all her attachments, are with the Union. Our opponents, perhaps to excite the jealousy of the other members of the confederacy, have honored her with the title of the “Empire State.” We disclaim any such distinction. We are indebted to the bounties of nature, to a happily constructed constitution, a wisely administered State Government, and the blessings of our Federal Union, for unparalleled prosperity, for great power and resources. We are grateful for these, not that they may enable us to exercise any empire over the destinies of this republic, but that we may win the confidence of our confederates by our patriotism and justice; and that, in all our internal distinctions, whether resulting from geographical prejudices or from the struggles of ambition, it may be our proud office to mediate between the North and the South, and to restore tranquillity to our country.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, then obtained the floor. I am aware, said he; that much time has already been consumed in the discussion of the provisions of this bill, and that great anxiety exists with many members to bring it to a close as speedily as possible. I am also aware of the fact that there are many other important subjects pending here, which imperiously demand the attention of the House; but the present is one of so much interest, and is calculated to make such deep and lasting impressions, that I deem it a duty to claim the attention of the committee, for a very limited period of time, while I explain the reasons which will influence me in voting for or against the provisions of this bill.

It is no part of my intention now to enter into the policy of originating a system for the protection and encouragement of manufactures made of materials which are produced in the country. That question has been so repeatedly agitated in this House, and in all the journals of the country, that the reasons for and against it are not only familiar to every member here, but must be so to every reading and intelligent man in the country. If a succession of Presidential recommendations for forty years, and if a succession of legislative enactments for the same period, can be regarded as indications of the national will, then, indeed, we may with safety conclude, if any great question of political economy can become the settled policy of the land, that this is one of that character, and cannot now be disturbed without doing incalculable mischief. Perhaps there is nothing more vitally important to the well-being, to the happiness and prosperity of the community, than stability in our laws and institutions. If we adopt one policy this year, another the next, and still another the succeeding year, it is utterly impossible to conform to each successive arrangement, and our laws, instead of conferring safety, will be regarded as the idle emanations of the day, and must, and necessarily will, sink into just and merited contempt.

In order to test the correctness of the positions here assumed, I will advert to a few of the branches of industry which have been brought into existence by the inducements that have been held out, and the protection which has been offered to those who should embark in them. We are informed by a convention of the friends of domestic industry, which convened in the city of New York in October, 1831, and I have no doubt of the correctness of the statements, that there was then invested in the growth and manufacture of wool, in the United States, the sum of one hundred and sixty-seven million five hundred thousand dollars, and that the products from the manufacture of wool were worth, annually, the sum of forty million dollars. In coming to this conclusion, the crop of wool for the year 1831 was estimated at twenty million dollars, and its manufacture to the like sum. We are also informed by the same convention, that the cotton crop of the United States for the year ending on the 18th of October, 1831, amounted to 1,038,847 bales, equal to 375,925,302 pounds, and that more than one-fifth of the whole amount was consumed in the United States. It was estimated that the product, allowing that it was increased fourfold in the process of manufacture, must be four-fifths of that of the cotton crop, equal in value to the whole export. If we estimate the cotton crop of that year at ten cents per pound, it would be worth the sum of 37,592,530 dollars, the four-fifths of which being the value of the manufactures from that article in this country, amounts to the sum of 30,074,024 dollars. These two branches of our manufactures alone, without reference to the other great interests which have grown up under the protection afforded them by the laws, present an annual addition of fifty million dollars to the productive labor of the country. The question, therefore, is not whether we shall originate a protective system, but whether we shall destroy institutions which have sprung up under the fostering care of the Government. It is, more properly speaking, a subject in which is involved the inquiry, whether the period has now arrived in which it has become an imperious duty to destroy those fair fabrics of national skill and industry, and to transfer to foreigners the manufacture of the raw materials, and, with it, the fifty million dollars which are now made here from the manufacture of these articles. These are grave questions, of deep import, and ought not to be approached hastily, nor without the utmost circumspection.

In 1830, our exports amounted to about seventy millions, and the imports for the same period to nearly that sum. In 1831, the exports amounted to eighty-one million dollars, and the imports to one hundred and three millions, making an excess of importation of twenty-two millions over and above the exports of that year. For the sake of brevity, I speak in round numbers. This excess must operate as a debt, and cannot fail to drain the country of its specie or metallic currency to that extent. The ports of the principal Powers of Europe may be said to be almost literally closed against the breadstuffs of this country, which form the great staple commodities of the Middle and Western States; and we now and at all times have imported as much as we export, and, owing to the corn laws and other obstructions in Europe to our export trade, it is believed to be utterly impossible to increase our exports to any considerable extent. All the manufactures we now import, and all we make, are essentially necessary to our comfort and convenience; and if we succeed in putting down the workshops of this country, which now furnish a supply of clothing nearly equal to five-sixths of the whole of our domestic exports, can the advocates of this bill tell me from whence we are to receive a supply of clothing equal to the wants of the country? And if other nations, by their skill and industry, can supply the demand, can the advocates for prostrating home industry tell me in what way we can pay for the increased importations? As it now is, by an exchange of commodities, we find no difficulty in paying for the manufactures of this country; but if they should be put down, we shall be compelled to forego many of the comforts by which we are now surrounded, and be reduced to a still greater degree of dependence on foreign nations for the very necessities of life.

I am decidedly of opinion that it is wholly inexpedient to collect more revenue than is absolutely necessary for a wise and frugal administration of the affairs of Government. If the practical effects of the act of the last session will be the production of more revenue than is necessary for these objects, I am willing and anxious that a further reduction should take place; but in making that reduction, I am as decidedly of opinion that the imposition of duties should be so regulated as to give the utmost possible protection to the existing institutions of the country. An adherence to this principle, in my humble opinion, is nothing more than the manufacturers have the right to demand, as they were induced by the legislation of Congress to embark in their present pursuits. If we yield to them this little boon, it cannot operate injuriously to any, as the articles upon which the highest duties will be imposed must enter into general consumption. Those duties will principally be collected from articles of clothing, such as are used in every portion of the Union, which, perhaps, will distribute the burdens of Government more equally than any other system that can be devised.

If it has become necessary to make a further reduction, and at this time, then two inquiries present themselves. Have we the necessary information before us? and if so, are the provisions of this bill such as to commend themselves to the approbation of the House?

Previous to the investigation of the tariff of 1828, a committee of this House was required to collect such information as might shed light upon the subject, and for that purpose was invested with power to send for persons and papers. The committee performed the duties assigned to it, and furnished to the House a volume of testimony, collected from those who were best acquainted with the then situation of the manufacturing interests.

At the last session of Congress, when the subject was again likely to be brought before the House, as early as the 16th of January, a resolution was offered to the House by direction of the Committee of Ways and Means, and was adopted on the 19th, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was requested to collect such facts and information as might be in his power, of the extent and condition, generally, of the manufactures of wool, cotton, hemp, iron, sugar, and salt, and such other articles as were manufactured to any considerable extent in the United States, and to report the same to the House during the session, and as early as might be practicable, for the information of Congress. And, in transmitting the information, he was also requested to accompany it by such a tariff of duties on imports, as, in his opinion, might be best adapted to the advancement of the public interest. On the 19th of January another resolution was offered to the House by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was required to obtain information of the quantities and kinds of the several articles manufactured in the United States during the year; particularly those of iron, cotton, wool, hemp, and sugar, and the costs thereof; also, the quantities and costs of similar articles imported from abroad, during the same year, and to lay the same before the House. On the 27th of April the Secretary of the Treasury made his report to the House, accompanied by the information he had collected, and a bill for regulating the duties on imports. The report of the Secretary, and the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on Manufactures; and, on the 23d of May following, that committee reported a bill to the House, which, with some amendments, after undergoing a most elaborate discussion, passed this House on the 28th of June, by a vote of 132 to 65. This bill, after undergoing some amendments in the Senate, and to which the House assented, received the approbation of the President on the 14th of July, having occupied the attention of Congress, in the manner I have stated, for nearly six months. It was framed with a view to protection and reduction, and perhaps no bill of the kind was ever sustained by such decided majorities in both Houses of Congress. These facts are here stated for the purpose of showing with what caution this interesting subject has heretofore been approached, and how guarded Congress has been, lest, by some inadvertence, an injury might be done to some one of the great interests which are now identified with our national and individual prosperity.

The act of the last session was made to take effect from and after the 3d day of March next; and before it has gone into operation, we who voted for its provisions, are called upon to retrace our steps, and to lower the duties on protected articles, and to raise them on others not coming in competition with home productions. This bill, after the year 1835, imposes a duty of fifteen per cent. on imported wool, the cost of which does not exceed eight cents the pound, and a duty of twenty per cent. on imported woollen goods costing more than thirty-five cents to the square yard. By the law of the last session, an ad valorem duty of forty per cent. was levied on imported wool worth more than eight cents the pound, and a specific duty of four cents on each pound, and an ad valorem duty, with some exceptions, of fifty per cent., was levied on imported woollen goods. I remember well, that, at the last session, great apprehensions were entertained that the duty imposed on woollen goods would prove insufficient; and now, without a reason being assigned for the change, and in the absence of all evidence showing the effect that the change may have on the manufacture of the article in this country, we are called upon to vote for the provisions of this bill. If fifty per cent. at the last session was necessary to protect the great interests involved in the growth and manufacture of wool, the reduction now proposed to twenty per cent., if adopted, may prove entirely ruinous to that great interest. We are, then, without the necessary information to guide us to a safe result; and it will be far more advisable to postpone this matter until the information is procured, than now to take a leap in the dark, without knowing the consequences that may ensue.

The Tariff Bill.

The bill now under consideration can claim for its protection no such deliberation. The committee was appointed perhaps a week after the session commenced; and on the 27th of December this bill was reported to the House, and, notwithstanding it so materially changes the whole protecting system, it has not been referred to nor examined by the Committee on Manufactures, which is always selected with reference to that subject, and whose members are presumed to possess more information in relation to manufactures than the members of any other committee of the House. This must necessarily be so, as they are in the habit of examining all matters of that kind which are brought before the House.

I will now examine the provisions of this bill as proposed, and see if they are such as ought to meet with a favorable reception from this House.

The reduction of the revenue is pressed upon us as a reason for the hasty introduction of the bill, and it is also pressed upon us as a reason why it should as hastily become a law. We are told that a reduction of the tariff of duties is loudly called for by many of the States, and that it is necessary to appease the angry feelings which exist in certain portions of the country. We have also been told by an honorable member of the committee, from Tennessee, that the time has arrived for action, and not for speaking; that a crisis has arisen in which the Union is endangered, and he conjures us, by our love of country, and by every patriotic consideration, to vote for this bill, which is to give peace and repose to the country. These reasons, if left unexamined, might lead to the belief that the bill is, strictly speaking, a bill for reduction. Every one, upon the slightest examination of the provisions of the bill, must come to the conclusion that it is not entirely of that character, and that it is so framed as, unnecessarily, to take away the protection that might be afforded to the productions of the country; and that it must and will operate unjustly and unequally in the collection of the revenue.

By the law of the last session, tea imported in our own vessels from places beyond the Gape of Good Hope, and coffee, were admitted free of duty, and the duty on silks was greatly reduced. By this bill, a duty of one cent per pound is laid on coffee, which, according to the tabular statements that accompany the report of the committee, will produce a revenue of - $817,574
The proposed duties on teas will produce - 415,167
The proposed increase of the duties on silks will produce the further sum of - 622,284

Making, in all, an increase of - $1,855,025

Here, then, instead of reduction—and that seems to be the order of the day—we have a new and additional duty on three articles only, amounting to the sum of one million eight hundred and fifty-five thousand and twenty-five dollars, over and above the duties imposed on the same articles by the law of the last session. These articles require no protection. They come in competition with no production of the country to any considerable extent; and were they wholly freed from duty, I am not aware of any injury that would result therefrom. These proposed increased duties, should the bill pass in its present form, will seriously affect the protection given to domestic productions, inasmuch as that sum might be otherwise advantageously applied to their protection. I can see no earthly reason for this change, and were there no other objections to the bill than the one assigned, I would not give to it my support. There are, however, other weighty objections to these new and increased duties, growing out of their partial operation on different portions of the country. In Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, the population consists of 1,721,812 whites, 1,248,290 slaves, and 77,298 free people of color. The whole population of the United States amounts to 12,858,670, and of that number 2,009,050 are slaves, and 319,576 are free people of color. These slaves use neither tea nor coffee, nor silks to any considerable extent, if any; while in the Middle, Western, and Northern States, there is scarcely a family in which these articles are not more or less in use. The practical effect, therefore, of raising the duties on these articles, is to throw an unjust and unequal portion of the revenue on the non-slaveholding States. Taxation and representation ought to accompany each other as nearly as practicable. This is in accordance with the genius and spirit of the constitution, and ought not to be departed from where it can be avoided. The constitution requires that representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be admitted within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. It is true that duties laid on imports do not come within the rule here laid down for the distribution of direct taxes; but it cannot be doubted that all taxes ought to be so imposed as to bear as equally as possible on every part of the Union. Three-fifths of all the slaves are here represented, which gives political weight in this House to the portion of country in which they reside. This being the case, I am satisfied there is scarcely a subject that could be selected for taxation that would not bear more equally on all, and come nearer to the spirit and true meaning of the constitution than that imposed on tea, coffee, and silks. There are other privileges and exemptions in this bill more strongly marked than those already noticed. By this bill, blankets which do not exceed seventy-five cents cost, and cloths or woollen goods which do not cost more than thirty-five cents the square yard, are admitted at a duty of five per cent., while blankets above seventy-five cents cost, and woollen goods costing more than thirty-five cents the square yard, are admitted; the first at fifteen, and the latter at twenty per cent. It is asserted, and I have never heard it contradicted, that the goods admitted under the five per cent. duty are intended for the slave population of the South. Now, I ask, why is this distinction made? Why exempt the owners of slaves from paying a duty as high as is imposed on all classes, including the rich and the poor, in the non-slaveholding States? I am aware that the same feature was introduced into the bill of the last session, but it was then done to put an end to the unceasing complaints made in the Southern portion of the country against the tariff. In that act the principle of protection was preserved. In this bill it is abandoned, in a great degree, if not to an extent that must prove destructive to many of the best manufactures in the country. The concession was also made, at the last session, to the South, with the view of securing something like permanency to the protection afforded by law for the encouragement of domestic industry. This bill has no claims of that kind, and I am unwilling, without a reason for so doing, to give my vote for any bill that is so partial in its operations, by increasing the burdens on the free States for the purpose of lessening them on the owners of the description of population I have named.

The Tariff Bill.

There is another clause in the bill to which I cannot yield my assent, and that is the one which reduces the duty on salt to five cents the bushel. Ever since I have had the honor of a place in this House, not a session, I believe, has passed away without something being attempted in relation to the duty on this article. As early as 1790, an act was passed by Congress imposing a duty of twelve cents on each bushel of foreign salt. By an act of 8th July, 1797, an additional duty of eight cents was laid on the bushel, and if imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, the like additional duty of eight cents, and ten per centum thereon. By an act of the 3d of March, 1807, these duties were repealed. After the last war, and at a period when the evils had been severely felt of not having a sufficient domestic supply in time of war, an act was passed on the 27th of April, 1816, imposing a specific duty of twenty cents on each bushel containing fifty-six pounds. That duty remained unchanged until the act of the 30th of March, 1830, which reduced the duty after the 31st day of December, 1830, to fifteen cents, and after 31st of December, 1831, to ten cents. If there be any article that is truly indispensable in time of peace and in time of war, it is salt; and if there be any article which, above all others, ought to be placed beyond the changes which are incident to our relation with other countries, it is salt. Its use cannot be dispensed with by the rich nor the poor, and any tax or duty that is imposed on it, spreads itself over the whole face of the country, in a proportion, perhaps, more perfectly just than that on any other article. Why then seek to lessen the duty? Hereafter no more taxes will be collected than are necessary for the wants of Government, and if we pay a duty on salt, it lessens the duty on something else, and no one can complain of injustice, for all have to pay in proportion to their consumption. Under the protection which has been given to the manufacturer of salt, there is already invested a fixed capital of nearly seven millions, in lands, furnaces, vats, &c., and the salt made in 1830 was very near four million and a half bushels, which is nearly one-half of the annual consumption of that article in the United States. After the sad experience of the last war, during which the price of the article was so much enhanced along the seaboard, I am not a little surprised to see the exertions that have been made to reduce the duty, and thereby hazard its future domestic production. It is with this as with other articles that are manufactured in the country. It can be obtained by an exchange of commodities; but if we are left to pay the cash to foreigners for all we need, I am at a loss to conceive where or to what market we should send our agricultural productions to raise the means of payment. In aftertimes the historian will scarcely be believed, who shall record the fact that this proud republic, with a population exceeding twelve millions of people, could not, from its own skill and labor, supply its citizens with their daily raiment, nor with the quantity of salt necessary to mingle with their provisions. At the proper time I will move to strike this clause from the bill.

One of the members of the committee has assured us that the duty of twenty per cent. on woollens is a sufficient protection, and that he was justified in making the assertion by the evidence that had been collected at the last session of Congress, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. To sustain the assumption, he read to us a few passages from some manuscript statements, and some others from a printed volume of evidence, which had not then been laid on the desks of members. Some of the witnesses, if such they may be called, stated that many of the manufacturers of woollen goods were making little or no profits, while others differed widely as to the extent of profits that they severally made in their respective establishments, varying from seven to forty per cent. I think there is only one individual who stated that he made forty per cent. But from the testimony, taking it all together, it is clearly established, that the business, generally, has heretofore been unproductive, and ruinous to many. The member appeared to be conscious of this, when he exclaimed that the failures were ascribable to the want of skill and capital, and not to the want of protection. Now I perfectly agree with the member, that the want of skill and capital may have been, and very probably was, the cause of many failures. This was to be expected in a new pursuit, and the whole scope and design of the protective system was to encourage the citizens of this country to embark in a business measurably new and untried, and upon the protection of which our national independence and prosperity so much depended. The grand design was, to invite skill and capital to the country, and much has been effected; and if let alone, we shall have both skill and capital, and the business will flourish and become co-extensive with the wants of the country. At the time this testimony was taken, the act of 1828 was in force, and it was taken with reference to the provisions of that act, which afforded an average protection of sixty-five per cent. In some instances it was as low as forty-five, and in others as high as one hundred and twelve, but the average protection was sixty-five per cent. The difference between the act of 1828 and the bill now under consideration, is forty-five per cent. Now, can it be pretended that no profits, or profits varying from seven to forty per cent., if such profits as the latter were ever realized, will justify the subtraction of forty-five per cent. from the protection afforded at the time these profits were made? It is very uncertain whether the losses in this business have not been as great as the profits, and it cannot be pretended that the average profits have been any thing like that described by the witness, who says that his amounted to forty per cent. The member then is not borne out in the assumption that the profits of the business justify the reduction. The honorable member also read some other passages, in which the persons state, or give it as their opinion, that if the frauds upon the revenue could be suppressed, and the raw material admitted under a corresponding duty, a clear protection of twenty-five per cent. would be sufficient. By this bill a duty of fifteen per cent. is levied on wool, and twenty on imported woollen goods. It has been said that the cost of the wool is equal to half the value of the article manufactured from it. If this be so, the protection afforded to the manufacturer is but twelve and a half per cent. If the duty on wool increases its price, the amount of that increase is so much taken from protection. Wool worth fifty cents will produce, when manufactured, a dollar's worth of cloth. On that quantity of wool the duty is seven and a half cents. This, taken from the twenty cents protection given to the manufactured article, reduces the protection to twelve and a half per cent. Now, I am at a loss to conceive how the member could arrive at the conclusion that a clear protection of twenty-five per cent. can justify a reduction to twenty, with a duty of fifteen on the raw material. He is equally unfortunate in the assertion, that the provisions of this bill, and those contained in the act of 1816, are the same, and that the protection furnished, in the opinion of some of the agents or witnesses, is sufficient. After attempting

Tariff Agents.

to show that a much larger sum is requisite, it would be a waste of time to attempt to defeat the assertion that a lesser sum will suffice.

We are told, as I have already remarked, by the same honorable member, that the time has arrived in which it is necessary to act and not speak—and that a crisis has arisen which renders it necessary that we should speedily pass on this bill. Now I am at a loss to conceive what the member means by a crisis, unless he alludes to the discontents that prevail in a certain portion of the country. If the passage of this bill be necessary to allay those discontents, is he certain that he will thereby ensure peace to the country? Does he suppose that the Middle and Northern States will quietly submit to the destruction of their property to silence the complaints of others?

If the passage of this bill, and its consequent effect upon the manufacturing establishments of the country, should be such as to transfer the discontents from the South to the North, and if the really injured inhabitants of that country should take the very grounds now occupied in the South, and should engage in the actual assemblage of an armed force, to oppose the laws of the Union, would the member then rise in his place and tell us that another crisis had arisen, and would he again conjure this House, by every consideration growing out of patriotism or love of country, to restore the protecting duties for the purpose of preserving the integrity of the Union? If he will follow out his theory, he will find that it will not answer in practice. He will discover that the National Legislature, instead of being influenced by the general welfare, will be governed by those who can make the most noise and the loudest complaints. I believe that the honorable member is influenced by the purest motives, and it is no part of my intention to cast the least censure on him by these remarks; nor is it my intention, on this occasion, to utter a single expression of unkindness or disrespect in relation to the State in which an unhappy excitement now prevails. I would rather cherish the belief that the day is not distant when the prevailing excitement will pass away, and when the representatives of all the States will again assemble here with those feelings of kindness and affection which characterized the early legislation of the country: rather than embitter the future by unnecessary severity of expression, it would be far more acceptable to my feelings to cast the mantle of charity over our internal differences, and hide them forever from the view of the world. But I cannot persuade myself into the belief that matters of this kind ought to have any influence with us in the discharge of our duties. The constitution was intended for the general good; and, in legislating here, we ought to look to that. The whole scheme of our general and local Governments is based upon the hypothesis that the majority ought to govern, and we cannot stand justified in bartering away the rights of the majority to gratify the wishes of the minority, especially if the concession will be productive of no benefit even to the minority.

We are also told that reduction must be made, and that the tariff must come down. The manufacturers are given to understand that their destruction will be effected with great kindness—that they are not to be slain upon the spot, but that they shall have the privilege of gradually sinking down, and two or three years are allotted for that purpose. They are placed in the attitude of the convicted felon, who, when he finds he can no longer escape the offended laws, appeals to the mercy of his judge, and asks that the day of execution may be deferred as long as possible. This humble privilege is now held out to our own citizens, who have invested their property, under the plighted faith of the laws, in manufacturing establishments which now make more than half the raiment used in the country; yes, they are to go down forever, to gratify, in my humble opinion, the unfounded complaints of others, who allege that the system of protection is oppressive. The assertion is made with apparent confidence; but how is it oppressive? What grievances are sustained in the South, that are not common to the whole country? We must have revenue, and if that revenue be collected in just proportions from every part of the land, and no more is collected than is absolutely necessary for the support of Government, who is there that has just cause of complaint? Were the principal part of the revenue collected from clothing alone, is it not an article in use wherever civilized man is to be found? And if the revenue collected from it should operate equally, wherein consists the oppression? Were the whole of the revenue collected from articles of this description, the South would still have the advantage, as in the North a greater quantity is necessary to protect the inhabitants from the severity of winter. This is an advantage however afforded by situation and a milder climate, and ought to furnish no cause of complaint to those whose fortune it has been to fall in those sections of our country where such advantages are denied to them. If we seek to place revenue on articles not of general use, it becomes a contest for exemption from the burdens of Government, which ought to be common; and in so doing, instead of being just, we are seeking exemptions for ourselves, by casting the weight on others. In its present form, I cannot believe that this bill will receive the approbation of the House; for who ever heard of a nation deliberately setting about the destruction, or of even hazarding the property of its citizens, and to such a vast extent? If accomplished, will it give peace to the country? I again repeat it, that I am for a reduction to the absolute wants of the treasury; and if this bill can be so modified as to effect that object, and at the same time give as much protection to domestic manufactures as the extent of the revenue will reasonably admit, it shall receive my support—but otherwise, it cannot.

Mr. BURGESS now obtained the floor, and moved for the rising of the committee; but withdrew his motion to give opportunity to

Mr. WILDE, who explained to Mr. CAMBRELENG, at considerable extent, disclaiming all disrespect in his remarks of last Wednesday towards the State of New York, her statesmen, or political parties.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, and

Mr. VINTON followed, all explaining in reference to what had passed last evening.

Mr. BURGESS then renewed his motion, (at half past six,) which prevailed—Ayes 75, Noes 50.

So the committee rose and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26.

TARIFF AGENTS.

A resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. ARNOLD, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the names of the agents employed to collect testimony on the subject of the tariff, and the names, residence, and occupation of the witnesses whose testimony had been taken, and the compensation paid, coming up for consideration,

Mr. VERPLANCK observed that he would not oppose this resolution, though he did not see its necessity. He had made it a rule to vote for all serious calls for information, and, in following this rule, he had sometimes differed from those with whom he usually acted in the House, and sometimes doubtless voted for calls for information which the House had already. Still he thought the rule a good one, and would continue to follow it. But the language of the present resolution seemed to intimate that there was a suspicion of unfairness or partiality in the selection of agents, or some abuse in the amount or mode of compensation. It was, therefore, due to the Secretary of the Treasury to anticipate or prevent such an impression in any quarter. Now, said Mr. V., there is nothing secret or concealed in the matter, nor any thing of importance that can be learnt at the Treasury which might not be learnt from the documents already in possession of the House, and which is not in substance known to the members of at least two of our standing committees, that on Manufactures, and that of Ways and Means. Having, on behalf of the latter committee, during the last session, prepared and reported the bill which, amongst other appropriations, contained provision for the payment of these expenses, I had myself occasion to examine their character more specially than most other gentlemen. When the Secretary of the Treasury reported his project of a tariff bill last year, he sent, with his report, a copy of his circular to the agents selected to collect information under the resolution of this House. In this he had stated the allowance of compensation he proposed to give to the principal agents, leaving to them the selection of assistants, and authorizing them to make other necessary expenditures. The allowance was six dollars a day, which, at first, struck me as large; but upon consideration of the shortness of the time allowed, and the necessity of sacrificing all other business to this, the committee had agreed that it was not unreasonable. The selection of the principal agents (upon whose character and intelligence and choice of subagents in the States, the value of the whole mass of information depends) had been made upon the fairest and most honorable principles, looking to the representation of both the great opinions upon the protective system, and with utter disregard to party politics or personal patronage. Most of them were chosen on the recommendation of distinguished members of Congress of both political parties. Thus, in Massachusetts, that distinguished champion of free trade, Henry Lee, had been chosen as one of the agents. He had, however, declined. With him were then associated gentlemen of other opinions, who had served on this duty. Among these was Edward Phillips, a leading member of the late tariff commission, an opponent of this administration, and a gentleman not less known for his general talent and information than for his precise and conscientious accuracy.

The Tariff Bill.

In the State of New York, Stephen Allen, of the city, and Allen Bronson, of Oswego, both Senators of the State, were first selected. Men of higher character or more practical knowledge and talent could not be found. They had both declined, but on the pressing request of members of this House, the latter gentleman had consented to serve, so far as to select the assistants, direct their inquiries, and sum up their results; for which he has neither asked nor received compensation; and his letter containing these general results has been referred to in debate. Its ability, clearness, and good sense, can speak for themselves, without the aid of his respectable name. General Lynch, of New York, and other gentlemen connected with manufacturing interests, in political opposition to the Secretary, had also been selected for particular information, and had received some compensation for their time and travel.

In New Jersey, a former member of this House was selected as the general agent, on the recommendation of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Manufactures, (Governor Dickerson) whose zeal for those interests could not well be questioned. In the Secretary's own State, (Delaware,) he chose Mr. Gray, a zealous opponent of the administration, of which he was part.

In Pennsylvania, Mr. McLane had selected two gentlemen, distinguished by their country as the most ardent champions of the two sides on the great question, and both of them, as it happened, adversaries of this administration, Mathew Carey and Clement Biddle.

Such are the men and the principle upon which they were chosen, and the selection is certainly honorable to the fairness and liberality, as well as the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury. The names of these agents, and their various opinions, cannot but add weight to this testimony.

These agents were responsible for choice of subagents and the compensation allowed them, subject to the supervision of the treasury. There is no ground for imputing any abuse here. An appropriation of seventeen thousand dollars, to cover all these expenses, had been made. When it was made, though large, it did not appear excessive, either to the Committee of Ways and Means, or to that on Manufactures, and had been explained to the full satisfaction, both of this House and the other. But if there is any complaint on that hand, I am happy to add that this sum has been found more than was needed, some of the charges of subagents having been reduced or rejected.

With these explanations, which seem to me to be due to the character of the head of the treasury, I am quite willing that the resolution should pass.

The resolution was adopted without a division.

THE TARIFF.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole upon the tariff bill, Mr. WAYNE in the chair.

Mr. BURGESS rose, and addressed the committee in opposition to the bill.

The nation, said Mr. B., has already seen the commencement of a new system in our policy and legislation. This measure is intended as a part, if not the final part, in that system, and, if carried into operation, will form an era in our Government no less memorable than the celebrated statute of July 4, 1789. That law was the beginning of our protecting policy; the first, and not the least distinguished in a series of legislative measures, which have placed our country in a condition so prosperous. The bill now under consideration is intended for the overthrow of that great policy, and must, with its kindred measures, bring into our nation a chain of disasters and adversity.

A wise man, who has enjoyed the blessings of every season, looks back upon them and their causes, from the confines of the old, before he steps over the threshold of the new year. Let us do so; and that we may indeed "be thankful for the past," take a parting look at its benefits and their sources; and then, that we may provide for the future, let us examine what that future, under the influence of this untried measure, is likely to bring upon us.

Those men who devised and set up our present frame of Government were, many of them, called by the people to put that Government into operation. If they had forgotten all debate in convention, they could, nevertheless, plainly read in the constitution itself, that legislative power was, by the people, given to Congress for three great purposes:

- 1st. To pay the debts of the United States;
- 2d. To provide for the common defence;
- 3d. To promote the general welfare.

No specified power was granted but for these three purposes; and, to the same intent, the power to make all laws proper or necessary to the exercise of those powers, was also given.

To pay the debts of the United States, they could lay and collect direct taxes, or borrow money on the credit of the nation. For the same purpose they might lay and collect taxes indirectly, by impost, duties, and excise. They could also raise money in all these three ways, to provide for the common defence.

For the common defence, too, they could raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, organize and call out the militia, declare war and make reprisals. All other express powers were given to promote the general welfare. For this purpose was given your power of exclusive legislation in certain cases; your power of organizing the judiciary; encouraging arts and science; establishing the mail, and regulating its movements; forming rules of naturalization and bankruptcy; fixing a standard for the medium, the weight and measure of all exchange of commodities; and, finally, your power of regulating commerce, by either imposts, or duties, or excise, or limitations, or prohibitions; and that, too, by all laws necessary and proper for that purpose.

All these powers are so inseparable from the general welfare, that, although they might of right have been exercised by the several States, yet they never could have exercised them to any valuable purpose had the people not granted them to Congress. The power, therefore, to promote the general welfare seems to be the power to do for the benefit of the people whatever the States severally had a right to do, but could not, in a state of separation, perform.

One of the most essential powers ever exercised by any Government, is nowhere expressly given to Congress by the constitution, and cannot be found in it, unless it be implied in the power "to promote the general welfare." The constitution gives power to raise money for several specific purposes, and it gives the power also to promote the general welfare; but it nowhere expressly empowers you to raise money for the support of Government.

Will any man deny that the power is given to Congress to raise money for the support of Government, or, for that purpose, to make any law necessary and proper to open either or all the five great sources of revenue, provided to enable us to promote the general welfare? Can we do nothing else by impost to promote the general welfare, but raise money to pay ourselves and other public servants? Can we in no other way employ impost, or regulate commerce, by laws necessary and proper to promote that welfare? Can we not, by those powers granted to Congress, and prohibited to the States, promote that welfare in all those ways in which independent nations may, or the several States could of right, promote the general welfare of their own people? Whatever each one of the several States could of right have done to promote the welfare of the people of such State, by the exercise of the power now granted to us, and prohibited to it by those people, we can now of right do, and are bound to do, for the same purpose.

If each State severally could, by the regulation of finance and of commerce, so regulate its foreign intercourse as to encourage and protect its own domestic industry, then, because the people of each and all these States have divested them of the exercise of those powers, and given them and that exercise to us, we can exercise the same powers, and are bound to exercise them for the same great purpose.

No State could, of right, before the constitution, hinder any other State in the exercise of these powers, in this manner, and for this purpose; and, therefore, no State can of right, since the constitution, hinder Congress in the exercise of the same powers, in the same manner, and for the same purposes. If, at the establishment of the constitution, no State had any interest requiring such hindrance, then this exercise of this power, in this manner, and for this purpose, was at that time necessary to promote the welfare of all.

If, therefore, any State now pretend to have any interest requiring any such hindrance, that State must show that they in fact have such interest; and that, under the constitution, they have a right to create and establish the same. For it may well be doubted whether any State can in fact have, or can have any right to have and hold, any interest under the constitution inconsistent with the general welfare. Would not such an interest be a common nuisance, and liable to public abatement? The slave trade, carried on between foreign nations by citizens of the United States, in American ships, with American capital, was a great and lucrative interest. It existed before the constitution, and no power is expressly given by that constitution to interrupt that interest. By what power has that trade been prohibited? that lucrative interest abolished? That trade was adjudged, by the statesmen of our country, to be inconsistent with the general welfare; and the whole concern was, therefore, abated and removed as a great public nuisance.

Sir, you can raise money for the support of Government, because, and only because, that Government promotes the general welfare. How then can that Government be called upon to promote or to preserve any interest inconsistent with that welfare? or how can you provide for the support of that Government, when, to promote that interest, it sacrifices that welfare?

At the establishment of this Government, there was no interest in any State inconsistent with the general welfare; for Congress, at that time, exercised the power to regulate commerce by imposts, and did so regulate commerce: first, to raise a revenue for the support of Government; and, second, to countervail the laws of foreign countries, and encourage and protect the labor and capital of the whole American people.

The great law of July 4, 1789, in its preamble, designates the encouragement and protection of manufactures only, because they were then behind other branches of production in growth, and more especially required the cherishing influence of a Government established "to promote the general welfare;" but this law, in its various provisions, reached and encouraged the products of land, capital, and labor, in each great department of industry in every State of the Union. At that time, Congress announced to the nation, that impost placed on imported commodities, as a tax to raise money for the support of Government, was a constitutional exercise of their powers; and impost placed on like commodities, as a regulation of commerce, to encourage and protect manufactures, was equally constitutional, because equally necessary "to promote the general welfare." When this was done, every great branch of production, except sugar, now in the United States, had already been commenced, but not a voice in the nation called in question the principle of that law, or intimated that a solitary interest existed, or could exist, in the whole country, which might ever be injuriously affected by the use of it in its fullest extension. What new interest, since that time, has come into existence in these United States? Not tobacco, for that had long been cultivated in the country; was then in Virginia, and was not only a great product for export, but, in some sort, a currency by which to exchange other commodities. Is it rice? Certainly not; for rice was, before the revolution, the great staple of South Carolina agriculture. Cotton, too, was then in existence in that State, but in the most helpless infancy of that existence. It stretched out its feeble arms towards the nation; and, without power to speak for itself, the whole delegation of South Carolina called on Congress to encourage its incipient growth. This was done; and cotton was encouraged by a more efficient rate of impost than was given to the encouragement of any other agricultural product in the country; for, in 1791, the export of it amounted to 189,316 pounds. In 1816, when this production had increased in magnitude, when the exportation had reached 81,747,116 pounds, another call was made on Congress for encouragement; and then, for the first time, impost was used by this and the other House to create a prohibition; and that prohibition was created and set up to favor this then flourishing interest. Impost, rising from 75 to 100 per cent. placed on East India cotton cloth, excluded nearly 30,000,000 pounds of cotton in that form from the market of our country, and secured to a like amount that market to the domestic cotton, then grown principally in South Carolina. The cotton-growing interest was, therefore, one of the national interests in 1789; and the encouragement or protection of it, both then and in 1816, and of all other interests comprehended in the general welfare, was neither inconsistent with the constitution, nor adverse to that or any other great interest of the South.

No, sir, the cotton-growing interest of the South, in its youthful progress, received the cherishing encouragement of Congress as an affectionate child receives the care and kindness of a parent, with a gratitude warm and apparently sincere. Why, then, is the nation, like the good old Lear, "whose frank heart gave all," now left by that South to feel "how much sharper than a serpent's tooth is filial ingratitude?" That interest has grown to a sturdy manhood, has reached the age of independence; and, like those savages who destroy the parent to relieve the child from the burden of his support, now wages a most unnatural war with the nation, because no longer in want of encouragement and protection.

Was the manufacture of cotton an interest unknown to Congress in 1789? No, sir, it was coeval in its commencement here with the growth of that plant itself. The papers read by one of the Ways and Means Committee date the commencement of that manufacture in 1799; but this mistake of eleven years in the age of this great and absorbing interest of our country is but one among volumes of error collected and reported in those papers. An event in my life, never to be forgotten by me, brought me to a knowledge of the origin of this interest, which enables me to correct this error. Permit me to speak as a witness concerning the commencement of a manufacture now not less important to the consumption than the production of our country.

In the spring of 1791 I turned my back on the summer delights of the plough and the sickle, and on the winter amusements of the cooper's adze and driver; and, in the April of that spring, I left the scene of the sports and labors of twenty-one years for the school of the Rev. Dr. Williams, for the purpose of collecting some knowledge of those languages, by the mere scraps and fragments of which, scattered in this hall the other evening, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILKINSON] so instructed this committee. My first day's travel brought me at evening to Shephard's tavern, in the town of Wrentham. At this place I found a cotton mill of a few spindles then in full operation. This miniature of what has since appeared in our country was a little slip planted here the preceding summer, but taken from the parent stock, which had been planted two years before at Pawtucket falls, in the State of Rhode Island. The next year, passing on the road from the school of Dr. Williams to Providence, I went through Pawtucket, and there, for the first time, saw the first cotton mill ever set up in the United States. This had, as I understood, been in operation more than three years. It is, therefore, known to me, that the editor of these papers has, from carelessness or design, mistaken the age of the cotton manufacture in our country, at least ten if not eleven years.

Let no man, deceived by these papers, pretend that this great interest did not commence in the United States until ten years after the commencement of our system of encouragement and protection. It was in existence before the meeting of the first Congress, and if the law of July 4, 1789, embraced in its provisions every interest then in the country, this interest is eminently entitled to all their benefits.

What effects have been produced by this system of encouraging and protecting policy, which were not intended to be produced by its operation? It was intended, 1st, to encourage, and thereby increase, the amount of domestic production. To effect this encouragement, by impost placed on imported commodities, the price of such commodities must be raised in the domestic market by a sum either equal to such impost, or to some smaller amount. The imported commodity, with this increased price brought into the market, encouraged the home producer to labor for the supply of that market, in the hope of receiving a price equally increased for his own product.

Did not impost produce that effect under the law of 1789? Cotton was then imported into the United States from Surinam; and was sold at not less than two shillings New England currency, equal to thirty-three and a third cents a pound. Impost, at the rate of three cents a pound, was, by that law, placed on imported cotton. Such cotton immediately rose in the market three cents, equal to nine per cent. on its value in the domestic, and about twelve per cent. ad valorem on the price in the foreign market. A duty of six cents a pound was, by impost, placed on manufactured tobacco; of ten cents a pound on snuff. Did not these duties raise the price of these commodities, and so encourage home production to hasten into the market and obtain these increased prices? This increased price was intended to be the effect, and has been the effect of all laws made for the encouragement of domestic industry. How else could such laws give such encouragement? Such encouragement has been the effect, and will be the effect of all impost on imported commodities, so long as imported commodities are so abundant in your market as to regulate the price of such commodities, whether foreign or domestic. If the importer set the price, and can command that price, he will charge whatever his imported commodity has cost abroad, with the cost of importation added, and the duty in addition to the whole. If the domestic producer place a commodity equally good in the market by the side of the foreign, he will get the same price; and the whole duty will be so much encouragement to his labor and capital, in supplying the market.

Impost was intended to operate as encouragement, and in this manner upon domestic production, until, by its long continuance and increased amount, such production had, by its increased amount, obtained the control of the domestic market. Then impost, which had, by raising price, operated as encouragement, begins to produce competition among domestic producers, and to operate as protection operates. This competition reduces price; and if impost be raised and sustained at the point of perfect protection, giving and securing the whole domestic market to the domestic producers, competition will have its perfect effect, and reduce price to its lowest rate.

Has not this effect of impost, placed on imported commodities, been produced? Was it not expected, and intended to be produced, when the law of July 4, 1789, went into operation?

Machinery was then imperfect; competition, not only in the United States, but in Europe, and between this country and Europe, has perfected all the old patterns, and invented and finished many new ones. The powers of invention, set to work by competition, produced the cotton-gin, and more than doubled the productive powers of labor in raising and sending that staple to market. Our abundant and cheap lands render this principle less efficient in other parts of agriculture; but in this country, Wood's cast iron plough, and in England the scarifier, the drill, and the threshing machine, have greatly abridged labor, and cheapened production.

The great improvements of the age have, under the influence of this competition, been made in machinery, put in motion by water or by steam, to facilitate manufacturing, transportation, and travelling. Every effort in these improvements seems to have had but one object, and that the diminution of cost, in every possible manner, by the diminished use of labor and capital in every production. Your attention, sir, will not be called by me, at this time, to any of the wonders effected by competition in any of the facilities given to travelling or transportation. Permit me for a moment to illustrate the effects of competition on the production of fabrics manufactured from cotton.

At the commencement of our great system of policy, for encouragement and protection, the cotton was, at a cost of six or seven cents a pound, picked and prepared for the card, entirely by the labor of the hand. This labor, if now expended on the eighty million pounds of cotton wrought into cloth in the United States, would cost not less than five millions of dollars. To save this cost, a cotton picker has been invented. This performs the work at so little expense, that it does not equal what was formerly paid for carrying out the cotton to be picked by hand, and bringing it back when the work was done.

Cloth was, at first, woven in the hand loom, and six cents a yard paid for the plainest and coarsest fabrics. The power loom was invented; and such cloths now cost a smaller number of mills for the weaving than the number of cents once paid for that work.

Twenty years ago cloths were bleached in this country by the sides of rivers, in fields, by the application of water and sunshine. This operation cost one-half the price of weaving. Bleaching is now a chemical process, and the whole expense of it very inconsiderable.

The same principle of competition has been applied to the production of machinery itself, though its operation here has effected a less saving of cost in this than in the fabrics produced by it; yet those who commence manufacturing now do realize from this cause a wonderful advantage over those who began ten years ago. At that time, one million spindles, with their accompanying preparation, would have cost eighteen millions of dollars. That number of spindles, and that quantity of preparation, may now be had for perhaps less than fourteen millions.

This competition, in this race of labor, which seems to be the very spirit of our age, has set every power of human invention at full work to apply all physical agents in aid of the human hand. Streams which, at the commencement of our system, were either idle and babbling brooks, or wild, ungovernable torrents, are brought up to labor, or broken into the work, and move forward in the service like powerful animals trained to the harness, and obedient to the voice of the driver. They require no forage to keep them in working condition; and when you have been at the expense of keeping their gear in repair, you have saved all other cost of their employment. What has produced the skill, the perfected art, in every department of manufacturing production, so much superior and so much less expensive than any thing known, either in this country or Europe, when our system of encouragement and protection was begun by the law of 1789? Sir, all these wonders have been effected by competition; by competition put in operation by that system in this country, and by a like system, first of all in England, and afterwards adopted in France. Such has been the astonishing effect of this principle on skill, labor, physical agents, machinery, and capital, in this and in other countries, that commodities which we now export and import at a cost of seventy-five millions of dollars, would, in 1789, have cost two hundred and fifty millions of dollars if the labor of the world could then have supplied them for human consumption.

Sir, who complains of this diminished cost of production in those necessities of life, which enables the laborer to feed as well, and to dress better than any peer of the realm at any time during the wars of the white and red rose in England? Not the poor man. No, sir; but poor men make no complaint; nor middling interest men; nor any of all those freemen who do the work, and fight the wars of the world. Neither, sir, does involuntary labor complain, as I presume; for that labor may have some interest in the cheapness of some commodities. Who, then, does complain? Who wages war against our great system of encouragement and protection because it gives, and gives abundantly, and gives cheaply, food, and clothing, and shelter to the labor as well as to the wealth and the leisure of our country? The owner of the slave complains, because—ay, sir, because of what? Because of the diminished price, not of clothing, not of bread, not of provisions, not of sugar, not of iron, but of cotton. Sir, this is the great, the continuing, the increasing injury wrought by our policy of encouragement and protection upon the owners of slaves. It awakens universal competition, and crowds the markets of our country with all kinds of commodities at the smallest rate of cost, at the most diminished amount of price. Cotton, the product of their peculiar capital, has felt the effects of competition, and, with every other product in the trading world, has been reduced in market price. Shall this system, for this cause, be destroyed? It was established to enable our country to supply its wants at the cheapest rate with the most abundant quantity of all those commodities which labor, and skill, and capital can produce. The system has hitherto performed this great work, and the accusations of its enemies are so many demonstrations that the hopes of its friends have not been disappointed in its operations.

It was intended, I grant, by the encouragement and protection of manufacturing production, if not to augment the price, yet mightily to extend the market for agricultural production. Has the system failed, or disappointed any of our hopes in this? Is not the agricultural market of our country extended, and extended too by the calls made in that market for its products by encouraged and protected manufacturing labor and capital?

Does not the manufacturing East make in this market a very efficient demand for the agricultural as well as mineral products of almost every State in the Union? Does not the manufacturing labor, in working the capital of that region, call efficiently on Virginia for tobacco and flour; on North Carolina for lumber and corn; on South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi for cotton and rice; on Louisiana for sugar; on Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana for beef, pork, hams, lard; on Illinois and Missouri for lead; on Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York for wool; on Tennessee, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania for iron? Look into every State wherever manufacturing labor is permitted to set a foot, or to erect a workshop, and the operations of these establishments immediately create in that place a new and efficient demand for the products of the fields, the mines, the forests, and the fisheries of our country.

This manufacturing labor brings into this market, in exchange for all these products of all our other labor, all its own various fabrics, cheapened by their reduced cost and abundant quantity, under the ceaseless operation of that spirit of competition first created and now kept alive in our country by our great policy of encouragement and protection.

Sir, is there no benefit peculiar to our country found in a market at our own door, so supplied with domestic manufactured fabrics, and thus offered in exchange for the products of the land, and labor of our country in all our other employments? It was not forgotten in 1789, when we began our system of encouragement and protection, that our country was distant three thousand miles from the looms and workshops of all Europe. Our supply of manufactured fabrics, if brought over such a distance, must of necessity be charged with all the cost expended in the several voyages made for that purpose. It was believed by statesmen of that homely period of our history that if we travelled three thousand miles to purchase our shoes and stockings, many of us would, for want of the wherewithal, be compelled to go barefooted. Should our country carry abroad to Europe raw hides, wool, iron, and cotton, to be manufactured for our consumption, we must ourselves pay the expense of this exportation. Freight, charges, and insurance against the perils of the seas would only be equal to fifteen per cent.

The Tariff Bill.

If we export other raw materials, or breadstuffs and provisions, to pay the labor of Europe for this manufacture, these would come to the consumption of that labor at a cost augmented by a like amount of freight, charges, and insurance. If labor be one-third part in the cost of manufactured products, then one-third part of this augmented cost would fall on their products manufactured for us: this would add five per cent. more to their cost. The cost of importations, at least fifteen per cent. more, must be added to the whole amount; and thus, at all times, in the most peaceable condition of the world, and when trade was perfectly free with all nations, the whole consumption of our country in foreign manufactured fabrics must, by our distance from Europe, forever have been encumbered with thirty-five per cent. charged on the whole amount, for the cost, charges, and perils of transportation. To this must also be added the war perils of this transportation. There has not been more than one year of peace in every two years since the establishment of this Government. During three years of the time, our own country was engaged in war, and, in every other year, such was the character of belligerent controversy among the nations of Europe, that our commerce on the ocean was, while war existed between them, exposed to almost every kind and degree of belligerent peril. A premium covering the perils of war between the United States and any part of Europe is not less than fifteen per cent.; and if we admit war to have existed but one-third of the time since 1789, the insurance against all its risks on all our exports, and all our imports, would be at least five per cent. This adds ten per cent. more to the cost of manufactures, paid for by exported raw materials, and imported for our consumption.

It is, therefore, manifest that our distance only from Europe must, in the ordinary condition of nations, and in a state of perfectly free trade, charge not less than forty per cent. on our whole imported consumption of manufactured fabrics. To preserve our country from a cost so onerous to our future consumption, was one great purpose of our system of encouragement and protection. No policy, either free or friendly, established by other nations in relation to the United States, could ever relieve us from this burden. It was the glorious allotment of those who first put this Government in motion, to devise a great scheme of policy, which, in its progress, should feed, and clothe, and shelter, and accommodate every man, woman, and child in the nation by our own labor, and the use of those agents of production placed by the Creator within the limits of our own country, and in the reach of our own hands.

This system relieved our consumption from that burden of expenditure, and it moreover opened a market, and provided a full supply of those fabrics in our own country, and thereby secured to our agriculture the perpetual power of exchanging its own products for those fabrics. By the removal of this great emporium of exchange from Europe to the United States, it is placed without the jurisdiction of all the laws, and restrictions, and prohibitions of the Old World; and agricultural and manufacturing labor may now meet in this great mart of our country, and exchange their products without permission from the English Board of Trade, and without a repeal of one provision in the corn laws of England.

This was one great purpose in the establishment of our system of policy. It was foreseen, in 1789, that the time would come when not only our provisions and the products of our forests and fisheries would be excluded from England and France, but that our corn, rye, wheat, and flour, then received, must also, in time, suffer a like exclusion. It was the object of our system to provide a market for these great staples of our country, whenever the policy of Europe should exclude them from the markets of those countries. The wisdom of that provision can be equalled by nothing but by that folly which shall now destroy it.

It was likewise foreseen that, without such a market, it would not be possible to preserve that independence which had then so lately been achieved. The staff of bread is the staff of power; and any nation which can defend her own fields, can control every nation which must be fed from them. What has been the fate of those nations which, without lands to supply their people with food, have striven for wealth and power by commerce alone? Ancient Tyre, Carthage, Venice, and Genoa, have given lessons to the world on this question; and by English statesmen those lessons have been deeply studied; and they have carried the learning derived from those lessons into the policy and legislation of their own country. Although that nation controls the ocean, and might, by her fleets, safely convoy her corn from Hindostan or New Holland, yet never will she make it a part of her policy to draw her bread from any fields beyond the shores of her own glorious island. When population presses hard on subsistence, she will send out citizens to other nations, colonies to other countries. It is her policy to export men; but it is not, and never will be, her policy to import corn.

In the early stages of society, independence for bread is more indispensable than independence for clothing: for man, in a savage state, may subsist, unsheltered and unclothed, but he cannot continue life without food. Advanced in civilization as we are, and with so many corporeal wants other than that of food, what independence, in political power, could this nation retain while dependent on other nations for those clothes which are wrought into the every day garments of the people? Would those nations hold no influence in making our laws? no power in the management of our elections? If England held in her hand our hats, now so needful to the very forms of legislation in this hall, and our other garments, not only in name, but in fact, indispensables, would not the American people have some cause to doubt the independence of our enactments, thus made by us bareheaded and sans culottes? Sir, next to that dependence, felt by the nation when fed on the feeding nation, must ever be that dependence, which the American people would have felt, on the power and legislation of England, had that people drawn our whole needful wearing apparel from the labor and the looms of that island.

We have been told by the South, in voluminous discourse on this floor, that such a mutual intercourse would produce the most amiable and christian relations and feelings between the two nations. How may this be done? The people of England will never cross the Atlantic to look for their bread in any ovens here in these United States. If then we were wise enough to cross the same ocean, and walk into their workshops to look for our clothing, how should we succeed, when we have nothing but bread to offer them in exchange? Nay, it has been often insisted upon, both here and elsewhere in our country, that our policy is intended to produce a spirit of independence, unsocial in its nature, and hostile to the power of both nations. Mutual dependence would, as we are told, unite the two people by a golden chain of commerce. Sir, I would not unite the American people, by any tie of dependence, to any other nation on earth; nor, for all the countless millions of commercial wealth, would I, by even a golden chain, bind this youthful and vigorous nation to the foot of the British throne. The very birds of the air would teach us a lesson of more wisdom:

"Would the young goldfinch quit his native briar,
"For the bright cage o'er-arch'd with golden wire?"

It was one of the great purposes of our system of encouraging and protecting policy, to relieve the American people from a dependence on foreign nations still more degrading. Those nations generally impose a duty on raw materials imported from foreign countries. In 1789, by the English tariff, the impost duty on iron in bars was thirty-eight dollars per ton, on wool thirty-three, and on cotton twelve per cent. Had not our Government established a system of encouraging the manufacture of such materials in the United States, they would have been exported; and, after paying these duties into the English treasury, they would, with that payment charged upon them, have been wrought into fabrics, imported into this country, and we, after reimbursing this English tax, must have quietly worn these English cottons and woollens, and used this English hardware and cutlery. From the payment of this degrading tax, in support of the British Government, the framers of our system of national policy intended to relieve the American people.

The enemies of that policy would now repeal our great system of encouragement and protection, and thereby increase and perpetuate that tax. They would destroy manufacturing labor, skill, and machinery in this country, and compel the growers of wool and the makers of iron, as the producers of cotton in the United States now do, to send their raw material to England for fabrication into woollens and hardware, that we may feel our dependence on that nation in winter no less than in summer, in the North as well as in the South, when we plough our fields, or when we sit at our tables and carve and cut up our food. Let those people, the degenerate descendants of patriotic and independent parents, yes, let them, to obtain British fabrics, submit to the payment of a British tax on their own cotton. Let the wealthy planter feel the comfort of such a garment with such a mark upon it. No one would take from him the luxury of this indulgence. Southern beauty and fashion may adorn themselves in the lawn of foreign looms, wrought from the snowy fleece of their own sea islands. If they can forget their mothers, who, like Roman matrons, would have melted down their own jewels, the ornaments of their youth and beauty, to defend the independence of their country; if they do not now seem to behold those mothers looking on them from the realms of their blessedness with the eye of affectionate rebuke, why, sir, then may the patriotism of these days, so much less devoted and unyielding, well look on them without a sigh of regret.

Our great policy of independence will indeed relieve us from this degrading burden of English taxation, if we do not suffer the enemies of our system and the friends of the English system to prevail; and because we have, under our own system, completed the payments of our own debts, now abolish it, and adopt the English system, that under it we may be compelled to aid for centuries in paying the debts of England.

In the establishment of our system of encouragement and protection, in 1789, it was known that such a system would, in the progress of its operation, call into employment all the labor of our country. Men labor in any vocation, to supply their own wants; and they will not continue their labor beyond that original purpose, unless they can exchange the surplus of their production for that of some other man which they could not produce themselves. The markets of the world are supplied by these surpluses, and it is the certainty of exchanging them that ensures their production. This principle originates all trades, and parcels out all the labor of a nation into all kinds of employments. If all cultivate the land, there will be abundance of food. Who would raise corn or make shoes to sell, where every body raises his own corn or makes his own shoes? It is only by the encouragement of all trades that all trades can live; and by the furnishing of all employments alone, that all the labor of the nation can be employed.

The same principle which gives employment to all the labor of a country, by separating that labor into all the various trades by which the various wants of a nation may be supplied, will encourage that labor to acquire the greatest attainable degree of skill.

Our system not only gives employment to the greatest quantity of labor, and produces the greatest degree of skill in every branch of production, but does, moreover, call into use all the great agents of production bestowed on man by the Creator for his benefit and accommodation. These agents are the earth, the water, wind, and steam. Fertility is the great principle of production peculiar to the earth. This principle is called into use by a demand for food, and is more and more varied in its operations, and perhaps increased in its powers, as that demand grows more and more urgent by increased population. Men employed in mechanic, manufacturing, or commercial labors, collect into hamlets, villages, towns, and cities. The lands surrounding these congregations of people are cultivated to supply them, first, with bread, then meat, then vegetables, then fruits and fuel. This gives to the face of the country cornfields, meadows, pastures, gardens, orchards, groves, and forests. The fruits of the earth, consumed on the land which produced them, or in its neighborhood, encourage, nay, increase, its original fertility. The sweepings of the city enrich the fields around it; and even the smoke of its fires, rising into the circumbient air, mingles with descending dews and showers, and gives a more vigorous growth and a deeper verdure to the grass of surrounding meadows.

Besides, this various production calls into use the various powers of fertility. Instead of exhausting the earth by one continued repetition of the same crop, a change from one to another gives rest and refreshment to the soil, and skilful rotations not only preserve, but increase original fertility.

Compare the face of such a country with that of one devoted to the production of cotton and tobacco, grown for sale in the markets of distant nations. You will see naked, sun-burnt, sterile old fields which died under the scourge of these productions, and are now thrown out in barrenness and desolation; but where is the orchard, the garden, the meadow, the pasture, the sheltering grove? You may find the waterfall, but without the hamlet of white houses on its banks. Nowhere can you see the village spire, and from no hill does your ear catch the sounds of the distant city, the echoing hammers in the hundred hands of her labor, or the roar of their thousand wheels.

Nor is fertility alone, of all natural agents, pressed into our service under our system of encouragement. The wind, as a stationary power, is but little used in our country, so abundant in waterfalls. The wind is, nevertheless, rendered more useful by our labor than merely to blow "round upon this pendent earth," purify the air, and refresh the animal and vegetable world. The sails of our navigation are filled with its powerful volume; and our commerce, both coastwise and foreign, is thus transmitted on the wings of the wind, from port to port in our own, and from region to region in almost all other countries.

A system was once proposed to our nation, by which all our labor might be recalled from the ocean, and, by cutting off one great branch of employment, leave the total transportation of all our products to the skill and fidelity of foreigners. Our nation was either not wise enough, or too wise, to adopt this policy; but chose to continue her own factor in the little and the great marts of the world.

Sir, there may be those who regard rivers as so many conduits contrived to carry back to the ocean the waters raised by evaporation, and sent down in dews and showers to refresh the earth. By our great system, the weight of these waters has been collected, and turned in their fall upon the wheels of machinery; and in this manner millions of instruments, made to facilitate the operations of our labor, have been put in motion. Where waterfalls cannot be found, or could not be applied, steam is generated and brought into employment, with like powers, and for the same and other purposes.

These powers applied to machinery do, in effect, multiply the human race, and give to us now the benefit of the labor of millions not now, and who never will, be in existence. They multiply the power of the human hand, some twenty, some fifty, and some a hundred fold. Every one person laboring with the aid of these machines is equal to fifty persons working with the hands only; every one hundred to five thousand; and every one hundred thousand to five millions. Who would not cherish a system which calls into service powers so abundant, but so useless without this system? In the little State of Rhode Island, with no stream forty miles in length, the water power is believed to be equal to that of 17,000 horses. The water power of the seven States south of the Potomac probably equals the whole animal power of all the horses on earth; and, if harnessed to well constructed machinery, would, in the hands of skilful mechanics, perform more work than could be done by three hundred millions of people.

Sir, it was to employ all our labor, elicit all our skill, perfect all our machinery, and bring into use every agent of production, the power of the earth, the water, of wind, and of steam, that our great system was begun, and has been carried on towards perfection. Must we, who have already harnessed and broke these rude agents of nature into the work, must we turn them loose again, in all their wildness, because men in other parts of the country choose to stand idle on the banks of their native streams, and refuse to start these their powerful teams in the course of labor and competition with us? God forbid that industry should be controlled in her labors by indolence; or that this nation should unyoke these our gigantic powers of production, and naked-handed enter into competition with the laborers of the world, aided, as they are, by every agent of nature, instructed by every process of science, and made skilful by every improvement of art.

Sir, in this age of the world, the wealth of nations depends on their labor. There was a time, nay, for many ages, plunder was the great resource of nations. The first kingdom established on earth was sustained by the conquest and pillage of many nations; and "great Babylon, the glory of the Chaldean empire," was built and adorned by the spoils of all Asia. The exorbitant wealth of one nation, thus obtained, gave an example to the world, and awakened the ambition, and sharpened the avarice of others; until the Assyrian was conquered and plundered by the Persian, the Persian by the Macedonian, and he, at last, devoured by the Roman power. The wolf which nursed their founder seems to have given a hunger for prey, insatiable, to the whole nation. Perhaps there was not a house, nor a temple, between the Atlantic and the Euphrates, which was not plundered by some one of that nation of marauders.

Sir, the tide of ages, century after century, had rolled over the last fragment of Roman power; the light of science dawned on the world, and a knowledge of letters was disseminated by the press, before men seemed to believe that our Creator had, in fact, announced to the first of our race, that "by the sweat of his face man should eat his bread all the days of his life." It may be difficult to enumerate all the different causes which changed the character of the nations of Europe. No one cause has done so much in changing that character from war and plunder, as that pure, meek, and quiet philosophy, which has taught all men to "do unto others as they would that others should do unto them." Rebuked by this divine precept, men have sheathed the sword, and put their hand to the plough; they have mined the earth, and not for the instruments of war, but for the machines of labor. If, now, war break out, it is not for plunder; cities are not given up to pillage; captives are not sold for slaves; territories do not change owners; men return again with eagerness to the habits of peace, and do not look to the labors of the camp, but to those of the plough, the loom, and the sail, for emolument and wealth. No vestige of ancient war among independent christian nations now remains, unless it be in those fragments of slavery, which, perhaps, neither sound policy, nor justice, nor piety itself, can tear away from the texture of that society where they are found. If labor, therefore, and not the sword, be the great staff on which nations lean for support and for wealth, then should it be their great policy to call their whole labor into employment, improve its skill to the utmost point of perfection, aid that skill by every kind of machinery which may save the consumption of labor, and support the operations of that machinery by the power of all those agents placed within our reach by Him who has committed the destiny of every people on earth to their own keeping.

Wealth is power; and the defence of every nation depends on its wealth. The wealth of a nation is, its labor, its skill, its machinery, its abundant control of all the great agents of nature employed in production. A great store of goods, laid up for many years, was the wealth of a fool; but such a store is the poverty of a nation. A great annual consumption alone can ensure a great and augmented annual reproduction. The labor of a nation can no otherwise be sustained than by a consumption of its products. The products of human labor, in food and clothing, like the fruits of the earth, are annual; and God, in his wisdom, has adjusted human wants to its powers of production. Like the bread from heaven, that the Giver might not be forgotten, the dew of every night produced the crop, and the labors of every day gathered in the harvest.

What but a mighty phalanx of labor, an almost boundless power of consumption and reproduction, has defended, and now sustains England in all the athletic vigor of the most glorious days of that extraordinary nation? Men who speculate on the duration of nations seem to assign to them the several periods of human life—youth, manhood, old age, final dissolution. They draw their conclusions from the nations of antiquity, and apply them to those of modern times. They forget that those ancient nations were like beasts of prey, which find an enemy in every living thing, and must be, sooner or later, circumvented by stratagem, or overpowered and destroyed by force. Producing nothing by their own labor, and consuming all which, by violence, they could plunder from the labors of others, their whole existence was a burden to the human race, and they were finally destroyed, as a common nuisance to mankind. Not so with England: she is a glorious example of the self-subsisting, the all-producing, and all-defending powers of labor. With a valor purely Spartan, she builds no wall against the wars of the world. Her little island, accessible at a thousand points, and often within gunshot of the embattled fleets of her enemies, has not, for more than seven hundred years, been stepped upon by a hostile foot. What has enabled her to do this? Her untiring labor; her unrivalled skill; her unequalled machinery; her exhaustless capital, and unbounded control over all the agents of production. Her goods, wares, and merchandises are in all the markets of the world; and wherever she wants a tongue to speak to her cause, or a sword to be drawn in her quarrel, if such things can be found in those markets, she can command them.

This manufacturing nation did, in the last war of Europe, exhibit a spectacle never before seen by the world. She stood alone against the embattled continent; and, at last, with her own spindle and distaff, demolished a despotism, an iron pyramid of power, built on a base of all Europe.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

Sir, can such a nation ever grow old, and cease "to be mighty in power?" Can any other nation escape the influence of that power, and stand independent of its controlling arm? No; unless, by a countervailing system of policy, that other nation, like the first Congress of the United States, call into employment all its own labor; perfect the skill of that labor; and place in its hands all the aids of the artificial and physical agents of production.

What then was our great countervailing system, founded by that Congress, on the law of 1789, and, since that time, built up, and carried on towards a perfect structure, by so many other laws, made for the encouragement and protection of our own labor, and so many enactments in every branch of legislation, designed to promote the general welfare, under the great policy of that system?

Sir, that system, which though it shall exist nowhere else, will live in history; that system was a great scheme of burdens and benefits; Government, supported by burdens imposed on the labors of the people, and the people, in return, benefited by the labors of Government.

If, henceforth, the Government cease from such labors, and the future bring nothing worthy of national gratitude, indulge me, I pray of you, sir, while I recount a few of those labors; for "we cannot but remember that such things were, and were most precious to us."

If the system was one which, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRIDGE] says, no statesman would have adopted, he should remember that Hamilton, and Ellsworth, and Madison had not the benefit of his counsel. For though in case in 1789, he was thought much less of then, if possible, than at this time.

In 1789, all the young interests of our country were in their infancy; and the Government, like a most kind parent, took them by the hand, and cherished them with care and solicitude. From that day up to July 14, 1832, when the last law regulating duties upon imported merchandise was approved, the records of congressional labors are covered with statutes made for either the direct or incidental encouragement and protection of all these interests. On this great question, the Executive recommendations to Congress are full of demonstration; the votes of the Senate are full; the votes of this House are full; and the debates in both Houses are full, and abundantly show the extent, the confirmation, and, until within a few years, the universality of this great system of policy. You have extended the principle of encouragement and protection to your manufactures, your agriculture, your fisheries, your navigation, your commerce, as well foreign as among the States and with the Indian tribes; and you have made the regulations of coin and currency, the national defence, both by sea and on the land, the disposition of the public domain, the payment of the national debt, parts of this great system of encouraging, and protecting, and employing the whole labor and skill of this nation, and bringing into their use all those agents of production which nature may have bestowed or art might devise to facilitate the efforts of that labor in all parts of the country.

The encouragement to manufacturing and mechanic labor has been so persevering and efficient, that, in several departments of production, the labor and skill of our own country do abundantly supply the domestic market; and in these departments that labor and skill are effectively protected. Among these may be found shipbuilding, the manufacture of cut nails and spikes, of carriages and parts of carriages, of glass and glassware, of jewelry and plated ware, cabinet furniture, saddlery, shoes, boots, and hats. The manufacture of cotton and woollen cloths, of iron, hardware, and cutlery, has been greatly encouraged, and has increased with astonishing rapidity, and to a vast amount, whether we regard the capital invested, the labor employed, or the amount of production brought into the market. In years of fair importation, if the domestic consumption of woollens be seventy millions, the domestic production supplies more than nine-tenths part of it. If the cotton consumption be sixty-three millions, the domestic production supplies eight out of nine parts of the whole. It may be difficult to ascertain, so as to state with exactness, what parts of the whole iron and steel, consumed in the United States, are produced and placed in our market by domestic labor; but we know that the iron, in 1830, amounted to nearly $14,000,000. A few more years, under our great system, with its principle fully sustained by our legislation, will render the American people, both in peace and war, independent of foreign nations for every other necessary fabric, as they now are for ships to transport their commerce, or to defend that commerce on the highway of nations.

The effects of our great system of encouraging and protecting policy on the manufacturing industry of our country, may be seen by examining the reports made by various committees appointed by a convention of the friends of that industry, assembled at New York on the 21st of October, 1831. These reports refer to the year 1830, and are, in their fidelity and detail, equalled by nothing of this kind in our country. In these reports, perfect accuracy cannot be attained; but all who examine them will find an approximation to that point sufficiently near for all the fair purposes of debate, and all the aids of honest legislation.

The amount of fixed capital employed for manufacturing cotton in the United States was, in 1830, equal to	$44,014,924
The circulating capital equal to	14,712,000

Being equal to three-fifths of the amount of the expenditure annually made for raw materials and wages, which is equal to $24,522,000, and making the total capital,	$58,726,924
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	--------------

The total product, in that year, was	32,036,760
The expenditure for wages was equal to	12,155,723

The amount paid for raw materials,	12,366,277
------------------------------------	------------

Deterioration and repairs of fixtures, say one-half of fixed capital, at five per cent. per annum, is equal to	1,100,000
----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-----------

The annual deterioration and repairs of the other half, being the machinery, at ten per cent. is equal to	2,200,000
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-----------

Total expenditure,	27,822,000

This balance, if no other charge be made on the annual production of this manufacture, is equal to seven per cent. and a small fraction.

It should not be forgotten that this whole statement refers to the year 1830, a year of light importation, not much over seventy millions in all commodities: of cottons, not exceeding seven and a half millions, with an export of those fabrics equal to $1,500,000; and of domestic cottons equal to 1,300,000 dollars. In this uncrowded market, profit rose to seven per cent. What must it have been in 1831, when over 103,000,000 dollars, in all commodities, were imported, and of that amount upwards of 16 millions were cottons? Price and profits in our cotton productions, like all others, depend on demand and supply. In this year, nine millions over the supply of the preceding year were thrown into the market, and must have been grievously felt by that arm of our industry in our country.

I have made no account here of the effects on manufacturers produced by the advancement of skill and the perfecting of instruments in the manufacture of machinery itself. It is admitted that this progress has, in the last ten years, reduced the cost of machinery fifty per cent. Here is a loss of five per cent. per annum on one-half of the fixed capital invested in the cotton production throughout the United States. If Southern planters now commence this manufacture, they will find that the 1,246,503 spindles which, with their preparation, have cost the North twenty-one millions of dollars, would, at this time, cost them not more than fourteen millions.

It is seen that the amount of wages paid by the manufacturers of cotton equals $12,155,723; and that this amount is annually distributed among one hundred and thirty-five thousand people, men, women, and children, being about $89 annually to each person. Of this amount, it is believed that these working people do, by their unwearied economy, save, annually, not less than one-fourth part, or more than $3,000,000. The remainder is consumed on their annual support. About one-ninth part, or one million, secures to them the benefits of shelter and lodging, three-ninths, or three millions, furnishes their clothing, and five-ninths, or five millions, supplies their food.

The capital employed in the manufacture of woollen cloths is not less than the amount employed on cottons, which, as it has been stated, equals $58,726,924. The details of this manufacture are diverse, and quite variant from those of cotton; but, in many respects, so alike, that no injustice will be done in the great question of employment, wages, production, and profits, by regarding the cotton, in many respects, as a basis for calculations on the woollen manufacture.

People employed are one hundred and sixty-two thousand.

Wool consumed, worth	-	-	$26,000,000
Other raw materials,	-	-	11,000,000
Wages paid,	-	-	14,418,000
Annual expenditure for repairs and deterioration,	-	-	3,300,000
			<hr/> 54,718,000
Total value of annual production,	-	-	58,932,760
Balance of production, over and above expenditure,	-	-	$4,214,760

This gives a profit of seven per cent. on the capital of about 58,000,000 dollars employed in the woollen manufacture.

These two great employments of labor, operating by two hundred and ninety-seven thousand people, using $117,453,848 of capital, paying more than $26,000,000 in wages, working up of raw materials nearly $50,000,000, and annually producing fabrics worth at least $87,000,000, to be distributed for consumption to the whole nation in all parts of the country, are still but a part of the great employments of such labor, now operating in our country, under one great system of encouragement and protection. Other classes of manufacturing labor use capital in other kinds of production. It will be found that such labor employs not less than 7,000,000 dollars as capital, in making salt; 20,000,000 in hats; 10,000,000 in shoes and boots; 10,000,000 in manufacture of leather; 5,000,000 in that of glass; 7,000,000 in cabinet ware; 6,000,000 in carriages; 20,000,000 in iron and steel, and manufactures of each; 5,000,000 in saddlery; and 10,000,000 in jewellery and plated ware. Not less than two hundred and thirty-two thousand people are annually at work with this 100,000,000 dollars vested in all the various kinds of capital used in all these different classes of production. Wages equal to $20,415,000 are yearly earned by these people; and their annual production, after paying these wages, and all disbursements for raw materials, together with repairs and deterioration of capital, leaves a surplus of about 7,265,000 dollars, being, also, like the cotton and woollen production, a fraction over seven per cent. profit for the year.

To all these may properly be added the labor employed, and the land and capital used, in raising wool: because these are absolutely necessary for the woollen manufacture. Twenty millions of sheep, in the United States, worth at least 40,000,000 dollars, are fed on the grass, hay, corn, raised on six million five hundred thousand acres of land, worth ten dollars per acre, and equal in amount to 65,000,000 dollars. The culture of this land, and the care of these sheep, will employ one hundred and ninety-four thousand men, for such a part of the year, as that their wages, they, furnishing their own subsistence, will equal about eighty-nine dollars each; and amount, in the whole, to about 17,266,000 annually. The product, in wool and increase, may amount, on an average of years, to 25,000,000 dollars. This leaves a profit of 7,734,000, or nearly seven per cent. annually on the capital.

It is thus seen that the progress of this great system of policy has, since its commencement, gathered into all the various classes of mechanic and manufacturing employment, not less than seven hundred and twenty-three thousand working people. If you add to these the builders of houses, and the builders of ships, you may leave uncounted the women and children employed in lighter manufacturing labor, and still number more than seven hundred thousand working men—men who earn wages, and support families of not less than four persons each. Here are two million eight hundred and seventy-two thousand people, the vigor and strength of the nation, made prosperous by the operation of our great system of encouragement and protection.

These people keep in useful and productive employment, as capital, not less than 312,453,848 dollars. They furnish, in various fabrics, a yearly mass of production, of a value equal to 160,969,520 dollars; give to the owners of the capital so used by them a return of profits amounting, annually, to 23,428,520 dollars; and earn for themselves 64,284,723 dollars, as the wages of their annual labors. This has been effected, under this cherished system of policy, in the short space of forty-four years from and after its first establishment. This, sir, I say, this has been done almost exclusively in mechanic and manufacturing industry; but, at the same time, encouragement, extended to agriculture, has given to labor a wonderful impulse in that great department of industry. Distant from other countries, and abounding in cheap and fertile lands, a small impost excludes the agricultural products of other nations from our markets. Excluded, as the breadstuffs and provisions of America always must be, from Europe, either by laws or intervening distance, nothing could so much increase their production as the opening of a great manufacturers' market for them in this country. That market is supplied, exclusively, by the agricultural labor, using the agricultural capital of our own nation. The amount of this labor and capital may be estimated by the amount of this supply; and this supply must be commensurate with the efficient demand made in this market, by that manufacturing labor of our country, which earns wages, and purchases with those wages household accommodation, clothing, and food, for all who depend on that labor for shelter, dress, and subsistence.

It has been seen that the annual amount of wages earned by mechanic and manufacturing labor is somewhat more than sixty-four millions of dollars. If one-fourth part of that amount be annually saved, still forty-eight millions will be left for consumption. If one-ninth part of that amount be required for shelter and lodging, and three-ninth parts for needful clothing, then five-ninth parts, or nearly twenty-seven millions of dollars, will remain for the annual purchase of food. Here, then, is a clear effective demand, within our own country, for food, amounting to twenty-seven millions of dollars annually. This demand has been created by the encouragement of manufacturing labor; and this demand has encouraged, and does encourage, agricultural labor so to extend its production as to supply this demand, and realize this whole twenty-seven millions of dollars annually, as a profit on the capital employed to effect that production. What amount of labor and capital must go into operation to effect this purpose? What quantity of land, and of what value; what instruments of cultivation, and of what cost; what number of men, and at what expenditure for their wages, have been, and now are, called into employment, to feed this manufacturing labor, and realize this annual profit of twenty-seven millions of dollars? We have seen that manufacturing industry realizes annually about twenty-three millions of dollars as the profits on capital. To effect this, the capital used exceeds three hundred millions of dollars; the labor employed is more than seven hundred thousand hands; and more than sixty-four millions of dollars are annually paid in wages. Does the agriculture of our country annually realize a profit of twenty-seven millions of dollars, by feeding the manufacturing labor of our country? Then that agriculture does use for that purpose more than three hundred and sixty-six millions of dollars as capital, and employs more than eight hundred and ninety-two thousand persons in all the various labors of the field, and pays to them, in wages, more than seventy-nine millions of dollars annually. These agricultural working men feed themselves and their own families; and not less than four persons are subsisted, clothed, sheltered, and lodged, by the effective labor of each one of them. Here are three millions and a half of people employed in all the honest and wholesome vocations of husbandry, and, by our great encouraging system, sustained in a condition of existence, both moral and physical, far more prosperous than that of any other agricultural people in any other region of this earth.

H. OF R.]

The Tariff Bill.

Is it not a great and a glorious system which has produced such effects? Were not they statesmen who laid the foundation of this system? And they, too, were they not worthy of all praise, who have, piece by piece, built up the whole superstructure, and thereby peopled our land with so much labor and skill, furnished so much mutual employment for that skill and labor, aided, as they are, by so many instruments of toil and agents of production? What a market is here, in our own country, supplied by this system, from the labors of our own lands and workshops, with all the nourishing fruits of the earth, and all the needful fabrics of human skill!

Nor is this all. Our great system of encouragement comprehends every class of labor, and every source of wealth. The seas teem with abundance, and no prudent nations have ever neglected the encouragement of their fisheries. England and Holland have encouraged and protected them, both as a source of wealth and as a nursery of seamen. The United States adopted this policy as a part of their great system, commenced by the law of July 4, 1799. I shall quote none of the laws enacted for that purpose, but merely call on the committee to look out on the ocean, and view their countrymen straining at the line, or hurling the harpoon, on every sea, and under every latitude. The bare tonnage floating these sojourners of the deep around the world, has cost more than ten millions of dollars; and they, by their ceaseless and perilous labors, draw five millions annually from the rich chambers of the ocean.

The shipbuilding trade of the United States was earliest among the labors of the country cherished by our great system of encouragement. By the law of July 20, 1789, all vessels thereafter built and owned by foreigners shall, on the entry at any port of the United States, pay a duty on their tonnage equal to fifty cents per ton; while vessels thus owned and built in the United States shall pay thirty cents only per ton. This discriminating tonnage duty has, from that time to the present, operated as perfect protection to the whole trade of American shipbuilding, and totally excluded foreign built vessels from the ship market of the United States. What has been the effect? Precisely what the founders of the system must have foreseen. Not monopoly of profits to American shipbuilders; not a monopoly condition of their work when finished; not a monopoly price for their fabric to the American navigator. No, sir, in this, as in all other branches of protected industry, every thing is performed under the exciting and perfecting spirit of competition. The ship market of our country, supplied exclusively by American industry—a market every way and entirely domestic, is supplied at a cheaper rate per ton than any other ship market in the world. Is the work well done? Are the models skilfully designed? Ask the mariners of every sea. They will tell you whose ships can hold the toughest and most successful controversy with the winds and the waves of every ocean—whose ships transport the most burdensome freights, and whose ships win their passages with the speediest expedition. Who, in marine architecture, has surpassed the American model? What nation sends out on the ocean her maritime commerce, or her naval warfare, in ships of finer form or more successful movement, than those of our own country?

The whole navigating interest of the United States has, in like manner, by provisions made in the same law, been cherished and carried forward under our great system of encouragement and protection. All vessels, neither built nor owned in the United States, must pay fifty cents, while all vessels, American built, and owned by American citizens, pay but six cents a ton on their entry at any port of the United States. In the coasting trade and fisheries, this duty was, by American vessels, paid but once a year; while foreign ships and vessels paid the same duty on every entry. A higher rate of duty, paid on merchandise, when imported in foreign vessels, gave another encouragement to American navigation. In all these several ways, the navigating interest has been cherished and encouraged under our great protecting system; and, although, under certain treaties, and by a repeal of certain parts of the law laying tonnage duties on vessels of the United States, some foreign vessels may enter into our ports without paying duty, yet such vessels can import no merchandise of the produce of countries other than their own, nor take any share in the coasting trade of the United States. Notwithstanding these several relaxations in favor of foreigners, American navigation is now perfectly protected, and, under that protection, has continued to flourish, beyond all parallel in other countries, or in former times.

Commerce, no less than navigation, has been embraced within the fostering principles of our national system of encouragement and protection. Whatever could be done by regulations, in aid of foreign commerce, has been effected. To secure the transportation of that commerce from country to country, you have given the ship master a control over the persons of all mariners who may enter into any written contract with him to perform any voyage. You have, in return, provided for the subsistence, the health, and the compensation of such mariners. You have inscribed a character of nationality on all your ships, and so regulated their lading that their cargoes shall acquire a like character; and, when the American flag is hoisted over them, all nations are informed that the United States are the guardians of whatever floats under that broad ensign. You have further protected their commerce, by sending out consuls and commercial agents to all the maritime nations of the earth. Nor is this enough. The diplomatic relations established between the United States and so many other nations have no purpose more important than the protection and security of American commerce. Sir, that commerce is guarded in every sea, and the great highway of nations, covered with your going out and returning commerce, is thus secured from every port in our own country, to every harbor of every other country, by the guns, or the flag, or the fame of your navy.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

This commerce is moved, in all its exchanges, by an immense capital. Not less than eighty-five millions of dollars are continually employed in all its operations. If prosperous in the outward as well as homeward voyage, it may, in each, realize ten per cent. on the capital; and this, after supplying a revenue annually to those concerned in the trade, equal to eight million five hundred thousand dollars, adds an equal amount to their capital, to be invested in that, or some other employment of the labor of our country.

Commerce among the several States was not forgotten when a system was to be established for the encouragement of all the labor of the American people. This commerce moves every where, and in all directions, by roads, railways, rivers, canals, and coastwise from end to end of our country. All your appropriations for surveys, during the last ten years, have been made to encourage this commerce. All subscriptions to canals had the same great object. Why have you, at such cost, dredged the Ohio, the Mississippi, and other rivers? To encourage and secure the movements of commerce among the States. For what other purpose have harbors been improved, channels marked out, breakwaters erected? Not only to direct the mariner returning from foreign regions, but to show to him his way from port, and conduct your coasting trade from one State to another, has your whole maritime frontier been lighted up, from east to west; and the same beacons, for a like purpose, are now beginning to blaze along the rivers, and on the shores of the great lakes of our country.

The amount of this commerce is immense. It comprehends not only all the surplus production collected from all parts of the country to be sent abroad, together with all commodities imported in return, and distributed, in like manner, for consumption, but it likewise comprehends all those various products which are moved in all directions from the producer to the consumer in all parts of the country. The amount cannot be less than ten times the amount of all our domestic productions exported to foreign countries. That may be annually equal to about sixty-five millions; and, if so, the commerce among the States cannot be, annually, less than six hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The encouragement of this commerce consists in lightening; by every possible means, the cost of its transportation. This can be done by internal improvement alone; that is, in roads, railways, canals, and rivers, freed of all obstructions, either permanent or accidental. This has been the great system of encouragement extended to commerce among the States, under the great constitutional grant of power to regulate that commerce, and to expend money for its encouragement and protection; on the same principle that money, in immense sums, is annually expended to encourage and protect commerce, under a like grant of power to regulate that commerce.

The constitutional grant of power, made to Congress, "to regulate commerce," has nowhere been so perfectly explained by unquestioned legislation, under the grant, as by the law made to regulate commerce with "the Indian tribes." Here the claims of the free trade school are forever put to silence. Congress has the same power "to regulate commerce," either with foreign nations, or among the several States, or "with the Indian tribes."

The law "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," made and approved March 30, 1802, has erected a wall of brass around the whole territory of those tribes lying within the territory of the United States, and has excluded every citizen thereof from all commercial intercourse with any of the people of those tribes, unless under a license for that purpose granted, and after bonds given not to abuse the power granted by such license. All merchandise transported into this protected Indian territory without such license, is liable to forfeiture; and all persons unlicensed, found within the same, are liable to punishment.

The power of Congress to enact this law has never been questioned. Congress has received, by the constitution, the same power, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," and "to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes." Congress can, therefore, under the power granted by the constitution, place the same restrictions on the one which it can place on the other. The whole system of commercial regulations, whether in respect to foreign nations or the several States, or the Indian tribes, are alike derived from the same grant of power; and all have the same great ultimate object—the promotion of the general welfare.

Thus, sir, has our great system of encouragement and protection, commenced in July, 1789, raised up and carried on towards perfection the manufactures, the agriculture, the fisheries, the navigation, and the commerce of our country. Legislation in aid of all these might, nevertheless, have been useless; it would certainly have been much less efficacious, had not Congress, at the same time, exercised its great constitutional control over the national medium of exchange.

Congress have power "to coin money, to regulate the value of that money, and of all foreign coins used in the country." Literally speaking, Congress could, in regulating the value of money, merely enact what quantity of silver, and of what fineness, should constitute the money unit, the silver dollar of the United States; that the dollar should contain four hundred and sixteen grains of silver, twenty-two parts pure, and two parts alloy; that gold should be fifteen times as valuable, being of equal weight and fineness, as silver; and that two hundred and seventy grains of gold, twenty-two parts fine, and two parts alloy, should be coined into our eagle, and be of equal value with ten silver dollars. This regulation of the value of money could have relation to nothing but the purity and separation into parts of the metallic money of the country. The commercial value of money would, after all, depend on the quantity in market, compared with the demand for it.

When our Government first went into operation, and ever since that time, money, that is coin, has not been the medium of exchange, but merely the basis of that medium. Unless Congress could control that medium so as to make it, at all times, convertible into money, the basis of it, a power to regulate coins or money, would be useless, because the medium of exchange would not be regulated in its value by those coins or that money.

What, then, is the medium of exchange, and how may that be regulated by Congress? This medium is that which circulates from hand to hand, and is used, with a small quantity of metallic money, for change, to buy and sell all the commodities of the country; it is the currency, and consists of all those written promises to pay money, either on demand or at a time, which may be transferred by delivery or endorsement, or in any other way sufficiently facile for the purposes of commerce. It may be divided into four classes: bank bills; promissory notes, payable on time; bills of exchange accepted, but not payable; bonds; and, last of all, certificates of stocks.

The debts of individuals and corporations thus make the currency of the country; that currency will be sound if all parts of it may, at the pleasure of those who hold them, be converted into money. If it cannot be so converted, then that currency will be depreciated. If banks issue more bank bills than they can, in the ordinary course of business, redeem, bank bills will cease to be convertible into money, and will depreciate in their market value. This will, more or less, affect the soundness of all other parts of the currency, and depreciate its value. Money having ceased to be the basis of the currency, cannot regulate its value. Congress will have utterly lost, for every useful purpose, the power to regulate the value of money, as a medium of exchange, or as the basis of that medium.

Before the currency shall, by the overissues of banks, have become so abundant as that those banks can no longer redeem their bills on demand, that abundance will have greatly reduced the value of the whole currency. If, from any cause, at any time, banks add one-twentieth, one-tenth, or one-fifth part to the amount of their bills in circulation, the value of those bills, and of the whole currency, whether in gold and silver, promissory notes, bills of exchange, bonds, or stocks, will fall in value five, ten, or twenty per cent. The basis of that currency, the coined money of the country, will be found in the same condition—reduced in value by the reduced value of that representative of it, which, at any time, may be dollar for dollar exchanged for it. For so long as the circulating bank bills of the country may be exchanged dollar for dollar for any of the promissory notes, or bills of exchange, or bonds, or stocks, or silver dollars, or gold eagles in the market, so long will they all be of one equal, uniform value. That value will not depend on the quantity or fineness of the silver in a dollar, or gold in an eagle, but upon the abundance or scarcity of those dollars, or eagles, or of bills which may be exchanged for them in the market of the country.

Little benefit would, therefore, have been derived to the trade of our country from the power of Congress to coin money, or to regulate the value thereof, either in the fineness or quantity of silver or gold in dollars or eagles, unless some other power, given by the constitution, might enable that Congress to place some limit to the power of issuing bank bills, and thereby controlling the value of such coined money. The founders of our great system of policy soon foresaw these things, and discovered that Congress, to regulate the value of "money," and render it a circulating medium, or the basis of such a medium, must institute some establishment by which the issue of bank bills might be so controlled as not only to render them, at all times, convertible into "money," at the pleasure of the holders, but also to adjust the supply of those bills, by the amount issued, so exactly to the commercial demand for currency in the market, that no abundance or scarcity of that currency could, at any time, either so raise or so lower the value of it in our market as to affect, injuriously, the labor and capital of the country in any of the great branches of national industry.

For these great purposes, Congress very early established the Bank of the United States as a branch of the great encouraging and protecting system. It was necessary to render this institution not a treasury institution, established merely to create, from time to time, a medium for the payment of the revenue, but a part of the great system of labor in the country, established to regulate the value of that coin and currency by which all the products of that labor must be measured and exchanged. As a treasury institution, its issues of bills must be controlled by the demands of Government for revenue; but, as a part of the institutions of the country, formed in aid of labor, its issues of bills would be adjusted to the demands of that labor for a currency by which to exchange its various productions. In the one case, the currency of the Government, created for revenue purposes only, may be a surplus added to the national currency; and, by its abundance, reduce the value of the whole. In the other case, the Government and the labor of the country will have but one currency; and the total amount of it, increased or diminished, from day to day, throughout the year, will, at all times, be equal, and no more than equal, to the demand daily made for so much currency as will satisfy all demands for payment, and enable the whole buying and selling community to make all their daily exchanges of all the products of labor, land, and capital throughout the whole country.

The Bank of the United States has been such an institution. It has enabled Congress so to regulate the value of "money" in the United States, as that such money has been as a basis of the currency of one uniform value in all parts of the country; and the issues of bills in that bank, and all its branches, have been so regulated, and that regulation has so controlled the issues of bills, in all other banks, in all the States, that neither the abundance nor scarcity of the currency has, at any time, materially affected the market value of that currency: that currency has been of equal value, at different times, and in distant places; and the value, the commercial level of our circulating medium, has been very nearly on a level with that of the great commercial world.

The revenue of the nation has been collected and disbursed in all parts of the country; and this has been done, not only without loss to the public, but in a currency so uniform in value both in different places and at different times in the fiscal year, that every two men who have paid or received each an equal number of dollars and cents, have each paid or received an amount of money precisely equal in value. The cost and risk of transporting gold and silver from a place where they are not wanted to a place where they are wanted, is, in the commercial world, denominated exchange. This exchange has been, beyond all expectation, in amount, reduced by the operations of this bank and its branches. If a man, in Providence, wished to place ten thousand dollars, in silver coin, in the hands of his correspondent in New Orleans, he must, thirty years ago, have put it on shipboard, and paid freight, insurance, and charges for the transportation of it from one of these cities to the other. At this time, he merely delivers his ten thousand silver dollars to the cashier of the branch bank in Providence, and receives the draft of the President on the branch bank of New Orleans, in favor of his correspondent, and remits it to him to be paid in dollars in that city. For this accommodation, the cost is probably less than the insurance would have been, had he shipped the silver money, and sent it thither by water transportation.

Such are the arrangements of the bank and its branches, so perfect is their system, and so exactly can the officers of the institution, from their knowledge of all the business of the country, ascertain where gold and silver will be wanted, when and in what quantities it will be wanted, that not a dollar is ever transported uselessly from one place to another. Much transportation is saved, and what must be done, at the smallest possible cost. Gold and silver, under their operations, seem to have obtained a kind of commercial ubiquity, and orders for transmitting, from man to man, immense amounts of value, are sent by the mail from city to city, without the risk of robbery. The wisdom of these provisions has superseded all the cunning of human transgression; and he who now plunders the mail will earn for himself the peril and the infamy of the crime, but no booty other than a few scraps of paper, useless to all men except their lawful owner.

Nor are the operations of this great branch of our national system of encouragement and protection confined to the currency and exchanges of our own country. Our trade with foreign nations often leaves us with a balance due from us to them. This balance has been often discharged without sending abroad our money, the basis of our currency; sometimes with the stocks of this bank, and, to some extent, with the bills of it. For the bills of this bank are current at Liverpool and in London.

One of the evils of a system of currency, not gold and silver, but based on money coined from those metals, is the liability under which the commerce of our country places this money to be exported, as merchandise, to Eastern Asia, and thereby to derange the value of the currency, and greatly injure all the productive labor and capital of the nation. This bank has begun to correct that evil. Its bills are beginning to be current in Calcutta and Canton, and to aid in the purchase of return cargoes of East India and Chinese merchandise.

In time, if this bank shall be sustained by a renewal of its charter, large bills of it will be current throughout Europe and Asia. Moslem pilgrims, travelling in caravans from Delhi to Mecca, Suez, and Cairo; and Chinese merchants, journeying in like manner from Peking to Astracan and Moscow, would carry these large bills rather than gold, silver, or precious stones, to buy the rich commodities of the West. The roving Bedouin or Tartar might encounter these caravans, and might seize their diamonds, or their precious metals; but they would regard these silken securities for money as so many transcripts from sacred books; and the name of Biddle, as of some holy man, would thus preserve the laborious merchant and the pious pilgrim from peril and plunder.

Our great system of encouragement for domestic labor, and of protection for that labor against all injurious foreign competition, would have been incomplete and imperfect, had it not contained ample provisions for the defence of the United States against the arms, the military and naval force and power of foreign nations. Such provisions for defence have, therefore, been made a part of the system. Look a moment at those provisions, and you will perceive that the great founders of our system have so united the common defence with the general welfare, that no crude and improvident legislation can destroy the one, without overthrowing the other.

What has been done, and is now doing, for that defence? Fortifications have either been built, or are now in progress, at all the great assailable points on our maritime frontier. These are to be kept and defended, not by a standing army, more perilous, in times of peace, to liberty, than all the wars of the world. A few soldiers stationed at each of these fortresses will keep them in repair, and place and preserve all their military armaments in a good working condition, and ready to be put in operation by the national militia, whenever any foreign Power may choose to make any hostile demonstration on our shores. Where will that militia be found? Not here and there, scattered over a wide country, as would have been the case had not our system of encouragement and protection been established; but collected into cities, towns, villages, hamlets, at harbors, and waterfalls, as they now are, by the operation of that system on manufactures, on the fisheries, on navigation, on commerce among the States, on commerce with foreign nations, and on that agriculture which crowds around the neighborhoods of such communities of men, to feed them, and thus to aid and participate in their prosperity. Your system of encouragement and protection, in its natural operation, brings together a dense population over all your maritime frontier. Rhode Island, not more fertile than other parts of New England, can, like Flanders, sustain five hundred persons on each square mile; and, ultimately, furnish an armed militia, forming such a phalanx of defence on every foot of her shore, as no foreign army can ever break through and reach the land with one man of them alive.

This defence, provided under this system, will not be found in a condition like that of your armies in the last war, dependent, as they were, on your enemy for their blankets, the only covering which separated their unsheltered limbs from the stormy face of the winter skies.

Sir, your own domestic market, furnished under our system of encouraged and protected labor, can lack nothing needful for the use of the soldier. His subsistence, clothing, camp equipage, munitions of war, will, at all times, be found, and found in great abundance, in that market.

Should any part of your coast be so assailed that the militia in the immediate vicinity would not be sufficiently numerous to make efficient and successful defence, that case has been considered, and provision made for remedy of the evil, in that behalf. The regulation of commerce among the several States, placed in the power of Congress by the constitution, has induced the commencement of such a system of internal improvement, in aid of that commerce, as will ultimately unite, by roads, railways, canals, and rivers, all the great and populous parts of the interior with the maritime frontier of our country. On these great thoroughfares of travel and transportation, the armed and provided militia can, in thousands and hundreds of thousands, be poured down from the interior, upon any point of the seacoast which may have been assailed by a force too powerful for the local militia of that neighborhood.

Sir, the other part of our national defence, the navy, is, if possible, still more the progeny of our great system of encouragement and protection; and, for its existence and support, more intimately connected with that system. It was built by the encouraged and protected mechanical labor of our country. It is manned from our encouraged and protected navigation; from our encouraged fisheries; our encouraged coasting trade; our encouraged foreign commerce. This navy is supplied with arms, with munitions of war, with clothing, from our own encouraged and protected manufacturers.

In war especially must it be fed and subsisted from encouraged and protected American agriculture. Examine every point of defence made by a naval station along your coast. At Pensacola, your navy must draw its supplies of subsistence through the canals cut into the rivers which unite that station with the great fertile and exhaustless valley of the West. At Norfolk, in the wars of future times, the navy at that station would look for supplies not only up the long rivers of Virginia, but also along the quiet and level waters of that canal which is now working a resistless course from this city, through rocks and mountains, until, lock after lock, this stupendous engine of human power shall have ascended the Alleghanies, and, in like manner, marched down, on the other side, to a level with the Ohio.

Is your navy stationed in the Chesapeake or Delaware, still must it draw most of its subsistence from the distant interior, over the railroads, or through the canals, built up under the impulse given to private adventure by our great system of internal improvement.

New York is united to the valley of the Mississippi by her own canals, and by that of Ohio; and the subsistence of your navy at that station would come not only coastwise, from the South, through canals, but also in abundance from the great interior of the West and the North.

It may never be a part of our politics to make Narragansett bay a naval station in time of peace. No matter for this oversight: for when war shall press on our coasts, that bay, Newport harbor, will be the great starting and returning point of all your fleets. That bay is now united to the very centre of New England, by a canal leading from Providence to Worcester. A railroad is at this time in progress from Boston to the head of this canal; and projections have been made to unite this point with the waters of Lake Champlain, or of the Hudson; and time only is wanted, to mature one or the other of these schemes; when Providence, Boston, and Portsmouth, all New England, will be united, by canal or railroad transportation, with the great valley of the West; and aided by our perfected system of internal improvement, your navy, at either of these stations, may be abundantly provisioned and fed from the banks of the Hudson, the Ohio, and the Mississippi.

Thus, sir, it is seen that the defence of our country against hostile aggression is a part of our great system of that encouragement and protection which has been extended to every department of national industry. You cannot destroy the one, and preserve the other. You cannot hew down the whole tree, and hope that any one of its branches can be preserved, and kept in a flourishing condition.

Sir, the regulations concerning the disposition of the public domain are a part of the same great system of national policy. The encouragement and protection given by that system to your mechanic arts, manufactures, navigation, fisheries, commerce with foreign nations, commerce among the several States, and with the aboriginal nations and tribes, have held out to the agriculture of these United States such bountiful encouragement as that of no other country ever received from any system of Government. This encouragement has created and sustained a regular and increasing demand for fresh lands to be annually brought into cultivation.

The right of pre-emption claimed by the British crown, to the exclusion of all other nations, was, in respect to all the lands within those territorial limits of the United States, established by the peace of 1783, conquered by the United Colonies from that crown, by the revolutionary war. The conflicting claims of the several States to these lands were finally ceded to the United States, in trust for the benefit of each State; and the right of pre-emption, against all nations, all the several States, and all individuals, was, by many treaties with the Indian nations, acknowledged and established. As these tribes diminished in numbers, or as time and other events brought them to the habits of agriculture, manufactures, trade, and civilization, their title to lands grown useless to them has been, by treaties, gradually extinguished. Surveys of such lands have been made; and a great land market opened in the United States presented to the eyes of nations a spectacle never seen by them until exhibited here, in this part of the new world. Demand and supply have been considered in this as in other markets; and the one has been so adjusted to the other, that speculation, though not excluded, has never been able to control this market.

Under this system, territories have been formed; extensive regions peopled; and great, flourishing, and populous States brought into existence, and admitted into this Union. A revenue of two or three millions derived from this source has hitherto been appropriated to the payment of the national debt. When that debt is discharged, this revenue belongs, of right, to the several States, and must, under our great system of policy, be distributed to each of them. This it is now proposed to do, that each State may hereafter receive and retain its dividend for the great national purposes of education. Thus, in every State, the means of instruction shall be brought into every family; every child, hereafter born in the United States, no matter how poor and lowly, may be taught not only letters and ordinary science, but also all those great truths which secure the blessings of this, and the hopes of another life.

When our great system was commenced, the nation was burdened with a heavy debt; the cost of the revolutionary war—the price of our national independence. Since that time, the expenditure of another war has been added to this great national burden. Under the operations of our system of encouragement and protection, the people have not only prospered and grown wealthy, but they have, while in this progress of prosperity, paid off to their creditors 390,000,000 dollars; and taken up and cancelled outstanding demands against them, to that amount. This payment has been made, not principally to foreigners, as was so incorrectly stated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. VERPLANK.]

This debt, when outstanding, was in stocks, owned, much of it, by corporations; some for banking, some for insurance, some for religious, some for literary and scientific purposes. Much also of these stocks had been owned by individuals. Some of them had died, and their stocks had been shared among their widows and orphans. Many such owners had, by misfortunes, failed in business, and their stocks had been distributed among their creditors, some rich, some of humble fortune. So it has come to pass, that the burden of taxation has been lightened by the division and distribution of payment. Payment has carried relief and comfort into hundreds and thousands of households; gladness into millions of bosoms; and literally caused "the widow's heart to sing for joy."

Thus, sir, has Congress, for about forty-four years, exercised the power given by the constitution, "to promote the general welfare," by a system of burdens imposed on the labors of the people, for the support of Government; and a system of benefits, done for them in return, by the labors of legislation. This was the great system, begun on the 4th of July, 1789, and brought down to the commencement of the last four years by various enactments, all devised and put in operation to finish and perfect that system.

What is the new system, already begun, and to be nearly completed by the measure now under consideration? Government is hereafter to be a scheme of burdens, without any corresponding benefits to the people. We are to raise money by impost, to support Government, that is, to pay ourselves; but we will not enact any commercial regulation "to promote the general welfare." We retain the power taken from the States by the people, and given to Congress; but we send the people back to the States for that encouragement and protection of their labor which we know the States have no power to give.

Is not this bill a mere scheme of taxation? It provides for the wants of Government, but makes no provision for the wants of the people. Without inquiry, without knowledge of the amount of means in the hands of any man, or the amount of payment to be made by any man or any State in this Union, we sit here, and, without any examination or survey of property first had, we are about to enact a great doomsday volume of taxation, which shall, in its exactions, visit every free laboring man in the nation, in his food, in his clothing, in his habitation, and in the instruments of his labor. Nor is this all. Not only it visits his labor with a blighting curse, withers and consumes its productive energies, but also places him on the degraded level, and in competition with the paupers of Europe, and the slaves of South Carolina.

Sir, you dare not enact and pass this bill into a law. Never did the fathers of those freemen, even in their struggle for independence, permit a slave to lift his hand in aid of their battle, until he had first been purified and consecrated to the holy service by the sacrament of emancipation. We shall never degrade the blood of our fathers.

Is the product made by South Carolina slavery reduced in price? Let the master diminish the task of the slave. Spare the lash. Reduce the quantity of cotton, pushed to surpluse on the consumption of the world. Give labor now and then a holiday. Send a less quantity to market; and bring home as much or more money for it.

JAN. 26, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

Employ the slave in some other vocation, if not of profit, it may be of ornament, and adorn your country. Labor for something which cannot be swallowed. Raise monuments, or after generations may never know that you have existed. Let the little tyrants of these days, like some of the greater ones of ancient times, build pyramids of bricks, and no longer toil to scale the highest heavens on bales of cotton.

Sir, disguise this question as you will, it is, after all, a crusade against free white labor; first preached on this floor and elsewhere, and now put in the form of war by the owners of slaves. It is the maker of cotton against the grower of wool, the mere tiller of the ground against the keeper of sheep; and because the first brother of our race did, in such a strife, succeed in committing the oldest fratricide on record, the movers of this controversy seem satisfied to earn a like malediction, if they can but succeed in performing a kindred achievement.

Sir, I repeat it, this controversy is a war against the free white labor of this country: a war levied by the owners of slaves. How often have you been told on this floor, first in the voice of complaint, but now in the tones of insolent menace, that the free laborers of the North could earn fifty cents a day, while the slaves of South Carolina could not earn more than twelve and a half cents? How often has the same voice told us that manufacturing capital, used by this free labor, cleared a profit of twenty per cent. per annum; while slaves and land, the cotton-raising capital of the South, would not, in any year, come up to six? This base, inglorious question is now agitating our country. We are told that our great system of national policy encourages the labors of the free, and renders capital in their hands highly profitable; but the same system discourages the labor of slaves, and renders them, and the capital employed with them, in growing cotton, rice, and tobacco, not profitless, but merely less profitable to the owners. These men aver that the same system of laws is encouragement to the free, but discouragement to the slave labor of the country; and that all the great interests of all the free labor in the United States must be, nay, shall be, sacrificed; not to preserve, but to render more profitable, the capital vested in Southern slaves. Dare these men place such an issue before the country, in all its naked, base, and odious deformity? Dare they tell the world of christian nations the true state of this question? 'Would not those nations who have universally excluded slavery from their civil policy, would they not hear with a shout of indignation, that one of these States had taken up arms against the Union, and had sworn to destroy that Union, for the glorious purpose of rendering their negro slaves more valuable, by rendering the labor of those slaves more profitable? They have not dared to do it. They have put a mask on this base-born controversy of avarice. Under this mask, this Shylock question of interest, of mere money, of so many dollars and cents, has been changed in appearance; and is now, to the deceived eye of the nation, a question of State rights—State sovereignty—freedom—chivalry—nullification. Egregious masquerade of valor and patriotism! Brave cavalier—for how much money—for how many pounds of flesh—will you sell all these painted, pasteboard glories? For the base and grovelling provisions of this bill; for their negro cloths at five per cent.; their own coats at twenty; and cottons, calico or plain, both for themselves and slaves, at the same rate of impost.

Does not this strip the question of all its paintings? Yes, sir; they plainly tell us that the great cotton and tobacco interest of Southern slavery cannot thrive, unless the greater interest of Northern freedom in manufactures and agriculture shall be destroyed. Are these two interests indeed hostile to each other? and cannot the same system of laws give to each of them the same encouragement and protection now, which was so liberally bestowed on both by those laws in 1816? No one ever dreamed of this hostility of interests, until within the last eight years. Until then, our great system, established to promote the general welfare, did equally advance the individual and particular interests of all. If, then, by some strange perversity of purpose, or of accident, any particular interest have, since that time, sprung up in our country, hostile in its nature to the general welfare, can the owners of that interest call upon the nation to cherish and cultivate this their deleterious plant; and, to promote its growth, demand that every other interest, which has hitherto flourished in our land, shall be extirpated and destroyed? Who would pluck up fields of wheat, that he might thereby encourage a more vigorous growth of hemlock? Does not the less always give way to the more useful plant? Let, then, these politicians beware how they undertake to prove to the American people that their production of cotton, rice, and tobacco, by the labor of slaves, is hostile to that general welfare which has been for more than forty years established and promoted by our great system of encouragement and protection. Admit that it were so. Do the owners of slaves believe that the system of encouragement and protection is to be abolished, and more than seven hundred thousand free white people now employed in mechanic and manufacturing labor, and more than nine hundred thousand employed in agricultural labor, are to be thrown out of employment, and reduced to poverty, merely to render slave labor, employed in growing cotton, rice, and tobacco, somewhat more profitable? Sir, you may as soon "tear this steadfast earth from her axis;" roll the moon into our orbit; and compel this globe to spin round that, as a mere satellite. What number of men, citizens of this our country, are concerned, and rely for revenue and wealth on this growing of cotton, rice, and tobacco, for the market of this and foreign countries?

In this production, the planters own and work, on an average, not less than seventy-five slaves each. These produce from two to six bales of cotton, each of three hundred and fifty pounds weight; and four such bales will be estimated as a very low annual average product of one slave. In 1830, 752,840 bales were exported; 221,430 sold in the domestic market. This quantity, at four bales each, would require 268,542 slaves. Rice and tobacco make about one-fifth part of the whole cotton, rice, and tobacco production. One-fourth part of the number of slaves employed on cotton will be employed in these. This makes their number 67,135; and added to the number engaged in the cotton production, the total number is 335,727, employed in growing cotton, rice, and tobacco. If the average number owned by each planter be not less than seventy-five, then the whole number is owned and employed by 4,476 planters. Some planters own several hundred, and some much less than seventy-five; but it will be found that the whole cotton, rice, and tobacco interest is owned by less than five thousand men.

This number of planters have placed themselves before the whole nation, some part of them in the attitude of utter defiance, and demand the entire abolition of the great national system of encouragement and protection. Here are five thousand men, backed by three hundred thousand slaves, now threatening destruction to a great system of national policy, which gives labor to more than sixteen hundred thousand free white people; and puts into use, in productive employment, six hundred and eighty millions of capital, owned by more than five hundred thousand men, engaged in the agricultural, mechanic, and manufacturing production of the country; and supporting their own families of not less than 2,000,000 people, by the profits of this capital, and the savings made by their own care and labor in these vocations. Will it come to pass that more than two millions of men, owners or workers of six or seven hundred millions of capital, feeding, clothing, sheltering, or educating more than eight millions of people, shall be utterly ruined, their capital in a great measure destroyed, their labor turned over to foreigners, their bread snatched from their mouths, their clothes rent from their bodies, the shelter pulled down over their heads; and all this done by less than five thousand owners of slaves, who threaten to destroy the Union, unless this whole free working white population will agree to be destroyed themselves for its preservation?

The Tariff Bill.

What cause do these owners of slaves allege for all this hostility against the free labor of the country? They contend that the great system of encouragement and protection, under which this free labor and the capital used by it have prospered, does render their capital of land and slaves, employed in growing cotton, rice, and tobacco, less profitable than the capital employed by free labor, and much less profitable than it would be if that system were destroyed. Let us examine these allegations.

We have seen that mechanic and manufacturing labor, together with labor employed in raising wool, use a capital, annually, of the value of $312,453,848, and that this labor returns to the owners of this capital a profit, annually, of $23,428,520. It has also been shown that Northern agriculture, in supplying this manufacturing labor, and realizing a profit of $27,000,000, does actually use more than $366,000,000, as a capital for that purpose. Now, what amount of capital do these owners of slaves employ in the production of cotton, rice, and tobacco? and for what amount do they sell their whole production?

It has been seen that the number of slaves, employed on these products, is 335,727. Fifteen years ago, these slaves were not worth more than $200; most certainly not over $250 each. The system of encouragement and protection which, in its progress, has been felt in every part of our country, has enhanced the value of slaves not less than from 20 to 50 per cent. This whole number may now be reckoned at $300 each, and amounts in value to $100,718,100. Each slave can easily cultivate, in cotton, ten acres of land. This will much more than raise four bales, of 350 pounds each; but let it be allowed as the needful quantity. At ten dollars per acre, when cleared and enclosed, the whole quantity will be 3,357,270 acres, and the value equal to $33,572,700. Add to this amount five dollars for each slave, annually, for instruments of labor, or a sum equal to $1,678,635; and ten dollars each, for yearly clothing, equal to $3,357,270.

These several sums are,	$38,618,605
To this add the value of 335,727 slaves, at $300 each,	100,718,100

And the total amount is, - - - $139,336,705

Nothing is added in this calculation for the food of these slaves, because it is well known that, over and above the cultivation of so much cotton as, by this estimate, is set down as the production of each slave, he cultivates five or six times as much corn as serves to furnish his food.

Here, then, is a capital in lands, instruments of agriculture, and slaves, of one hundred and thirty-nine millions, and one-third employed in producing the great Southern staples, cotton, rice, and tobacco. What do the owners of that capital annually realize, in money, from the production of this capital? Here we have no difficulty in finding the answer. It may be almost entirely found on the records of the treasury. Take the year 1830.

That year, the value of exported rice was,	$1,986,824
Tobacco, - - - - -	5,586,365
Cotton, - - - - -	29,574,883
Total exported,	$37,248,072

Amount of cotton sold to the American manufacturers,	7,752,000
Rice and tobacco, not less than - - -	2,999,928
Total amount of cotton, rice, and tobacco, in 1830, - - - - -	$48,000,000

Here, sir, is the great efficient capital of the slave owner, in amount $139,336,705, and here, too, is the annual income of it, $48,000,000. What is the capital employed by free white labor, in mechanics, manufactures, and agriculture? $678,453,848. And what is the annual profit on that amount of capital? $50,428,520. The profit on capital in land and slaves is 34.5 per cent. per annum, while that of capital used by free labor is, per annum, but seven per cent. and a small fraction. If any thing can satisfy the owner of slaves, such a rate of profit must fill up and satisfy the utmost wants of the most greedy avarice. Thirty-four per cent. on capital! And that, too, secured by a monopoly of climate which does not suffer its production to grow beyond its own limit. Yes, and by a monopoly of labor, also, of which the laws of the free States do not permit the use.

Do you say that more slaves and more land are required to make this amount of production in cotton, rice, and tobacco? Then, if you please, double the number of slaves, and double the quantity of land; say one man can grow but two bales of cotton, and that each bale will require five acres of land for its production. What then? You will still have a profit of 17½ per cent. on your capital. Nay, do you still say it will require more labor and more land? Then double them both again; and take 1,100 working men, if you have so many in the whole cotton region, and take 11,000,000 acres of land to raise your crop; let each slave make but one bale, and let that be grown on ten acres of land; and even then, on such a weight of capital, you will realize 8.5-8 per cent. per annum. Do you tell me your lands will wear out? Not, sir, if you are skillful husbandmen. Will your labor grow old and become useless? There is in that labor a restoring principle, and it reproduces itself more than once in the course of its existence? Do you tell me that the other part of your slave capital is less productive? Sir, does it not feed and cloth itself? Yes, and also doubles its own value once in twenty-five years. This gives four per cent. per annum; and the whole capital of the world does not equal that rate of profit.

It is, therefore, demonstrated, that capital in lands and slaves, employed in the production of cotton, rice, and tobacco, in the South, is more, very much more, profitable, than capital employed by free labor in the agriculture or manufactures of the North.

This, sir, is the condition of capital in the North and in the South, under the provisions and operations of our great system of encouragement and protection. Not only has the value of the slave portion of it been increased from 20 to 50 per cent. during the last 15 years, but, even at the present high valuation of both slaves and lands, their united profits are more than 34 per cent. a year. Will this capital be more profitable if that system shall be destroyed? Can the ruin of seventeen parts of the country promote the welfare of the other seven? What man of wisdom, what statesman, of this or any other nation, will undertake to prove, that, if seven hundred millions of Northern capital were ruined, or thrown out of use, and one million and a half of free working men in our country were, with all their skill and all their machinery, excluded from employment, left without the power to produce, or the means to consume, the fruits of the earth, or the fabrics of labor; who, I say, in his senses, would attempt to prove that such an overthrow of the wealth, and strength, and prosperity of the free States in this Union, would enable four or five thousand owners of slaves to grow cotton, rice, and tobacco, in the South, with a greater amount of annual profit?

If such a catastrophe in the North would produce such effects in the South, if the repeal of our system, and the ruin of capital and labor in the free States, would enhance the value, and multiply the profits of slaves in the other States; yet who, that speaks in the accent of a christian, or stands on the feet, or moves with the gait of a christian, pagan, or man, would call for such a repeal, and effect such a ruin, that he might obtain such a profit? The very idea of the proposition is a horror; an outrage on reason, on morals, on liberty, on the constitution itself; and whenever the great common welfare of all the free people of the United States shall be sacrificed, or even endangered, to render slaves more profitable to their owners, our constitution will be blotted out, our Union extinguished; and a people, now the guardians of the world's freedom, shall then be made the miserable panders of profit to the insatiable avarice of a base and vulgar despotism.

Sir, the advocates of this measure, what do they propose to do? They intend to establish their new system of policy on the overthrow and ruins of the old. They demand the utter abandonment of all encouragement and protection, not in one or two, but in all and every department of industry. This bill is the commencement of the war, and is levelled, almost exclusively, at cottons, and at wool and woollens. It may be more easy to destroy manufactures in detail, one or two branches at a time; in this it is thought the friends of one will not come in to aid those of another. Accordingly, under this bill, iron and steel are left in a very well protected condition. Other manufactures are not touched at all by the provisions of this measure. Shoes, boots, cabinet ware, glass, hats, carriages, saddlery, leather, jewellery, and plated ware, are all perfectly protected, by a duty of thirty per cent.; and this protection excludes, in these trades, all foreign competition from our markets. Let not those concerned in them fancy themselves secure. Cottons and woollens do not peculiarly excite hostility in the owners of slaves. It is protection itself at which their blow is aimed; and when they shall have repealed the law which protects cotton and woollens from the conflict with foreign capital and labor, and ruined those two great manufacturing interests, they will demand a repeal of other laws, which protect other departments of industry; and if, terrified by their array of hostility, we now surrender to their menaces, you will see, one by one, all your mechanic trades, all your various manufactures, stripped of protection, and left to be destroyed by a competition with the exhaustless capital and labor of foreign nations.

Nor will this anti-protection hostility stop at the overthrow of your mechanical labor and manufacturing industry. Are not other labors of the free States protected? Your fisheries will, when you have yielded up your manufactories to appease the South—your fisheries will be made to feel the vengeance of these lords over three hundred thousand slaves. Do not tell me that these fisheries are the great nursery of seamen; these seamen are free men, are white men, are protected men, and each one of these attributes of a Northern manhood is odious in the eye of him who owns, and drives, and works the slave. So long as protection exists, under any law, the planter will make war on that protection, and never be satisfied until he has destroyed it, and ruined those who are sheltered by its provisions. It was, I believe, at the last session of the last Congress, or at the first session of this, that a resolution was placed on your table, requiring some committee to report a bill to repeal the laws making allowances to the owners of vessels employed, and to the men employing them, in the fisheries. Do you think that scheme was abandoned? It was proposed by the head of nullification in this House, if it may be correct philosophy to affirm that such a thing as nullification can have a head. That gentleman will never give up his project, unless he should be made to believe that the repeal of those laws would benefit the free labor of the North.

The shipbuilding trade of the United States is protected by laws which exclude all foreign built vessels from your market. Will this law be suffered to remain unrepealed in your code of navigation? No, sir, the same sirc of the South, which has blighted other branches of Northern labor, will also wither and destroy this.

The laws of protection now secure to American navigation the trade among the several States; and all foreign vessels are excluded from your canals; rivers, bays, and from coasting your shores from port to port. What shall preserve these laws from the fate prepared for other parts of your system of protection? The same spirit which has arrayed South Carolina against the Union, and which now calls on us to pass this bill, and with a cowardly soul surrender the great interests of the nation, to satisfy that rebellious spirit; that spirit will, in a few years, demand the repeal of those laws which protect our coasting and internal navigation. Vessels of every navigating nation will be invited to scour your shores, from port to port; and to swarm up your bays and rivers, from the ocean to the very heart of your country. You will see, on your wharves, and far up in the interior, not the honest, brave, and frank-hearted American seaman; but sailors of every region, of every garb, every tongue, and every vice, in the whole catalogue of human profligacy.

Why should not this chivalrous spirit of free trade, which invites the world to work against our labors on the land; why should it not challenge that world to come into free competition with our vessels, and our mariners on the waters? England, we are daily told, can work cheaper than America; and why should not our commerce among the several States have the benefit of their competition, and be moved from place to place by those who can afford to carry it at the smallest cost? Doubt not, nay, sir, you cannot doubt, that these all potent masters of slaves will, when they have beaten down one barrier of protection, never cease the strife until all are demolished.

Your foreign navigation and commerce are among the great protected interests of the nation. Will that protection, do you believe, be preserved, when all others are abandoned? The laws which give the American character to our ships and their cargoes, and secure a preference in carrying the merchandise of the world to those ships, will follow, in the progress of repeal, those laws which now protect your manufactures; and that voice at which the negro slavery of the South trembles throughout a thousand plantations, will, when at the call you have torn the spindle from its place, and thrown the loom out of gear, command you, and you will obey, and haul down the sail.

Sir, what is your navigation or your foreign commerce to the seven anti-protection States of Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina? They have turned all their navigation to the more profitable trade of growing cotton, rice, and tobacco. They do not export or import in their own vessels; nor send abroad to foreign countries, or bring back from those countries, in any fiscal year, more in amount than $2,500,000. The great staples of their agriculture are sold to American merchants, and help to make up the mass of our foreign commerce which is sent out and brought home in American ships. Do you believe they prefer these American merchants and these navigators? No, sir; it is the law, the system of American protection, which brings this Southern production on board American ships, and makes it a part of American commerce. These planters will not longer endure that their cotton shall be spun by American spindles, or woven in American looms; and do you believe that when they have relieved themselves from these evils, they will not seek and obtain relief from the evils of selling their cotton to American merchants, or having it carried to market in American ships? No, sir, the destroying demon of free trade will visit your ships when he shall have demolished your factories. If the English can spin and weave your cotton so much cheaper than the Americans, are they not able also to carry that cotton to market at a much cheaper rate?

Sir, the great protected and protecting part of your system is the navy. Will that escape the blow aimed at the whole system? It has cost you not less than $108,000,000, and it now costs three or four millions annually. It protects your navigation and commerce, passing and returning from the ports of our own to the most distant harbors of every other country. What then? Do the owners of slaves, the planters of cotton, rice, and tobacco, intend much longer to need this protection? When, by the course of free trade, their production shall become a part of English commerce; when the transportation of that commerce shall give employment to English navigation; what use, I pray you, will the plantation States have for that protection which is now given by the American navy? The stars and stripes may be hoisted over the beef and bread of Ohio and Pennsylvania, or over the boards and shingles of New England, should any of these be wanted by foreign nations; but over the cotton, rice, and tobacco, of the independent South, when sent to Liverpool or London, you shall see "St. George's banner, broad and gay." Why should the United States be at the immense cost of sustaining a navy, and spreading a flag of their own, on the ocean, merely to protect their navigation and commerce while moving on that highway of nations, when British ships and the British flag can and will give this protection, either for nothing at all, or at a much cheaper rate than it can be done by the American navy?

Sir, the hand which wields the lash of Southern slavery will first scourge free white laborers from your factories and workshops; then destroy your fisheries; after that, waste and scatter your navigation; and finally pull down the American flag, and give up every ship in the navy.

Internal improvement was a part of your system for the encouragement and protection of commerce among the several States. Had that been carried out and perfected, what a relief to the cost of that commerce, by perfecting the great medium of transportation throughout the country! What a cord of union would have been wrought by the extent and frequency of mutual intercourse among all the people of all the several States! That part of the system has been lopped off by the slaveholding influence of the anti-protection States; and perhaps we shall never see the common treasury of the nation again open to encourage our domestic commerce by giving aid to that spirit of enterprise which would improve the condition of our common country, by roads, rivers, canals, and railways.

To extend the benefits of our great system to the Indian tribes, was the purpose of those intercourse laws of protection, which, by encouraging among them agriculture, mechanic arts, manufactures, and commerce, carried to these people science, letters, christianity, and civilization. What has demolished this glorious part of your system, and pushed these tribes beyond the great river, and beyond the limits of civilization, so that they may again be lured back to barbarism by the herds of buffalo, and the joys of the hunter's life, prepared for them on the prairies of the West? To the intent, no doubt, that they may once more be provoked to war by the savage tribes of that region, so that mutual strife and mutual slaughter may finally consume these remnants of those "once mighty nations of this continent." What has effected all this, this destroying of the old, and introducing this new and inglorious scheme of policy, so traitorous to the plighted faith with those nations, and so ruinous to their rights and their civilization? Sir, our treaties solemnly made, our laws deliberately and with universal consent enacted, our whole system of Indian protection, fell into conflict with the reserved rights, the transcendental sovereignty of a slave-owning State, the republic of Georgia; and that republic, by the exercise of that sovereignty, repealed your laws, abrogated your treaties, and demolished your whole system of Indian encouragement and protection.

Yes, sir, Georgia applied to that part of your system what South Carolina is now aiming at all other parts of it—nullification. You beheld the Indian rights perish, and dared not lift up your hand, or so much as whisper, at the lowest note of your voice, against the horrid outrage; and the Almighty, to punish you for your violated faith, seems to have delivered all your own great rights and interests into the hands of another spoiler, and to have taken from you the counsel and the courage now so needful for your own defence.

What a madness must have taken possession of men's minds, when, to ruin the interests of others, they, without consideration, peril their own! South Carolina, at war with protection, carries her hostility against it into every branch of modern industry; and, because agriculture is one of those interests, and Northern as well as Southern agriculture is protected, she would destroy the protection of her own, rather than leave it undestroyed in regard to the agriculture of the North.

By the repeal of all laws granting protection to manufactures in the North, the whole market for the agricultural products of the farming States will be destroyed. This will leave on the hands of farmers in the North, the South, and the West, their wheat, their corn, their flour, provisions. Still more will be lost to the farming community. Millions of money have been expended to improve our native race of sheep, by importing into the country the best Saxon and Spanish merino flocks. If protection be withdrawn from your woollen manufactories, their ruin is unavoidable, and the American market for wool must be thereby destroyed. These beautiful flocks are doomed to the slaughter; the blood of thousands of hecatombs of them must be poured out to satisfy that black-hearted avarice of the South which vainly dreams that, by destroying the flocks, the fields, the workshops, the labor of the free, more work can be scoured out of the slaves of their own region, or that the product of that work may be sold for more money.

To secure the repeal of every law giving protection, they, in their madness, would abolish that which has encouraged and now protects their own favorite production of cotton. Who does not remember, in 1789, when three cents a pound was placed as a duty on imported cotton, at the request of South Carolina, to encourage her to buy cotton seed, and begin the culture? Two years after, they exported one hundred and eighty-nine thousand three hundred and sixteen pounds of cotton. In 1816, this same South Carolina called for more encouragement of her favorite staple; and although she exported to England, that year, eighty-one million seven hundred and forty-seven thousand one hundred and sixteen pounds, and the rate of duty then excluded all foreign cotton from our market, yet she, for her own benefit, obtained a law excluding from the American market East India cotton, imported in the form of cloth. Thus encouraged and protected, the South did, in 1830, export to England two hundred and ninety-eight millions of pounds, and sell to domestic manufacturers nearly eighty millions of pounds more of cotton.

What next? Why, sir, since South Carolina has declared herself independent, and Georgia has conquered the Cherokees, these two States, in the full blossom of their chivalry, have not only declared Charleston a free port; but have announced, by this bill, that their cotton shall hereafter be a free commodity until it reaches England, when they agree it may pay a tax for the benefit of the British treasury.

The Tariff Bill.

Sir, unless we save these wild, scheming politicians from themselves, they will ruin their own interest by their own mad policy. Can cotton be made free without injury to the production in the American market?

England now gets from the West Indies about	-	-	-	5,000,000 lbs.
From the East Indies	-	-	-	17,000,000
From Egypt,	-	-	-	6,000,000
From Brazil,	-	-	-	34,000,000
Total,	-	-	-	62,000,000

This amounts to almost as much as the United States exported in 1816. What shall hinder these regions from increasing their production as rapidly as the like production has been increased in the Southern States?

Cotton can be grown on a broad belt of region on both sides of the equator, up to perhaps thirty-eight degrees of latitude; but it is a mere annual plant without the tropics, and requires, in such parts of the globe, yearly planting. In Brazil, and the East Indies, it is a tree, and requires but little culture. The English have, within a few years, transmitted the best seeds to Hindostan; and the natives of that country, any one of whom can subsist a day on little more than a handful of rice, can work cheaper, and furnish this product, a perennial in their country, at a less cost than any other people. Brazil produces a species of cotton of a long, coarse staple, and as fit for cordage and sail cloth as hemp itself. If the impost be repealed, that cotton will be largely imported, and a new fabric to dress all our ships and vessels will be speedily wrought from it by our manufacturers. The jurisdiction of Egypt is now extended along the Levant through all Syria, and Ali Pacha, now the Sultan of that fruitful country, already knows the value, and will increase the amount of the cotton production in his own dominions. England has lately explored the course of the Niger to the ocean, and thus opened to her own commerce the rich and populous interior of Africa. Here is a country abounding in all tropical products, and especially in cotton.

A country west of our own is now in a course of settlement from all the free States. Texas is a part of Mexico, and, therefore, slavery will not be tolerated in that territory. It is, perhaps, the most fertile region on the earth, and is peculiarly adapted to the culture of cotton. In that region, one New England farmer (and many have migrated thither) will grow twelve bales of cotton in a summer. In fifteen years, the cotton production of the world will, as it has in the last fifteen, be increased more than threefold. What will be the price? At what can a Yankee of Texas, who raises with his own hand four thousand two hundred pounds a year, sell his cotton by the pound? At five cents, his crop will give him two hundred and ten dollars; at four, one hundred and sixty-six dollars; and at three, one hundred and twenty-six dollars. Sir, he will live and grow rich if he can sell his product at three cents a pound.

Let South Carolina have her will, and reduce all impost to fifteen per cent. ad valorem; the destruction of the sugar production of Louisiana, effected by this, will send into the cotton fields of that State seventy-five thousand laborers, and their annual production will not be less than six bales each on the rich lands of that State. This will annually throw into the market of the world one hundred and thirty-five millions of pounds of cotton.

The growers of cotton would do well to remember that their product has a rival, gradually gaining strength, and which must finally exclude a great proportion of the amount of cotton now used from the consumption of the world. It is not flax, nor hemp, nor wool, but it is the beautiful and durable filaments, drawn out and almost manufactured by the diligent little insect which seems to live for no other purpose than to feed and to work. Silk is increasing in every part of the country. Wherever the white mulberry, a most vigorous and hardy tree, can grow, there the silkworm may be fed, and made to work, and rendered productive. Men, women, and children, the old and the young, the feeble and the athletic, the rich and the poor—all may rear, and all are beginning to rear, either for profit or amusement, this beautiful production. In a few years, the raw material will be abundant in our country; and be assured that skill in the manufacture will keep pace with the raw production, and the fabric will, in time, be not more costly, if we regard its beauty or durability, than well-wrought cotton cloths. Sir, you well remember what we have all read, that silk cloth was, in the time of Augustus, equal in value, pound for pound, with the finest gold. The time, I am persuaded, will come, when, in our country, the ploughman will, as a matter of prudent economy, use silk cloth for his frock and trowsers.

Sir, the cotton of the South, if left unprotected, and exposed to so much other cotton competition, and when finally run against, in the market, by all the growers of silk, in every latitude and longitude of our whole country, must fall in price to less than the present amount of duty on the importation of it. No statesman, who regards the preservation of all the great interests of his country, would, at this time, remove the protection from cotton. Mountebanks in political economy, knights errant in free trade, and market politicians, may call for this repeal; and these men, who would suffer a little themselves, that they might be enabled to ruin others, may repeal protection on cotton, to obtain a repeal of it on wool, woollens, and on the manufacture of cotton and woollen cloths. The one would destroy the capital and free labor of the North; the other might injure, but could not ruin the wealthy owners and workers of Southern slaves. Shylock might lose his three thousand ducats, and still be rich as a Jew; but Antonio, when that Jew's knife had severed from his breast, and nearest to his heart, "the pound of flesh," would hardly have blood enough left to preserve his life.

Is the defence of our country, a part of our great system of protection, devised for security of the labor and capital of all the people? Then does this bill, anti-protection in its very principle, remove that defence. Destroy those interests, which have called the people together in cities, towns, villages, hamlets, near your waterfalls, bays, and harbors, and covered the agricultural districts, around them, with a dense population; and these people, like the oppressed Hebrews, while gathering straw, will be, in pursuit of labor and bread, scattered abroad, throughout all the land. Where will be your militia, once in the neighborhood of your fortifications, and ready to man them on the approach of the enemy? Gone, sir, dispersed; and, perhaps, on your other frontier, conflicting with the savages of the Western prairies. If your forts are defended, it must be by a standing army. At all events, the troops of your present military establishment must be recalled from those stations, in the South, where they have been located, to protect the master and his family from the insurrectionary spirit of his slaves.

To this protection, though hardly to be found in the constitution, the free people of the North have never objected. They have felt a deep and anxious interest in your safety. I know your Southern chivalry scoffs at all this, and holds our sympathy in utter derision. Be assured that I am not ignorant of the contempt you feel, and the scorn you express, when any New England man happens to speak of you, on this floor, in terms of fraternity. For myself, I claim brotherhood with no man; unless, by blood or affinity, I stand in that relation with him.

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

Be assured that I shall never affront any of your lofty feelings, by any expression of any relationship with any of you, other than that of citizenship and humanity. We are Americans, and we are men. There is no alienage between us. The freemen of the North, and I as one of them, claim it as a right, to desire the safety of all men. We will travel far, and labor hard, to achieve that safety for all the American people. If the safety of Southern planters cannot be secured without aid from the troops of the United States, that aid will not by us be refused for their protection.

It must, nevertheless, not be forgotten by them, that if we are at last to protect them, and their families, by armed force, they must not feel themselves at liberty to withdraw the protection of the laws from us and our labors. Under these conditions, the arm of our strength will always be near to you, and lifted up for your defence. Do not expect more from the working men of the North than can be performed by man. Dare you repeal the laws enacted for your protection? Will you break up the instruments of your labor and livelihood? Shall our free working men, with their wives and children, be turned, by you, into the world naked, and without shelter or food? Do you expect their sympathy will be alive to the cry of your distress, when their children cry to them for that bread which you have plucked from their mouths? When your wives and daughters fly from that servile brutality which has cloven down their husbands and brothers in their defence, can the shrieks of their agony reach the ear of those whom you have left out to the winter storms, in houseless nakedness and famine? The men whom you have maddened with the bitterness of that misery which you have heaped upon them, who, but for that, would die for your safety, will laugh when ruin visits your abodes; and shout and clap their hands, when the whirlwind of retribution sweeps through your land.

Sir, can it be expected that the free people of the North will be annually taxed, to purchase a protection for you, when you will not permit a law, which costs you nothing, to remain unrepealed in your statute book; because that law gives protection to the labor and the instruments of industry, by which they feed and clothe themselves and families? How do you hope to be secured in the possession of that labor, which gives you wealth, and enjoyment, and political power? How but by the provisions of that constitution, which makes us a nation, and protects your interests, by the whole power of our national arms? In no other christian nation are such rights as you enjoy in this country, made a part of the national polity, and secured by the provisions of the constitution. The spirit of emancipation is abroad in the earth. What is now doing in England, the most free and powerful nation on earth? Ay, sir, in England, to which, as it is said, some States in the South already look for aid against our own country? What question, as a test of political orthodoxy, is now put to a candidate, before he can be elected to the House of Commons? Are you for universal emancipation? What a test! Who would have dreamed of it twenty years ago? And yet more than four hundred and fifty Englishmen have been elected to Parliament, under that solemn pledge. How long will West India colonial slavery continue to exist, under the legislation of such a Parliament? Let South Carolina, or any or all the slaveholding States of the South, separate from the other States in this Union, and take or not take shelter under the arm of any European nation, and how long do you believe that, or the other nations of that continent, would permit slavery to exist among their republican allies? Sir, it cannot be disguised, nor should it be left untold, in this great question, that the very existence of that labor, in the South, for a more profitable condition of which those States are now struggling to destroy all the free labor of this country, does in fact depend on the protecting power and arms of that free labor. Take from them the shelter of the power and arms of the American people, whose common welfare they are striving to destroy; leave them with their slaves to themselves, for security and protection, and how would their labor differ, in ten years, from that of the West Indies and Mexico?

Remember, sir, man lives not by the voluntary bestowments of man. One Being only, in the universe, gives all, and always, and receives nothing. Men live by mutual aids. Something for something is the great law of reciprocity and exchange, throughout the world. Those who expect to receive, must be ready to bestow. Do the South expect a protection of their labor from the North, then let them be ready to bestow what they cannot want, and not receive without utter ruin.

Sir, it has been seen that one branch of our great system of encouragement and protection, provided by our laws and policy for aiding the labor of our country, is the national coin and currency, sustained by the institution of the United States Bank. It does almost seem as if men imagined our country might be too prosperous, and that a wholesome adversity would relieve and refresh, and, perhaps, preserve the nation. Under the advisement of some such wild imagining, the coin and currency have, by refusing to recharter that bank, been given up to the power of the States. In place of one, we shall have twenty-four regulators of coin and currency in our country. What will they more resemble than so many wooden clocks, made in so many different shops, and carried to market by an equal number of tin pedlars? Each State will have its own system of making currency. How will it, as it is now, be kept at one great national level? There must be at least twenty-four different levels, in all the different States. Will there not be as many different rates of exchange between State and State? Money may be, and will be, at different rates of abundance or scarcity in one State, from what it may be in another. The great movements of the travel and commerce of our country must pass from one of these levels to another; and it will pass very much as boats are locked up and down through a canal, in some very uneven country. Every lock will be encumbered, not only with much delay, but also with a heavy toll of exchange.

Already enormous State institutions are forming. You will soon see these leviathans of factious wealth rolling, and wallowing, and spouting in oceans of paper; and that, too, quite as valuable, gallon for gallon, as the deep sea water blown out through the spiracles of their kindred monsters, when they come up to visit the sunshine on the surface of their own element.

How will this various currency affect your revenue? Will those who ply that revenue pay, in the same number of dollars, an equal exchangeable value? Not so. The currency may differ in value from six to ten per cent. between Boston and New Orleans; and men who pay, each of them, bonds, at these two places, of equal amount, and on the same day, may, in paying ten thousand dollars, pay sums differing, in value, from 600 to $1,600. Will it not be precisely so with those to whom this revenue is disbursed? Your public servants, men, all equally diligent and faithful in the service, shall, at different places, receive very different rates of compensation. These evils cannot and will not be endured; and the Government medium, the currency for paying the revenue, must be gold and silver coined into money. Will this remedy the evil? No. For gold and silver must rise and fall in value according to their abundance or scarcity; and so long as bank paper bills are convertible into dollars at the pleasure of their holders, so long will the abundance or scarcity of these bills affect the value of them, and of coined money, which is their basis. The evil has no remedy in the nature of things, except by the restoration of that bank which this new policy is about to destroy, or by the establishment of another national institution on the same principles.

The Tariff Bill.

One other part of our great national system, as it relates to the public lands, is to be destroyed by that new policy, of which this bill forms so considerable a part. These lands are to be sold under a graduated price; or, if not so wasted, and lost to the nation, they are to be distributed and conveyed to the several States where they are located. By the first project, the total quantity of perhaps 200,000,000 acres of land is to be graduated at a price, first 125, second 100, third 75, fourth 50, and fifth 35 cents an acre. All which shall not be sold the first year at 125 cents, will be offered the second at 100; if not then sold, at 75, and so on till the fifth year, when all are to be struck off at 25 cents an acre. Does it require a prophet, or the son of a prophet, to inform us that we shall sell no lands during the first four years; and that, for the whole, we can never obtain more per acre than twenty-five cents? Thus, a fund now worth, at least, $225,000,000, will be sacrificed for $25,000,000.

The other proposition is still more unjust and ruinous. It disposes of all these lands to the States where they lie; and that for no consideration at all to be paid to the nation. This part of the policy, although but two months old, is already in its dotage. It proposes to give the whole estate to the youngest children, who helped to earn nothing of it. Shall our half; nay, shall all our goods be thus given, to be wasted in the meretricious prodigality of speculation? Sir, first or last, under either of these provisions of the new policy, all these lands will fall into the hands of sharpers in this trade; the speculators of this or other countries will obtain the control of this immense territory; and your great land market, now governed by wisdom and liberality, in favor of the genuine settlers from all parts of the country, will fall into the hands of a gigantic land company; and its movements will be governed by all the tyrannical principles of an overwhelming monopoly.

Sir, let us again return more immediately to that part of the new policy which is comprehended in the provisions of this measure. This bill has been called, and very justly called, the submission bill. It is, indeed, more; for we must give up all our great system of protection for free labor in our own country to the slave policy—the mere cotton-growing policy; and then adopt that policy in our intercourse with foreign nations. What is this policy? Your pure cotton planter makes all for market. He sells all which he makes, and buys all which he consumes. Pass this bill, and, so far as it abandons protection, you adopt this cotton-growing policy. You abandon manufacturing labor, return to the mere culture of the soil; and you expect to sell the production of your agricultural labor to foreign nations, and to purchase from them your manufactured fabrics.

Sir, excessive importation has been the curse of our country. Not to mention many intervening years, let every man call to mind the ruin which covered our country, from these excessive importations, after the revolutionary war, and, in like manner, after the last war; and then you may conjecture, with sufficient certainty, what will come upon us, by the same cause, from the adoption of the policy of this bill.

If you cease to manufacture your own fabrics, and import them from foreign countries, you must pay for them; and in what products can this payment be made: in wheat, in corn, in flour? England and France buy no foreign breadstuffs unless famine press hard upon them, and compel the purchase. In that event, the fertile lands and abundant harvests of all Europe are nearer to their market, and will fill and crowd that market with abundance before we can arrive in their ports. Will you pay in fish, in oil, in bone, or provisions, or sugar? These are all prohibited in Europe, or excluded by prohibitory duties. Will you pay in cotton, rice, and tobacco? Why do you not pay the balance now against us in these products? Simply because those nations want no more of them; and, therefore, if you send out double, nay, ten times the amount in quantity, that augmented quantity will bring no greater amount of money. Your national debt will have been paid and cancelled, and you will have no stocks of that kind wherewith to pay. Your United States Bank stocks are going out of existence. You must, like all other honest men, pay your debts for your foreign importations in coin, and that money which is in your State banks, and is the great basis of your currency. Every silver dollar drawn from these vaults must withdraw four dollars from your currency in circulation, every million must withdraw four millions, and every ten millions must take out of circulation forty millions of your currency. Such a reduction of the quantity must bring on a scarcity of money, and thus diminish the money price of all our products. What effect will this have on your outstanding debts, contracted for the purchase of imported manufactures? You pay, in a currency worth from five to forty per cent. more, dollar for dollar, than it was when you made your purchase. Let those who shall aid in bringing such a state of things on our country not be unmindful that the betrayers and ruiners of nations never escape the wrath of man, nor the righteous displeasure of God.

Sir, this bill is brought before us as a mere revenue measure. Its enactment is required of us, not for any benefit to the people, but simply "to supply the wants of Government." The Ways and Means Committee tell us that they can dispense with the tariff of 1828 and of 1832, and give up all protective legislation. Just give us, say they, fifteen millions of dollars only: that is all.

In God's name, I say piously, and not profanely, no matter how little, if nothing is to be done by it for the people. Will not the people soon learn that Government is doing nothing for them? Will they not discover that their own magistrates, under their own laws, in their own State, can and do secure them in life, liberty, and property? And will they not, when this Government ceases to visit them with its benefits in the encouragement and protection of their labor, will they not learn that it is a Government of burdens, and not to be supported at the cost of continual taxation—and that merely to keep on foot the pride of national establishment, and the parade of congressional legislation, the power of judicial decision, and the array of Executive departments? Sir, permit me to repeat what I have said here five years ago: "Whenever this Government comes to live by mere taxation on the people, it will speedily expire, or cease to have any efficient existence. You may, for a while, or at times by extraordinary appliances, give to it seeming vitality, but it will not be wholesome and efficient animation, but merely a succession of convulsions and grimaces, such as a galvanic battery may give to the naked carcass of an executed felon."

A bill to supply the wants of Government! What are they? Fifteen millions will cover them. Let us, for a moment, examine this measure. Will it supply those wants? I think it may be demonstrated that this bill will not, if enacted, raise fifteen, or even twelve and a half millions. In determining this inquiry, we should first examine and ascertain the probable amount of importation, and then the rate of impost, according to this bill.

Our consumption of foreign commodities must be governed in its amount by our export of domestic production. What has that been from 1818 up to this time? Of domestic products, we exported, in round numbers—

By this export our consumption of foreign commodities must be, in some degree, governed; for whatever we may import, we must export it again, if we cannot furnish domestic production enough to pay for it. What has been the amount of our importation since 1821?

It was in that year,	-	-	-	-	62,000,000

Of this amount of importation, more or less is annually exported, according as our domestic exports, with the profit on their sale in foreign countries, and the amount of freight, may enable us to use and consume foreign products. We generally send abroad one-fifth part of our importation; but, in 1831, nearly one-fourth was exported.

What is the average rate of duty by this bill? On sugar, from thirty to one hundred, in some cases two hundred per cent.; on hammered bar iron, thirty; rolled, eighty; on cast iron, fifty; and on hardware, thirty per cent. Capital will not be employed in excessive importation of these commodities when others are free, or encumbered by a light duty only. Cotton is free, and, doubtless, two millions will be employed in importing that product. Indigo, under a heavy duty, was imported last year to the amount of 900,000 dollars. If this bill go into operation, not less than that amount will be used in the importation of indigo. Cotton yarn is ten per cent. and coarse wool is free. At least 2,000,000 dollars will be employed in the importation of these commodities.

What, under all these circumstances, will be the average rate of duty under this bill, should it be made a law? It is called a bill to reduce the duty on imports: it should then render them less than they are by the law of July, 1832. By that law, the rate of duty on all importations is twenty-one per cent.; by this, twenty per cent. should not be exceeded.

Suppose our importation be 84,500,000 dollars, one-sixth part of all this is, by the laws anterior to last July, free of duty. Call this, though it is more, 14,000,000; this leaves 70,500,000. By the law of last session, and by this bill, 3,000,000 dollars more are made free of duty; this, deducted, leaves 67,500,000. One-fifth part of the whole importation is usually exported: this amounts to 16,900,000 dollars; but from this should be deducted one-sixth part of the free goods, equal to 2,300,000 dollars, leaving 13,600,000 dollars to be deducted from the last balance. This leaves 53,900,000 dollars. Deduct from this sum the capital likely to be employed in the importation of cotton, indigo, wool, and cotton yarn, amounting to 4,900,000 dollars, and the amount left, on which to charge your average duty, as you must admit, but twenty per cent., will be 49,000,000 dollars. At that rate of duty you will realize from this importation 9,800,000 dollars of revenue. Should your importation rise up to 87,000,000 dollars, you might realize a revenue of 10,300,000 dollars. If you raise imports by this bill to thirty per cent., and do not obtain more than 84,500,000 dollars of annual importation, your revenue will not exceed 14,700,000 dollars.

One deduction further, after all those already made, must be made from the amount of revenue to be produced and brought into the treasury by this measure. South Carolina has ordained the non-payment hereafter of all revenue. A State so burdened with import! A State so burdened with export, paying 40 per cent. on $7,000,000 of exported cotton, equal to 2,800,000 dollars, and 60 per cent. on a like amount of imports, equal to 4,200,000 dollars; what could she do under such a load of taxation? Seven millions annually! How can the nation exist, and want such a large portion of all the public revenue? It must be surrendered, however: for South Carolina has taken her stand behind her own ordinance, and on the eternal bottom of her own reserved rights, her indomitable sovereignty. She has—let who will pay for the music of Government, she has resolved, henceforth, to keep all her own money in her own pocket. What will the loss be to the treasury? What it might be, we cannot tell; but we can ascertain what this mother of all chivalry did pay in 1831. The foreign imports of that State were, in that year, 1,238,133 dollars. Of this, 46,596 dollars were exported, and 1,191,537 dollars left; on this, after deducting one-sixth part free; duty was paid into the treasury. Say the amount was 1,200,000 dollars, the deduction for free goods, one-sixth part, or 200,000 dollars, and a duty of 21 per cent. was paid on this 1,000,000 dollars of foreign importations; this duty equalled 210,000 dollars, and this amount must be deducted from your revenue of 10,300,000: for, according to the new tariff made by the ordinance of South Carolina, that State will hereafter pay no more revenue to the United States. You will, therefore, have a clear revenue, under this bill, of 10,100,000 dollars, and no more. It must be admitted that the blank left in the revenue account by this famous ordinance does not create, if I may be allowed the phrase, a very great void in the treasury; but this State seems to think it is wise and honorable, the less money she has to pay, to make the more noise at the payment of it. Rhode Island, with less than a fifth part of the population of South Carolina, and with not a fortieth part of the land, has annually paid into the treasury more than this amount, to avoid the payment of which, South Carolina, with all her chivalry, now wages war with the United States.

Sir, we are told that diminished imports, under the provisions of this bill, will set at liberty 12,000,000 dollars; and that our present quantity of imported commodities being reduced, in cost, by that amount, we can import and consume 12,000,000 more of those commodities. This additional importation, as we are told, will give us an addition to our revenue. If our imported merchandise cost us 12,000,000 dollars less, is it certain that we shall expend this amount in such importation? This sum will not be in the hands of importing merchants. They now import, we will suppose, 85,000,000 dollars in commodities suitable to our market. They add to this amount, say 24,000,000, being the amount of duties under the law of 1828. To this whole amount they add, first, the cost of importation, and then their profits. They secure the payment of the duties at the custom-house, by their bonds, at six, eight, and twelve months' credit. The whole amount, including duties, is then sold to wholesale merchants, at a like credit, of six, eight, and twelve months. These wholesale dealers sell to retail merchants, on a similar credit; and these retail merchants sell and distribute the whole to their customers, the ultimate consumers of these imported commodities. The consumer pays the whole amount, profit, importation, and impost; and each dealer, in the whole succession, pays his creditor, until the money secured at the custom-house by the importer, and charged by him upon this merchandise, comes to his hands, from the consumers, and he pays the amount into the custom-house, and takes up his bond.

The Tariff Bill.

The next year these goods will be charged, for duties, with 12,000,000 less in amount. Importers will give bonds for 12,000,000 less; they will sell for 12,000,000 less; and consumers will pay 12,000,000 less for their imported commodities. This amount, this 12,000,000, will not come into the hands of importers as a capital, to be used in importation, but will remain in the hands of all the millions of consumers, in all parts of the United States, to be reserved by them out of that part of their revenue, and set apart by them the last year, for consumption, and will be added, if they choose to do so, to their productive capital. A part of this reserved 12,000,000 will be in the hands of agricultural, a part in the hands of mechanic, a part in the hands of manufacturing consumers. A portion will belong to those who work the forests, a portion to the laborers in the fisheries, and another portion will remain with all those who move the coasting and internal trade of the whole country. A portion, it is true, will be in the hands of the importing merchants; but that portion will be, in respect to the whole, as the consumption of those importers is in respect to the whole consumption of the nation in such imported commodities. The portion of the importing merchant may be used in importation, but the portions of all others will, most probably, be employed as capital, in some kind of domestic production. It is, therefore, very improbable that $12,000,000 saved, if it should be saved, from imported consumption, will be employed in foreign importation, and thereby increase your revenue.

Suppose, however, the attempt were made to extend our foreign importation to the amount of $12,000,000. If you import, you must export, to pay for your imports. What would you send abroad, and to whom would you send it? Who wants, or who will buy of you any more of your products of the seas, or of the forests, or of your fields, for food, either animal or vegetable? Can you sell more tobacco? Sir, this crop is at its maximum. No quantity sent out will bring home any more money. Would you, if you could sell it, push the culture one acre further? It is, of all plants, most exhausting to the land. The march of an army of locusts, described in the language of inspiration, most of all resembles the progress of this deleterious plant: "Before it, is a fruitful field; behind it, barrenness and desolation."

Will you export more cotton? Can you get more money for it, if you send out more millions of pounds? Perhaps for a few years you may; but this product, also, has nearly reached the maximum of price which the consumption of the world will give, or, indeed, can give, for any quantity whatever.

The wants of nations are limited by two impassable barriers: the one is their power to consume, the other is their power to pay. Quantity, no matter how much, thrown into the market, cannot, when that quantity has reached either of these limits, increase value or market price.

Nature has fixed a limit to our power to consume, both of needful food and of needful clothing. We may render our food more costly and luxurious, but we cannot so distend our animal organs as to very much increase the quantity. It is, in a great measure, so with our clothing—the quantity cannot be increased, though the quality may be rendered more expensive. The great mass of consumers, the labor, and industry, and economy of the world, are limited in their wants, both by the prudence of their necessities, and by the amount of their means of payment.

Vanity—it need not be called human vanity, for, of all animals, it is said none but our race are comforted by this distinguishing attribute of vanity—vanity has no limit to its capacity for dress and ornament. The dandies and belles of the world would consume, on the adornment of their persons, the labor of the universe, the wealth of all generations. We are told, I believe, by Tacitus, that the daughter of a Roman proconsul attended a levee of Tiberius, adorned at a cost of 500,000 pounds sterling. Have we not seen, and that frequently, the very affectionate daughters of very indulgent fathers enter the ball room, and waltz, and cotillon, ornamented with several hundred bales of cotton in each sleeve of their dress? These ornaments are, almost exclusively, the labor of the human hand. One pound of Flanders flax, worth twelve cents, is often worked up into a commodity equal, in market value, to 200 pounds sterling; and one pound of sea island cotton, worth thirty cents, may, when wrought into laces or lawns, bring 60 pounds. England exports 70,000,000 yards of lace; but four ounces of cotton are manufactured into thirty yards of it. The dress of the beauty, the fashion, and the vanity of our race is often as filmy, as immaterial, and as translucent as the same quantity of summer moonshine. Your cotton exportation may not be very much benefited by this kind of consumption.

If the twelve millions received from the consumption of foreign imports, by this measure, should be added to the capital of the country, and employed in domestic production of all kinds, about three-fifths parts of it would be fixed in the instruments of labor; and the other remain circulating, and to be annually consumed and reproduced with, as it may be, some profit. What part of this consumption would be of foreign, what of domestic products? and what part of this production would be made for export, and what for the domestic market? At most, not more than three millions of dollars could be exported and exchanged for commodities paying a duty when imported. On this, under the act of July 14, 1832, at a duty of twenty-one per cent. on such as would be dutiable, you might realize four hundred thousand dollars of additional revenue. According to the statement made at the treasury, on the 26th of July last, the bill of the 14th of the same July will, on an importation of seventy million eight hundred thousand dollars, yield a revenue of twelve million one hundred and one thousand dollars. Add this last item to that statement, and you will realize under the law, enacted after so much labor and deliberation at the last session, just twelve million five hundred and one thousand dollars; a fraction more than the amount which, in addition to the land revenue of two million five hundred thousand, it is said, will be wanted by the Government. Where, then, is the want of a further reduction of the rate of impost? It is idle to pretend it. If this bill tell truth in its title, and really will reduce the rate of duties on imports, there will be a deficiency, unless we have an over importation. The bill before us must, therefore, be predicated on the continuance of the over importation of the two last years. It is true, we may import one hundred millions of dollars, but it must be for re-exportation, and not for consumption in the country. What does the domestic market require? The importation and exportation of 1830 completely answer the question.

The Thrift Bill.

In that year, we exported	-	-	$70,876,920
Of that amount, were exported	-	-	14,387,470
Of which exports—
Cottons were	-	-	$1,500,000
Woollens	-	-	250,000
Iron and steel, and fabrics	-	- of each	-	-	150,000
Teas	-	-	892,807
Coffee	-	-	1,046,542
Total,			$3,839,349

In 1830, therefore, your market was over supplied in cottons, woollens, iron, steel, hardware, tea, coffee; and you exported more than three million seven hundred thousand dollars of these commodities, paying the highest rate of duties. Besides all this, you exported in that year, of—

Domestic cottons	-	-	$1,300,000
Domestic iron, and manufactures of it, and of steel,	-	-	300,000
Total,			$1,600,000

What, sir, in future years, will increase our disposition or capacity to consume, or our power to pay for foreign commodities? If, therefore, importation over and above the amount made in 1830 has been, or shall hereafter be made, it has been done for exportation, and to increase our carrying trade for other nations; because they cannot work so cheap, or will not work for so small profits as our navigators and merchants. Will demand be made during the next six years by the increase of population for any further increase of importation? Sir, be pleased to look at the over importations of 1831 and 1832. In the first, 38, and in the second, $30,000,000; and in both years, $63,000,000 over and above the import of 1830. In that year you exported $14,000,000 only; but in 1831 you exported $20,000,000; and in 1832, $24,000,000. This is $17,000,000 over the average export of 1830. Still, after all this, a surplus is left in the country, over and above the consumption of that year; a surplus equal to $43,000,000. This is more than $6,000,000 a year for the next coming six years, and will more than cover any demand, yearly to be made, by the increase of population. There can surely be no new demand for increased importation of cottons and woollens; for $17,000,000 of the excessive importations of those two last years were made in those fabrics. Let it not be forgotten that the import of 1831 was $103,000,000; the export $81,000,000; and thus there was left in the country an unpaid for excess of $22,000,000. In 1832, the import was $100,000,000, and the export $87,000,000; and thus, also, was left a balance unpaid for, of 13,000,000. In both years, the total balance unpaid was $35,000,000. Some part of this, perhaps $5,000,000, might be profits and freights; but a very large part was, and is, a debt outstanding against the future exportation of the country. We must, therefore, undoubtedly produce and send to England, where this debt is almost wholly due, at least 5,000,000 dollars a year for the next six years, to liquidate the principal of this debt, if we say not any thing whatever about the interest.

Where, then, is the statesman, who looks quite through all the great interests of this nation; and who, with all these facts under his eye, can believe that the American people can import and consume in each year, during the six years now immediately to come, 30,000,000 dollars more than was imported and consumed in 1830? Where, then, is the wisdom of settling our scheme of revenue on the hope of such ruinous importation?

If our consumption do not require more foreign commodities, and such are imported to the amount of 12,000,000 dollars, these commodities, if consumed in the country, and not exported, must ultimately displace and exclude from our national consumption and market 12,000,000 of domestic productions. Suppose our market require 48,000,000 of cotton and woollen fabrics annually, and, when fairly supplied, afford a profit of 7 per cent. equal to 3,360,000 dollars. Then let foreign fabrics, of those kinds, be imported, equal in amount to 12,000,000 more, and crowded into the same market for sale. Will not price fall in proportion to the over supply? That over supply amounts to one-fifth part. Price must, therefore, fall one-fifth part, or 20 per cent. The whole 60,000,000 will bring no more than 48 would have brought, for 48,000,000 was all the cotton and woollen goods which were wanted. That amount of money was all which the nation would or could pay for their supply of those fabrics; and they would give precisely as much money for enough, as they would give for any quantity more than enough. If the keeper of an inn informs a traveller that he will furnish him with one good dinner for one dollar, but, as he has plenty of provision, he will sell him two for one dollar and twenty-five cents; the traveller wants but one dinner, can eat but one dinner; and if the keeper put twenty dinners on the table, he will pay but for one. If, therefore, 12,000,000 of cottons and woollens, in foreign fabrics, be added to your market, a loss must take place equal to that amount. This would fall on the domestic and foreign producers, according to the supply furnished by them respectively; 2,400,000 to the foreign, and 9,600,000 to the domestic producer. Would this increase or diminish domestic production? and what effect would it have on our power to import and consume foreign commodities?

Twelve millions lost the first year, and this loss repeated, by a yearly over import of twelve millions of dollars, during six years, and you will find seventy-two millions of dollars have been lost by this war of importation, made against the manufacturing labor of the country. One-fifth, or fourteen million four hundred thousand dollars, is lost by foreigners; and four-fifths, or fifty-seven million six hundred thousand dollars, by Americans. This would dispose of the whole, if not more than the whole, circulating capital now employed in those two branches of our domestic production. Is this to be the effect? Was it the final cause of this bill? Does it, by reduced duties, tempt men to make excessive importations in any other commodities? Look at the provisions of it. On cotton yarns, a duty of ten per cent.; on woollen yarns, a duty of fifteen; on coarse woollen cloths, five per cent.; on all other woollens, and on all cottons, twenty per cent. import. Last summer, we were told that import on cottons and woollens was sixty-three per cent.; but more than twenty-seven millions in those commodities were imported in 1831. Was not this bill, with these reduced and pitiful rates of duty, calculated and fitted to increase those importations up to twelve millions of dollars more, and thereby secure the utter ruin of those productions in the United States?

Do not inquire after the paternity of such a measure; for who would declare its generation? It is of dark and demoniac origin, and was named at no holy fount. It received a foul baptism in "the abhorred Styx, the flood of deadly hate." Why this glozing title, "a bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports?" In the form of its enactments, it is as classically British as at and after the rate of five dollars for every one hundred dollars value thereof. In its cotton and woollen provisions, Manchester and Leeds themselves could not have devised measures more purely English. Let it be entitled a bill to aid Old in the ruin of New England, to avenge those brave men slain by Yankees at Lexington and Bunker Hill, and for certain other purposes.

If diminished impost increase importation and consumption of foreign commodities, and thereby diminish the consumption of domestic products, then this diminished rate of impost is a regulation of commerce for the discouragement of American, and the encouragement of foreign industry. Twelve millions of dollars more are to be used for imports. This excludes the products of twelve millions of American, and brings into our market those of English labor and capital to an equal amount. "The neighboring powers" of the South tell us that all congressional enactments for the encouragement of American labor and capital are utterly unconstitutional; but to this bill they neither express nor feel any such objections; because, though it is a bill for encouragement, yet does it transfer that encouragement from American labor and capital, where it was originally placed by the Hamiltons, the Madisons, and the Ellsworths, the great founders of our system; and, under the advisement of the Coopers and Calhouns of these degenerate days, it gives that same encouragement to the labor and capital of England.

Must we indeed make this sacrifice to the Moloch of disunion, now blowing his fires, and heating his furnace, in the distant South? Barbarian and ruthless god! Will he not spare his own devotees? The State of Maine holds three millions of dollars in cottons, in wool, and in woollens; while all her foreign import trade does not exceed five hundred and eighty thousand dollars. New Hampshire has five million five hundred thousand dollars in cottons, and two millions in wool and woollens; and all her foreign commerce of importation hardly equals two hundred thousand dollars annually. How many men, women, and children, in these two States, earn their bread and clothing, and shelter themselves from the winter storms of New England, by their daily labor in these manufacturing vocations? All these must not only be sacrificed to this consuming deity of disunion, but he demands that their own neighbors and familiar friends, placed here for their preservation by their unsuspecting confidence, the congressional delegation from those two States, shall bind the victims, and with their own hands lift the sacrificial knife; and, as a devoted priesthood, do all other barbarous rites of his altar.

Sir, we are sometimes told that this is a mere revenue measure—an assessment of taxes on the people of the United States. If so, it should have exercised care and honest diligence, and, by its provisions, equalized the burdens of those people. Examine those provisions: look at iron. Where is that commodity in the greatest abundance consumed? In New England. First, in our agriculture; the rocks of our region, when they do not rise above, come nearly up to the surface. That surface is, in most parts of that region, thickly set with chip stone. Our hoes can rarely strike a blow, or our ploughs or harrows move a foot, without encountering either a solid rock, or some fragment of flint, quartz, or granite. The feet of our working cattle and horses are, from necessity, continually covered with iron and steel; and in winter this must often be removed, sharpened, and replaced, to sustain these laborious animals on their feet in their movements over the ice. You, of the South, call New England "the land of ships." What, like a ship, is so nailed, and spiked, and bolted, and cabled, and anchored, with iron? Our factories, from the water-wheel to the card, the spindle, and loom, are not only fastened and covered, but literally fabricated from iron and steel. Our mechanics—But I forbear. Who does not know that we cannot move in our labors in the forests, the fields, the workshops, or on the ocean, unless armed, from head to heel, in these productions of the mines and forges of foreign nations, as well as of our own country? Sir, New England annually consumes twenty times as much iron and steel as all the seven anti-protection States. Massachusetts, nay, the little State of Rhode Island, uses up, in farming, in manufacturing, and in navigation and commerce, ten times as much iron and steel annually as is consumed in all her labors by the great nullification State of South Carolina. What are the duties on iron? At what a rate of taxation does New England get her supply of this commodity? By this bill, the tax on hammered bar iron, and on all the fabrics made from of it, is thirty per cent. On cast iron it is fifty per cent., and on rolled bar iron it is eighty-one per cent.

Where does the labor of our country consume sugar? In the same devoted land of New England. What is the rate of tax on sugar? If it cost abroad, as much of it does, one cent a pound, the tax is 200 per cent.; if two cents, 100; if three cents, 75; if four, 50; and if five, 30 per cent.

What is the tax on tea? Thirty per cent.; and the laborer of New England is the great consumer and payer of this tax. What is the tax on coffee? Ten per cent.; and the wealth and leisure, not the labor of the South, are the great consumers. Sir, I do remember a widow in New England, now of more than threescore and ten years; the husband of her youth fell at the battle of Eutaw, by the side of Green. Her only son, as brave a seaman as ever gave canvass to the wind, was one of those gallant men who rowed Perry from the wreck of the Lawrence, and placed him on that deck which bore him successfully, and in triumph through that war on the waters of Erie. Here he received a ball in his breast, which, fixed in his side, finally carried him to his grave, whither his bereaved mother followed him, and his wife also, in 1824. They left two little orphans, a son and a daughter, one of them now twelve and the other fourteen years old. These affectionate and grateful children now work in a factory, and feed and support their aged grandmother. Look into her cottage, sir, as I have done: it is the abode of neatness, humble comfort, and pious resignation and hope. She will offer you the hospitality (it is all she can) of her frugal table. Her bread is coarse, but sweetened by the affection of those who have earned it for her; her tea is brown bobas, but she has paid a tax of 30 per cent. upon the humble beverage; her sugar is of the darkest shade and the cheapest quality, but she has paid a tax of 200 per cent. on its cost in the West Indies. She will, after the humble repast, present to you, if you will receive it, the clean, white, sociable pipe, and the Virginia weed prepared in the best style of Richmond; but this indulgence has come to her use under a protecting tax of 125 per cent.

You, sir, have also seen the Southern planter served with his evening coffee at a tax of ten per cent., with sugar, double refined, at but one-fourth the tax paid on the cheapest brown; and each utensil, with its rich contents, presented to the wealthy master by a separate slave, and all dressed by their owner in fabrics at a tax of but five per cent. Are you not ready to exclaim, as the Saviour of the world exclaimed in a like case, "Verily this poor widow hath cast more into the treasury than they all!" Notwithstanding this, sir, you have heretofore, and that right often, heard this hall echo with the voice of complaint made here by those very men, and, as we were assured, for the benefit of the poor; nor could Iscariot himself, should he come to a resurrection, and call to us from the foot of the gallows, be either more loud or more sincere in their behalf.

Sir, is there no protection in this bill? Yes, in truth is there. Iron, the product of the mines and the forges of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania, and New York, and New Jersey, is perfectly protected in all those markets of the United States where it can come in competition with the foreign commodity. Sugar, the product of Louisiana and Southern Georgia, is also protected; and, by this provision of the bill, the cotton, rice, and tobacco production of all the South is protected against all the capital and labor now employed in the production of sugar. Wool, woollens, and cottons, the productions of New England, are left at the mercy of foreign competition. In nothing is the hostility of this measure against New England so conspicuous as in the reduction of the duty on nails from five to three cents the pound. Making cut nails is a New England, a Rhode Island invention. I well knew the man who invented the machine, which, after many improvements, now performs this work so perfectly, that our market is supplied with nails at five and a half cents per pound, where, before this art was invented, their cost was not less than fifteen cents. Jeremiah Wilkinson, of Cumberland, was the inventor, an honest man, of infinite industry. He was never idle, never stood still, when any thing of use could be done. He was as untiring as the little insect, that pattern of industry, which you sometimes see running up and down in the morning on the fore-stick of your fire. This man planted more trees than any other man of his time, and has left to his sons his farms, his fruit trees, and, more than all, his excellent character, and his excellent habits of life.

This trade of nail making is carried on with ceaseless labor in Rhode Island, and in that part of Massachusetts which once was the colony of Plymouth. Foreign iron has been mostly used, but lately these men have brought iron from the mineral region of Tennessee, by the way of New Orleans; and a hope was entertained that, if they were thus relieved from the duty on foreign iron, they could afford their nails, perhaps, for four cents a pound. They knew their invention had been pirated from the Patent Office, and sold in England; but they never dreamed that Congress would aid the English purchasers of their patent by such a measure as this bill has furnished, for the encouragement of British labor and capital. The revenue had no concern in this matter. No importation of nails, unless for exportation, could be made, when the duty was five cents, and the American nails were sold for five and a half. This reduction of the duty to three cents could answer no other purpose than to enable the English to make cut nails from their cheap, coarse rolled iron; and thus ruin this New England trade, by the importation of a flood of this foreign article, so brittle that they will almost break by the wind of the blow, before the hammer can reach the end of them; and yet so cheap, that the market for New England nails may be ruined by their importation. This measure was not placed in this bill to reduce the revenue, but to destroy the American product, and make room for the English.

What will the nation, what will the world, what will history and posterity say, concerning these arrangements and set-offs? They will say, unless she reject this bill with scorn, that Pennsylvania is purchased by the protection on her iron, to aid in the ruin of New England. They will say, unless she set her foot on the bill, that New York has been paid by the electoral vote of Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia. They will moreover say, (and who can contradict the saying?) that Virginia has been purchased by a patent to manufacture bituminous coal, pigtail and negro head tobacco.

What does this destroying and reconciling measure effect for South Carolina? South Carolina, instructed by her English oracle ten years ago, believes now, as he told her then, that cotton will never be imported into Charleston until coals shall be imported into Newcastle. What does she gain? She gets her will; and what term-giant would not be satisfied by such a boon? Her war of free trade, secured behind the bales of her great staple, like that of New Orleans, is triumphant; and, what is still more delightful, is triumphant against the hero himself of New Orleans. She nullifies; and then she, by her parade of war and menace, compels him to recommend this bill; and you, by enacting it, to repeal your tariff, and abolish your whole system of protection.

She may then look from her own desolate fields on the kindred desolation of her whole country. She will, as she hopes, be avenged on New England prosperity; and pay the debt of gratitude due from the Tories of 1782, to the memory of Green by the ruin of his native State.

She will do more. She will raise a monument more lofty, if not more enduring, than that of Washington, to her favorite son, once the ardent advocate, now the remorseless enemy of protection; the successful wielder, if not the discoverer of nullification; and the second illustrious founder of Southern supremacy.

What matter for the overthrow of his country! Did not chaos exclaim, "Havoc, and spoil, and ruin are my gain!" And did not the lust of power respond, "To reign, though in hell, is worth ambition?"

What have you done, sir, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, what have you done for New England? New England, the landing place of the pilgrims; the cradle of American independence; New England, the blood of whose sons has fertilized so many Southern, and consecrated so many Northern fields. What, I demand of you, have you done, in all your wise provisions, for New England? You have left undemolished—what could you else?—her rivers and rocks, her mountains and winter storms; and, O how courteous! you have not taken away from her the curse of exterior influence, and interior treachery.

You may triumph, you cannot subdue; New England labor, like New England valor, can never be subdued.

You of the South have essayed every scheme and shift of policy. Your embargo lashed our ships to the wharves until their shrouds fell from the masts. Your non-intercourse and war locked up in warehouse the staple of our commerce, which had been purchased, and long paid for to you; and even New Orleans was defended by the cotton of New England. By your tariff of 1816, you called on New England to sacrifice the rich East India commerce of Salem, of Boston, of Rhode Island, and Connecticut, to what then you denominated a much greater interest—the national independence and the common welfare.

Not have our primary interests alone excited your hostility. Every blight of calumny has been blown over the character of New England, by Southern slander. For our attachment to Washington, and the principles and policy of Washington, we have been calumniated and denounced as monarchists, English partisans, and Tories.

Plots, the vile brood of malice, have been hatched under Southern incubation, and fledged for flight, and, with our own money, bought up and sent out into the world, like flocks of harpies, that by their impurities they might make foul the good name and untarnished patriotism of New England.

The low, vulgar abuse of the employments, the trades, and character of Yankees, is consecrated, and sent abroad in the world, in the posthumous publications of the successor and political rival of Washington. In tenpenny pamphlets, lately published by one of the great men of that rival, New England is again set down as traitorously trading, during the last war, with the enemy in English Government bills.

Sir, let me tell these men, the genius of New England is not thus to be overthrown. You may, if I may allude to the wrestling ring, you may, by some trick, foil, you may bring him to a knee, but never will you have power to lay him on the back.

Place New England on a region of rock, without earth or water, our labor shall drill the solid stone, and, like the staff of the prophet, let out the gushing stream. Our perseverance shall beat the flint into small dust, and cover the whole surface with soil. The dews, and the rain, and the sunshine of heaven, the only creatures of God left by you, in amity with us, shall give to our new earth moisture and fertility; and time, and labor, and God's blessings, shall cover the whole region with verdure, with plants and trees, with cornfields and gardens, pastures and meadows.

What has all this perpetually labored and cunningly devised trans-Potomac policy benefited its votaries? This system of change and vacillation? This cotton and tobacco economy? This toil for perpetual exportation of the sweat of your goaded labor, and the fertility of your hard driven lands? Look into your own speeches, both on this floor and elsewhere; are they not filled with fields scourged down to barrenness, and slaves multiplied, and worked up to the very point of insurrection?

Will this measure, if it succeed, and ruin us, place you in better condition? If it fail, and you nullify, or secede, will our ruin, or your separation from us, restore virgin freshness to your lands, or give to your midnight slumbers one moment more of quietness?

Sir, the provisions of this bill would never, by my voice, be passed into a law; but if ever, surely not on this day, or in this year of our redemption. We did, at the very last session, and not more than six months ago, regulate and settle this whole question; and that, too, after long and solemn debate, protracted deliberation, and unwearyed labor. Are we half a year wiser, now, as we are scarcely so much older, than we were at that session? Who has received a revelation? for not one of us can have on this question, by human agency, more knowledge than when we voted for the law of last July. Then a compromise, as it was said, and settlement, were made. What pledges were given, God knows; but can greater be given at this time? Settle the question again; who will be bound by the law? What can we enact, which, if nullification do not demolish, another, and the next Congress, cannot repeal? Examine the statement made at the treasury on the 26th of July last, twelve days after the law which goes into operation on the 3d of March next, was approved by the President. At the rate of duty under that law, the amount of merchandise imported in the year 1830, being in round numbers $70,800,000, will yield $12,101,000. At that time, it was believed at the treasury that no more than that amount would be imported during the next year. What was the ground of this opinion? The excess in importation of the preceding year, 1831. Is not that argument strengthened by another of equal weight—the excessive importation of last year? If the treasury believed that the importation of 33,000,000 more than was wanted would prevent a like excess the next year, then, indeed, when another importation of 30,000,000 has followed, and the country is crowded with an excess of 63,000,000, what reason can the Secretary or Congress now have to expect 100,000,000, or even so much as 70,000,000, will be imported the next year? That amount, with the excess, not yet exported, but still on hand in the country, will be 30,000,000 more than we can consume at home, or sell abroad, or pay for by our own export of domestic production. If we pass this bill, which, as we are told, will reduce the revenue $6,000,000 below what the law of July last will produce, and our importations of foreign merchandise do not this year exceed 70,000,000, we shall lack at least 4,000,000 in our supply of the wants of Government. It would be a singular fortune for the same man to pay off the old national debt during his first Presidential term, and be compelled to begin a new debt in the first year of his second. If his friends will not save him from this inglorious condition, I trust, sir, that those who have never arrogated to themselves that title will rejoice to do it, while, at the same time, they, by the same prudent measure, preserve the best interests of the nation.

Sir, the fabric of law, which this House wrought at the last session with so much care and labor, cannot now be unravelled by us, without self-rebuke and self-reproach. To call on us to do so, is requiring of us to enact, and put on the legislative archives of the nation, a perpetual record of our own dishonor.

Nor would the repeal of the law of July, by the enactment of this bill, be regarded by the nation as more derogatory to the honor than the integrity of this Congress. For that law, though not technically in force until the 3d of next March, has, in fact, gone into operation in hundreds of thousands of instances. How many contracts, in all parts of the country, have been made in every branch of employment? By these contracts, what terms of labor are to be done? what quantities of goods, wares, and merchandise are to be produced and delivered, both in this and other countries? what amounts of money are promised to be paid at home and abroad? This law is a part of every contract; for when two men draw out and execute a contract, in writing, the law is as much a part of it as if it were transcribed and placed on the paper or parchment. Shall we, the legislators, the guardians of the rights of the people, put our hand upon these millions of agreements, solemnly written, signed, sealed, and delivered, and binding on our fellow-men? Shall we dare to seize upon these contracts, and tear out the law embodied in their pages? It were a deed, sir, which, if done by any individual in the nation, would, by law, be punished as a felony. Who, then, can advise, can require, can urge us to be the perpetrators of such a deed, dishonorable to ourselves, and ruinous to the nation?

For another reason, I would not do this act at this time. Seven States in this Union, after forty years of use and occupation, after a time almost "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary;" these seven States do now allege that our great and glorious system of encouragement and protection is unconstitutional. Repeal it at their demand, and you establish their doctrine. Let them, if they can, establish their theory by the constitutional tribunal. Let them try the question, as New England tried the constitutionality of the embargo, by courts of the United States. Nay, let them show the evils of our system, by showing the injuries done by its operations to their interests. Are they overtaxed by its provisions? It can, if so, be easily demonstrated. I call, I challenge them to the examination. I have laid a system of inquiry on the table. Let them put it in operation. If truth be on earth, it can, by that scheme, be sought out and discovered. Is there capital, under our system, less profitable than that employed by the whole free labor of the nation? No, far otherwise. If the system were abolished, would that capital be thereby rendered more profitable? Surely not; but, if it would, shall we destroy the general, to enhance some special welfare; the many for the few; the labors and prosperity of the free, to multiply the toils and increase the value of slaves?

For a third, and still more irresistible reason, I would not now pass this bill into a law. South Carolina has announced to the world that any State holds, under the constitution, the right to nullify any law made by Congress; and has abolished, by ordinance, and by law, not only your whole revenue system, but the whole power of the United States courts, concerning that system, in that State. This bill calls for concession, nay, for submission to South Carolina; to admit, adopt, and incorporate her ordinance and her law into our system of legislation. Will this preserve or destroy your constitution, cement or dissolve our Union? Sir, mingle nullification with the pure principles of your enactments, and, were your constitution strong and impenetrable as iron or adamant, this vile alchemy will dissolve into impalpable gas every link in the chain of your Union. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says to us, "be just and fear not."

H. OF R.]

The Tariff Bill.

[JAN. 28, 1853.]

Be just to the general welfare, just for the present, and just for posterity. Let not the cherished delinquency of a right eye, or right hand, drag the whole unoffending soul and body down to perdition.

Fear not, ay, sir, fear not the rage or the threats of disappointed ambition or lawless anarchy; fear not the array of their battle, or that glitter of their arms, the noise of their war; but fear your country and your God; fear to violate the constitution of the nation, or the oath of the Almighty.

In what way, by what stratagem of cowardice or subserviency, can we, dare we, change the provisions, or abolish the high prerogatives of that consecrated charter? Every power under it, granted to Congress by the people of the States, or of the United States, no matter which, comes to this House with the authority of a paramount command.

The power to regulate commerce, either by impost or prohibition, was, of right, incidental to the power of each State under the confederacy, though never expressly granted to such State by the people; nor would they permit the continental Congress, by an exercise of the treaty-making power, to invade or abridge, or bring into disuse, this then high prerogative of the States.

Art. 9th of the confederation—"No treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people are subject to; or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatever."

Has not this whole power over impost and commerce been conferred on Congress? Is not impost, in our hands, as well a regulator of commerce as an instrument of revenue? Can we use this instrument to raise money, and "supply the wants of Government," because the general welfare requires that supply? and is our own arm shortened when we attempt to use the same instrument to supply the wants of the people, when that welfare so loudly calls for that supply? Could each of the States, before the constitution, by the exercise of this power, countervail those laws of other nations which then did, and now do, exclude the products of our land and labor from their consumption? But must we, with all these powers of all the States, and all the people, now in our hands, be prohibited by one of them from all exercise of these powers, not only at this time, but henceforth and forever? Sir, if but two brothers were to place in your hands a sum of money, to be redelivered when both called for it together, could you honestly or safely surrender the treasure to either one of them separately? A deposit of power, in our hands, has been made, by a family of twenty-four; and each one of them is deeply interested in its exercise and preservation. We have sworn to keep, to use this treasure for their benefit. Shall we, can we, dare we surrender up the whole to any one of them?

Sir, we have lifted up our hand to Him on high; and we cannot go back. "I am persuaded," (suffer me to use words not only fraught with all the energy of human genius and eloquence, but instinct, too, with the very spirit of inspiration,) "I am persuaded that neither principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature," can make of us the recreant things which shall, when the ship but labors a little, throw overboard the cargo entrusted to our care, that we may thereby preserve our own pitiful adventures; or, overawed by a superstitious fear, dash our own children into the ocean, to appease some imaginary monster of the deep, and secure ourselves from his jaws.

Make this concession; submit, in this, to South Carolina, and have you, after this, any constitution, any Union, any national interest, any congressional enactments, which that State, or any other State, cannot, at any time, by the same process, utterly abolish?

What next, after this measure, will this State lay her hand upon, and say, this too must perish? Your fisheries cherished by protection; then the coasting trade, so interesting to the people, and so endeared by this system; after that, the American character of your ships, and your whole navigation, protected so long, and by so many laws; then, your navy, the delight and glory of the nation, protected with all these, and protecting all. These all must perish, under the consuming breath of this foul sorceress of nullification.

South Carolina now claims for her slaves a condition superior in pecuniary productiveness to your own; and this claim, when once gratified by your base submission to its demands, will then call on you to improve the political condition of those slaves. Your law, apportioning representation, South Carolina will denounce, as inconsistent with the spirit of the constitution. This she will then nullify, and insert in the statute, and compel you to place in the constitution, the full, in place of the three-fifths parts of representation of those slaves.

South Carolina—I say the demagogues of nullification in South Carolina—will rule, or they will, if they can, separate these United States. They will effect this by nullification, or by secession, no matter which, for these modern Titans of disunion are both of one family, twins in the same traitorous and bloody brotherhood of anarchy and war.

The spirit of disunion is in our land. Will you propitiate the fiend, by heaping his altar with sacrifices; or will you, like men, valiant with pious patriotism, resist the odious denizen of darkness, and compel him to flee from you? This spirit of disunion is indeed abroad; and like the same demon spirit, in dragon form, seen by him of the Apocalypse, he may, unfolding his foul volume, sweep after him "one-third part of the stars in our political firmament."

Which of these stars are to be fixed, or which planetary; which primary and central; or which secondary, and mere satellites; are matters quite too high for the ken of mere Northern eyesight; and must be left for discovery, to the more powerful vision and brighter skies of Southern climes. For the other States I have no fears; but may God send, of his infinite mercy, may He send that the laws of position and movement among these may be ascertained and established, before they, now so bright and beautiful stars, shall go down, and be extinguished in a horizon of blood.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. APPLETON on Saturday, coming up to-day, viz.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the data by which, "taking an average of the importations for the last six years as a probable criterion of the ordinary importations for some years to come, the revenue from the customs at the rates of duty payable after the 3d of March next may be estimated at eighteen millions of dollars annually;" also to communicate to the House how far the duties payable after the 3d day of March next fall short of or exceed the amount which would have been payable had the bill, transmitted to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 27th of April last, become a law:

~ Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to lay it upon the table, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. APPLETON, who observed that, when he had been induced to offer the resolution, he could make no calculation from any data in his possession going to show that the bill of last year could produce more than fifteen millions of dollars; whereas the Secretary had stated in his report that it would produce eighteen millions. Having found this difference in the reducing effect of the bill, he considered it due to the Secretary himself, and to the House, that, if any error had occurred, the House might be put in possession of the means of correcting it.

JAN. 28, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

Mr. WILDE moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this motion Mr. APPLETON demanded the yeas and nays; but, before they were taken, the hour expired, and the House passed to the orders of the day, and resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. BURGESS resumed and concluded the speech he commenced on Saturday, (as given above.)

Mr. YOUNG, of Connecticut, next obtained the floor, and moved for the rising of the committee, but the motion was negatived: Yeas 61, nays 67.

He then addressed the committee; but, at half past 5 o'clock, gave way for a renewal of the motion by Mr. INGERSOLL: this also was negatived: Yeas 54, nays 80.

[Lights were now introduced into the hall.]

Mr. YOUNG then said he had intended to proceed to other branches of the subject, but, finding his voice and strength fail him, he should decline saying any thing more. The following are his remarks entire:

Mr. YOUNG said he regretted extremely that he felt obliged, at this time, at this late hour of the discussion, and of the day, to ask the further indulgence of the committee, exhausted, as well as himself, by so long continued session and attention; but seeing no one ready to proceed, as he had hoped, and the calls for the question frequent and loud, he could not permit so galling a stroke to be given without attempting to ward it off, though he were certain the attempt must prove utterly vain.

He deemed it, he said, no excuse at this time, that he did not very frequently claim this indulgence, or that, at this time particularly, he could not, and would not, claim it long; but he had an excuse, he trusted, which should be prevalent, even now, and that was, that this bill was aiming a peculiarly direct and fatal blow at the prominent and vital interests of that section of country which he might be considered as more particularly representing—a blow that must fall as grievously upon it, probably, as on any other section of that extent, as a body, within the whole scope of what must be its wide and destructive influence.

The various topics, said Mr. Y., more general in their nature, but bearing, as every thing else does, on this great and every where reaching and pervading subject, lighting on all and every of our domestic and even foreign interests and relations, have already been extensively, powerfully, and, he might add, splendidly exhibited and enforced here, so as not soon to be forgotten, and to leave little room for amendment and improvement, but carrying our reflections and feelings, in some part, above and beyond the particular exciting cause, and leaving the bill, and its direct and more immediate bearings, almost lost and unnoticed amidst the many opening, delicate, and important considerations it had itself excited.

My object will therefore be, said Mr. Y., before it shall pass from before us, to call your attention to the bill itself—its first consequences; noticing, as I go along, the grounds on which it has been presented and defended here, and inquiring a little why and wherefore it is that this proceeding, which is spreading distrust and alarm through all the industrious walks of life in a large portion of our country, is, with all its consequences, thus suddenly and unexpectedly thrust upon us. Sir, said Mr. Y., who honestly wants this bill? Who is even decently satisfied with it? Who has risen here to defend it except the members of the committee that reported it? None, save the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBERLAIN], and he was not satisfied with the reasons given for reporting it.

Members here, who, from their position, are looked to vote for it, as far as their sentiments and feelings can be read from incidental expressions of word or countenance, approach it as an irksome task they know not how to avoid, and anxiously inquire if it cannot be borne—"hope it may not prove as bad as it is feared."

The very resolutions presented here in favor of reduction, and now on your table, though they count on the bill in their preambles, take special care, as will be seen on examination, not to recommend it, or hazard a definite opinion upon it in the resolutions themselves. Even partisan presses, that must speak in its favor, do it with that unwilling grace and such faint praise as speaks their disapprobation.

I did, sir, to be sure—the significance of which the committee can judge of as well as I—hear a certain honorable gentleman over the way [Mr. HOFFMAN] say to an honorable gentleman on this side [Mr. ADAMS] that he [Mr. H.] heard the Secretary of the Treasury say he was in favor of this bill, provided some amendments could be made to it, and this in something of a confidential way, it would seem, for he [Mr. H.] was opposing the call on the Secretary to communicate his views on the subject publicly to the House. The committee also may remember that the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILKINSON], in that part of his speech the other night, which he himself called, not a lecture, but an exhortation, for the special ears of certain members here, spent some fifteen or twenty minutes in attempting to prove that the Vice President elect was in favor of this bill, principally from the fact, as I understood it, that he had not written, uttered, or published one single word about it one way or the other, so as that the public should know of it. I shall, however, leave these more recondite indications towards this bill to those better initiated. But who, sir, here or any where else, comes forward frankly, candidly, decidedly, and boldly, to advocate and defend this measure as right, and just, and honorable; as calculated to make our country industrious, prosperous, glorious, and happy? And this is the alarming feature in our case, that this bill, which seems to stand shunned and alone, without comeliness or merit in itself to command respect in the eyes of any, like some unshapen and unnatural birth which none but its parents can have affection for, and even they can have no pleasure in, has any chance of success, and may triumph over us, for reasons foreign to its merits, and by means and influences unseen and unknown.

But, sir, I will come to the arguments in which the committee themselves commend this bill to our consideration, resolving themselves principally into these two positions: that the revenue must, at all events, be reduced six millions, and that the enormous profits of our manufacturers render the task justifiable and easy. As to the revenue, I shall make but a few observations. I know not why it is, sir, but the great point of caution on this subject, if we measure the tendency of what is said, seems to be, not so much lest the revenue shall fall below the amount aimed at, as that it should not, at any event, go above it, by which millions may be sacrificed on the doubtful space.

There seems, somehow or other, to exist a secret dread of any surplus in the treasury of a dollar, for a day, as if the whole body politic would be distressed by it; as if some new principle, sympathy, or tendency, had been discovered in the nature of our Government, pervading our whole political system, desiring a vacuum, as much as nature abhors it. But the exposition of my honorable colleague, [Mr. INGERSOLL], so clearly given us the other day, must satisfy us fully, I think, that we are in no danger of any collapse or explosion from this source for some years yet to come. And if we compare the facts and arguments suggested by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. APPELTON,] and the several reports, statements, and tables issued from the treasury itself, during the agitation of this subject last year and this, the more doubtful question may be found to be, whether the revenue is not already reduced sufficiently low for caution, by the act of 1832, and, indeed, whether it will not reduce it as low, or lower than the bill from the treasury last year, or this from the committee now under consideration. At any rate, there appears to be none but doubtful ground on which thus to hazard the great interests of our country, and that supported by calculations from former acts, and a state of things which the very passage of this bill must wholly change and take away. But, sir, it was not, as I said, my intention to say much on this branch of the committee's justification. I come to the other, viz. the vast profits of manufacturers, a subject with which I am much better acquainted, both from observation and experience, and can "speak what I do know" is their case, in the present state of things, as grounds for judging what it must be on a change of them.

The Tariff Bill.

I observed, in the beginning, that the effects of this bill must fall most grievously on that portion of country whose interests I am best acquainted with, and more particularly represent here. For your legislation, and the various advantages and disadvantages which nature has bestowed upon us, and our situation made us heir to, have planted these manufacturing establishments in our very midst, and they have taken root, and become a part of the reality, a part of the country itself—not collected in crowded towns, as in other countries, but scattered promiscuously amidst our hills and valleys, our agricultural and other interests and pursuits, too thinly to fall in a mass by themselves, and too thickly to leave any interest or concern uninvolved in their fall. A radii of some twelve or fifteen miles about me may encompass fifty or sixty of these manufactories, embracing some seventy-five or a hundred thousand spindles, costing, of hard earnings, with the powers, fixtures, preparation, (as it is called,) and other machinery to complete the fabric, from fifteen to twenty dollars for each spindle, and amounting, in all, to between one and a half and two millions of dollars; all of which, beside the effect on the various interwoven and dependent interests, must be sunk in value a greater per centum than the duties you take off by the passage of the bill.

Sir, the cheerful sounds of the bells of some of these pass over me daily; and some of their operations, and movements connected with them, come almost hourly within my observation. I, too, am a manufacturer, and have the pride and the pleasure (and the pain, too, in these times) of associating with them, and knowing their hopes and fears, their risks and realities, their calculations and disappointments, and can calculate for the gentleman [Mr. POLK] (much more accurately, I think, than some of those whose statements or conjectures he read, must have done,) the speed of the wheel, the turns of the roller, the beats of the lathe per minute or yard, necessary to produce a given result, to the hundredth part of a cent, all things moving up to the calculation: (which does not, however, too often happen with us;) for, let it be remembered, that manufacturers, with us, have long since ceased to deal much in the items of their gain with whole numbers, they are glad to find them in decimals; but if this bill passes, they may seek them in fluxions and logarithms, and seek them in vain.

And, sir, I can inform the gentleman [Mr. POLK] that there is nothing at all in all this noise about twenty, thirty, and forty per cent. profit which he has argued upon; which he might have satisfied himself of by looking further into, and comparing these returns, especially a very full and able one from the State of Rhode Island, the cradle and centre of this business. Competition has long since brought all such hopes to the ground. The great struggle is more for existence than profit—for protection, strictly speaking, than conquest; and all these vain and vague representations have become, amongst manufacturers themselves, mere vanity and vexation of spirit; and, when brought in here to have effect against them, are not only tantalizing, but substantially injurious and unjust. There may be some few cases in the country, of manufacturing capital, which, from incidental circumstances in trade, or the appreciation of real estate connected with it, may escape these general assertions; but it is all true as it respects manufacturing capital merely. I refer to cottons and woollens more particularly. So much for these general and round number statements of profits.

But I will come to some propositions of a more tangible form. The honorable gentleman [Mr. POLK] (for the committee still, I suppose) read with approbation, and, as a concession from manufacturers themselves, on which to vindicate the protective principles of the bill, held out to us this proposition: that a clear protection of twenty-five per cent. fully collected, would sustain the manufactories of the country; and this is probably the lowest that any experienced man, manufacturer or other, has ever dared to suggest. Yes, sir, twenty-five per cent. clear protection. Let us compare this with the bill. In the bill, cottons and woollens, generally amounting to one-third of all our dutiable importations, with many other articles particularly needing protection, increasing the amount to more than one-half our importations, are put down to twenty per cent. ad valorem. Five per cent. below the proposition. Five per cent. may not sound much, when read or spoken here, but it may to those who shall feel the want of it. It is, at any rate, one-fifth below the standard of protection proposed, and one-fourth of all the protection left for these articles in the bill. Again: wool and woollen yarns, which it has been a great object to protect, are put down at 15 per cent.—10 per cent. off. Cotton yarns, now a vast item in the manufacturing and commercial world, and some other articles, are put down at ten per cent.—fifteen per cent. off. And coarse woollens and blankets, the importations of which amount to something like a million of dollars a year, are put down at five per cent.—twenty per cent. off, and below this standard of effectual protection. Now, if we average these four items of per cents. on the whole mass of these most important and most exposed branches of manufactures, shall we find an average of more than from twelve or fifteen per cent.? Something like one-half below the lowest point of protection proposed. But this is not all. The proposition contemplates twenty-five per cent. clear protection. Those acquainted with the operation of ad valorem duties, where the person who pays the duties fixes the valuation on which he pays, and especially on these articles, varying almost imperceptibly, agree that the nominal amount can never be fully collected. Some experienced men, as I understand, employed in the offices, believe that not more than one-half or two-thirds of the exact duties are generally realized. And manufacturers, generally, would gladly, especially in these articles, compound a whole ad valorem duty for two-thirds of it in specific form. Now, take one-half or two-thirds of the ad valorem duties belonging to these articles, as before stated, and how much clear effectual protection have they left?

But it seems, in the next place, that something more than a general impression was intended to be made, by this representation of high profits—something like a proposition that, as the profits were 20, 30, and, in one case, 40 per cent., I think, this amount, or at least within five or six per cent. of it, may be taken from the duties, and have a decent interest, or profit then. It will, however, be seen by examination, that, by the act of 1832, and this act, both of which are to take effect together on the 4th of March next, the amount of reduction is from 20 to 28 per cent. more than the highest profit named, leaving the protection minus, and the profits minus, to that amount on that calculation.

The Tariff Bill.

But the gentleman admitted, at the same time, that, as to many articles, duties were merely nominal, the goods being afforded in our markets by our own manufacturers as low as they were in any other place, or could be from any other source; making out, if these statements are true, another proposition, that we are now actually manufacturing, in this country, 20, 30, and 40 per cent. lower than all the rest of the world beside; the English, in their present pressed state, not excepted. But if such propositions and such suggestions are to have influence here, it is useless to argue on the tariff or any other subject: for all kinds of protection and all security are lost, and as nothing.

But, besides these vague ideas of great profits, there is another impression here and abroad, something to our credit, to be sure, but very much to our disadvantage; and that is, that the manufacturers (the Yankees, especially) will live and get along somehow or other, do what you may with them; sink them as deep as you will, they will come up again, and right side up; and that the country will not lose the benefits they now receive from them, but rather gain by their quickened exertion and economy. But, sir, there is a limit to all possibilities. They have never yet, amidst all their discoveries, found out how to make an honest profit out of a losing business. It may not be for the interest of those who feed on these calculations, to sink us too low at once. There is a depth, it is said, from whence nothing rises again; from whence the vexed and dying whale returns no more, and is lost to its pursuers.

The spirit referred to may, indeed, survive, and, I might almost say, do what you may, will survive and flourish in some shape or other, "while life and breath, and being last" with us. But is it nothing that one generation of active men, in branches of business of great national concern, and all their honest and hard earnings, shall be sacrificed and swept from the common stock, in a rash adventure to attest their spirit? It will make a full experiment, I agree: for, if any thing Government can do with duties, merely, will destroy them, this will. Judging of the present progress of things from the past, manufacturers, at no distant point of time, arriving at it by gentle descent, as circumstances gradually incline and experience directs, may much better sustain themselves without any protection from duties or Government, than they can now stand this vast descent all at once. Let it be remembered, the country is yet acting and manufacturing under the act of 1828. By the bill of 1832, and the present bill, the reduction under both takes effect on the 4th of March next, thirty-four or thirty-five days from this, and probably not five from the time this bill shall pass, if it does pass. The duties on cotton goods, by the laws under which we are now operating, are from 25 per cent. up to virtual prohibition. The average on actual importations is 37½ per cent., and the actual importations under that average more than sixteen millions, now to be put down, part to 20, and part to 10 per cent. The average of nominal duties on woollens has been reckoned at 88 per cent., and the annual importations over thirteen millions annually, now to be put down at 20, 15, and 5 per cent.—a reduction of 68 to 83 per cent., according to the tables furnished us; and, taking both cotton and woollens together, including the necessary effects of the near approach, in some parts, to prohibition, the actual effect on our trade, and the actual effectual reduction, from present protection, cannot be calculated at less than 50 or 60 per cent., at one leap, at ten days' notice.

Sir, whether our manufactories have been fostered in hotbeds, as it is said, or whether they have grown up in native healthy soil; whether their protection is now extravagant, artificial, or otherwise, makes not much difference in the present question. No manufacturer, no trade, no regular extensive business, in any situation, in this or any other country, can stand so great a change—such a shock.

Sir, it will sensibly change the relative situation, interests, and prospects of the great body of the producing, business population of the country, and influence, more or less, the operations of the whole manufacturing and commercial world. Nothing so deranging, so radical, so revolutionary, so much like retribution to forfeiture, has been attempted since the Rump Parliament, or the Council of Five Hundred, and not even then. For, in the most frenzied part of the French revolution, though the torrent was turned upon the King and dignitaries, and their titles and estates overthrown together—even these wild times were too considerate to meditate such a blow, and dared not touch, so materially, the interests, standing, and estates of the common citizen, or so derange the natural movement of the great body of the business producing population of the country.

Sir, when this bill first went forth amongst the people more particularly interested in, and acquainted with, the operations of these things, they were struck with astonishment. They could not believe their eyes, their ears, or trust the common interpretation of their native language. They could not realize that such a proposition could be presented, much less seriously advocated and pressed here; and turned instinctively to each other, with inquiring look, as when some unaccountable act of a father or guardian first suggests the possibility of some mental aberration; and all, with one accord, anxiously compare, weigh, and scrutinize each act, and look, and expression, and cannot be satisfied till some decisive movement, with the deadly weapon, settles the unhappy question.

But, sir, there was another idea suggested by the committee, which, I have no doubt, has been a serious question with some not so familiarly acquainted with the subject, on which I desire to say a few words. It is often inquired, if the American manufacturer can afford to sell his goods as cheap at home as the same kinds are selling in any market, and can actually compete with his rivals in the markets abroad, why does he want protection? I will give my own solution of this question, first inquiring why any one, if that be the case, should desire to withhold what those particularly interested consider as their safety and protection. The force of the suggestion runs back to the question of our ability to compete with foreign manufacturers, supposing no duties and no protection to exist; but the question, in connexion with the present discussion, is, whether we can compete with them under the duties proposed in the bill? And the true bearings of this question will be better seen and understood by stating it in another form: Who will stand the best chance to command and occupy our markets with their manufactures, supposing the circumstances in which we shall be placed, under the operations of this bill? For those manufacturers who shall do this, will, of course, be sustained, and those which shall be driven from the market must, of course, cease; and whatever portion of it, more or less, is thus taken away, the capital and labor depending on that portion, thus taken away, must be sacrificed, and the owners ruined, though some portion of the contested market should be retained, and though some capital, after a desperate struggle and partial loss, should not be utterly abandoned.

There are circumstances existing in the relative situation of the two contending countries, continually setting against us, which we have nothing to counterbalance, more than sufficient to overcome the effect of the duties

The Tariff Bill.

proposed, and leaving the probabilities for our retaining the market, or any great portion of it, altogether against us. And I would ask the attention of the committee particularly to these considerations, not merely as bearing on the point in question, but as considerations on which the necessity of protection turns, and, it may be, the fate of our manufacturers depends.

There is an indistinct idea in the minds of many, arising from distance, or something else, that we have, here, at home, in our own markets, a decided advantage over others, aside from the protection afforded by duties.

Such might have been, formerly, in some measure, the case between nations; but, in the present regular facilities for transportation and free intercourse, there is little of it left, as applicable to this question. Cannot the English manufacturer put his goods on board at as little expense as the American? The difference of freight and insurance from Liverpool and from our manufactories, to the various markets in the United States, is but small, if any thing; and when the goods are on shore, and in market, commissions, risks, and credits, coöperage, advertising, and all charges and facilities, are alike to both. The English manufacturer and merchant have, therefore, to all practical purposes, the same advantage and facilities as if they were joined to us, and a part of our own nation and country, except these duties, averaging, as we have before seen, on cotton and woollen goods particularly, but one-half or two-thirds of even the twenty per cent., and that part liable to a very considerable reduction for imperfect collections.

Now, let us see the state of things which these duties must stand against, to afford us the protection expected from them. It is, I believe, a universally acknowledged principle in business, that markets are gained and occupied, in a great measure, in proportion to the capital employed and bearing upon them; the effect heightened, however, according to the depression of the capital and labor, compared with those with which they compete. And we are all aware of the suffering depression of English labor—of the vast superiority, in amount, of their capital employed in manufacturing, and its present unparalleled reduction in value, to a total loss and annihilation of one-half or two-thirds of the original; and that capital invested in machinery, and unconvertible into any thing else, must and will be used, while there is any hope of profit, let it be ever so small.

To realize our position, then, in this controversy, suppose England and all her colonies (as her opportunities with us will be much the same, as we have seen) actually lay contiguous alongside our shores, from New York either way, and the manufacturers of each had promiscuous and free ingress and egress to and from each other, and no duties in the way, does any one doubt that the English capital would obtain a large portion of our market? Nay, would it not sweep the whole of it, till our capital and our labor were pressed down as low as theirs? Every one must see that there is here a balance of pressure against us, that must have a substantive effect in overcoming our protection from duties.

But suppose, again, England thus alongside of us, and permitted to all the privileges of our markets, and we excluded from theirs; we are thus, like one prohibited a fair field, confined to an artificial mark, with one hand tied behind him, and, with comparative youth and inexperience, turned out by our Government, to fight and grapple with overgrown and desperate capital and labor, thus free and unrestrained, let loose upon us. And this one disadvantage, also, must have its effect to weaken our feeble barrier of protection, and turn the scale against us.

But, beside this, our duties, and they only, have also to withstand the different rates of interest in the two countries; the fluctuations of trade and prices; the charm of foreign style and fashion; the vast superiority in quantity, for selection, for variety, or assignable amounts; the adventures of speculators, and the policy of making our markets the auction-house for all risks and forced sales of stale stocks, or scattering remains that might clog or surcharge their more favorite markets, and a thousand other incidents in the state of trade and manufactures, every day occurring and operating on some article, or on the whole mass, more or less, one of which at times may overbalance a part or the whole of our average of duties, and often more than that, as the state of trade now shows; all of which causes must exist and operate till we are equal in capital, in the quantity of goods in market, in general business, in the arts of finish and display; and all are depressed and oppressed to an equal scale. Sir, for one, I fear our small and imperfectly collected ad valorem duties cannot protect us against all this.

But again: Suppose the duties on cotton and woollen goods particularly, of twenty, fifteen, ten, and five per cent. after suitable deduction in collection, shall be actually added to the price of the imported article, over and above what it would be without these duties, and over and above the exact intrinsic value, (if there is any way to determine it,) compared with our own manufactures, and they are thus found in all our cities, and exhibited to all the various classes of purchasers that promiscuously throng our markets, and cater for the consumption of the country; cotton goods, ranging in all the possible grades and shades of prices, from five to one hundred cents, and woollens from twenty to one thousand cents, with all the varieties at the same prices; considering also the different qualities of their stock, the degrees of perfection of manufacture, and their various style and finish, who can judge of their intrinsic or even market value, within the amount of the whole or a considerable portion of these duties?

I understand the most experienced merchants and manufacturers seldom agree so near in opinion, and that the most accustomed inspectors, when deciding on the value on which to assess the duty, are wont to differ to a greater amount than this, after a careful and deliberate inspection and consideration. And when we add to this all those varieties of color and hue, form and fashion, which give a first impression, and combine in goods to give the saleable value, if not the real; and when we consider the variety of taste in first purchasers, and their reference to that of those of their customers, and the various incidents of opportunity, convenience, and inclination, both of sellers and purchasers, that may be brought to bear on these infinite varieties, and effect the chance of sale, and, of course, consumption, your duties and their protection are lost in the bustle; and the public, in more than one way, have lost the duties, and the American manufacturer has lost his market, or a large portion of it, and must retire exhausted from the field.

This state of things has been strikingly exemplified in the recent contest between the English and American calico printers along the lines where the effect of our minimum protection begins to cease. For four or five years the English manufacturer kept possession of a considerable portion of our market, and contested the rest, inch by inch, with an article acknowledged intrinsically inferior to our own. A mere trifle would have turned the scale, and sometimes seemed to have done it. New recruits, of various forms and style, were brought in, and sometimes one spot or point was gained or retaken, and sometimes another; but, on the whole, the English prints seemed to be retiring, to wait the events of negotiations or a favorable change of things. And, sir, if this bill passes, it will be the protocol by which, like the King of Holland, we shall be compelled, for the benefit of others, to give up the citadel.

But, sir, there was one part of the question I had al-

JAN. 28, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

most forgotten: I allude to that arising out of our success in foreign markets.

The mystery about it is simply this: Where the English manufacturer commands and controls a market, he will not glut his own market to reduce the prices he can regularly obtain; and thus the prices there are higher than in the contested markets; and when we interfere with them but slightly, with our irregular and occasional shipments, we traffic, unmolested, under their standard of prices; but were we materially to affect the supply of such market, it would become, at once, like other disputed markets, to be contested by reduced prices, and become the prize of those who possess the power to sacrifice the most and hold out longest. And by giving an advantage to others, and weakening and worrying out our present struggling competition, we may have the benefits again of a foreign standard and prices in an uncontested market in our own country. There is another impression which, from these arguments and observations, would seem, with some, to have consideration in calculating the consequences that may befall our manufactures, viz. that the effects of our legislation are not so direct, immediate, and extensive, as is generally believed; and that distance, local markets, and many other circumstances come in, materially to check and equalize these effects. But, sir, in these times of improvement and adventure, our whole market, with that of the world, to a great extent, is like one great body of fluid, where any variation in height affects the pressure on all the fountains that feed it, and an addition or diminution finds a level with the rest as soon as the laws of nature can act, and any commotion or disturbance of it runs like circling waves over the whole, and into all the sinuosities of the branches and bays connected with it. Let us think of it as we may, in heated or cold debate here, the effects of the passage of a law, on this subject particularly, and often the mere proposal of one, to some extent, touches, as rapidly as news can fly, every town, village, manufactory, and workshop, to the extremity of the Union; and, through the whole line, as by a stroke of electricity, benumbs the arm and unclines the hand of industry; and the wheel stands still and the water runs by, and the owner, if a capitalist, has lost so much capital, according to the shock, and the ordinary manufacturer, perhaps, his whole estate; the former probably buys out the latter at the sacrifice, and, at length, at the approach of better times, the weaker is serving the stronger in the same establishment, at a correspondent reduction of prices.

There is much said, in these times, about making the rich richer, and the poor poorer; the true mode is discovered—disturb, effectually, the industry of the country. While industry is regularly sustained, money finds employment through the medium of labor, in its disturbed state, on the fragments of its former acquisitions. And thus your moneyed men, as they are called, are made more men of money without the intervention of labor, and, like wreckers on dangerous shores, have the best business in the most disastrous and distressing times; and, though even it may be a favor to the owner of a stranded cargo or a wrecked fortune to pay salvage or bear the sacrifice rather than lose the whole, it is no compliment to the times or to the cause which makes this business or this class of men useful or necessary. But permit me in this place, sir, for a moment, to inquire who and what sort of men these are who are thus to suffer when these times come on. I know they have been familiarly called here, (not so much of late, I think,) robbers, plunderers, and sordid capitalists, and seem to be looked upon by some as monsters or hydras, preying upon the vitals of the public. Sir, I believe they are much like other men in other business, except that they are born to more care, perplexity, and dependence on the whims and feelings of others. They are generally (and I do not know that they are made worse by the change) made out of your farmers and mechanics who have not sought to flee from regular industry, and have inclined to abide in the land of their nativity. Sometimes they are made from your merchants and seafaring men, who have brought their toilsome gatherings from every nation and clime under the sun, home to their own native village, perhaps, fondly hoping to enjoy their careful earnings, and spend the remainder of their days in security in the green vales of their boyhood, and by the graves of their fathers; men who love their homes for their country's sake, and their country for their home's sake—little dreaming that their own nation's councils were to be the bane of these hopes; men who, to secure these hopes, at some favorite spot near by, have stayed the headlong torrent at some appalling chasm, led its mighty waters out, as in bonds, and taught them to labor, and do handiwork for themselves and their country. Such are your manufacturers, whose undertakings and foundations are to be overturned by this bill. They are a great branch of your middling interest, which, above all, should be protected; the strength of your institutions, the source and substance of your nation's enterprise, prosperity, and glory; not your delicate shrubbery in the yard, or your ornamental trees in the streets, or the solitary, lordly shade on the plain, but your sturdy groves and forests, staying, by their stability and united strength, the storms of party and commotion from sweeping over the land; the source of convenience, comfort, and native variety, and beauty, in all the walks of life. But, sir, the axe at the root of the tree, as well as the tornado or earthquake, may prostrate the whole, and tumble them in heaps and confusion one upon another; and the fireweed, and the thistle, and the thorn, will succeed amidst the ruin and decay. And such will be the effects of this bill on this class of men.

But let us look, for a moment, at another general feature of the bill. I consider it as partial and hasty in its intended operation.

If we are not permitted to raise duties to the point of full protection on those articles we can supply in abundance, and in perfection; if we cannot be permitted to save, for the benefit of the country, such duties as, in many states of the market, are wholly levied on the foreign manufacturer and producer; if we must be prohibited the advantages of bestowing such duties on works of improvement, to facilitate our intercourse, bind us together, and render our country the convenience, the garden, and the glory of the world; and if we must, from this sad clog on the legitimate objects and energies of our Government, forego so much the great ends of national association; if, indeed, the revenue, or rather duties and protection, must, at all events, be reduced, now or at some other time, before a more propitious day in public sense shall succeed, that reduction should begin with the system as modelled and perfected with a view to protection; be in some due proportions as to the present amount, and gradually extended as to time, to secure, as far as possible, the following important results, so indispensable for the security of individuals; and the prosperity of the nation at large: that, in the first place, the manufacturer may withdraw, if he finds he must, after mature deliberation, and with the least possible sacrifice; that he may, in the next place, have full time to bring into requisition, economically, every practical improvement; and, in the third place, the nation may see, without needlessly hazarding the interests of any, when the revenue arrives at the point of expenditure; and, lastly, that the nation, one and all, may calmly and deliberately see and consider, as it progresses, its true bearing and operation on all their interests and concerns, and mature, amend, or change the policy as experience shall dictate. But what is the bill but a general defeat of all these objects?

But, sir, there is one more feature of the bill that I dis-

H. of R.]

The Tariff Bill.

like, and that I deprecate more, if possible, than the general consequences to be expected from the bill: I mean a distinct and unavoidable sectional partiality looking towards, but operating against, the interests and prospects of New England.

I do not intend to attribute any design, but to show the fact as it is in the bill. It is not my object here to call your attention particularly to the fact, or the question why it is that the iron, sugar, lead, coal, and hemp, and other articles of certain sections and States which have heretofore ranged, in the amount of protection, very nearly with the cotton and woollen fabrics of New England, have been left with duties twice and three times as high as their fellows, when these same articles have a practical protection, in their bulk and weight, equal to all that is now left on cottons and woollens. Nor is it my intention here to inquire why it is, that, out of one hundred and forty-two classes of articles, as arranged in the table the committee exhibited to us, including both protected and unprotected articles, on eighty of them specific duties are retained, ranging from twenty to one hundred and twenty; one as high as three hundred and ninety per cent., and but six below twenty per cent., the highest on cottons and woollens.

In the report of the New York convention, it appears that New England has in the cotton business about twenty-eight millions of capital, to the rest of the Union's twelve millions, if I recollect; but some of the States that were not represented there may have had some capital not estimated, say it is as twenty-eight is to fourteen millions, or two to one; and probably it is much so as to woollen manufactures, at least near enough for the use I expect to make of it. Now this reduction of six millions of revenue which the bill contemplates, affects us like a tax on protection, and should be levied accordingly.

The proportion to New England would be about one million. Now, if the reduction of duties on the articles of which she has more than her proportion, is greater than on the rest, she pays more than her proportion, both in proportion to her excess of quantity, and the inequality of reduction. If the reduction on cotton and woollen goods is ten per cent. more than an average on the rest, she pays or loses twice as much of it as all the rest of the Union. And when we find that inequality of reduction thirty or forty per cent., as it is, the whole burden imposed becomes more unequal and enormous. But again: The reduction is calculated thus in the tables from the treasury:

The amount of duties on cottons, under the act of 1832, in round numbers, say	- $5,700,000
Those under the present bill,	- 3,100,000

Leaving the reduction under it,	- 2,600,000
---------------------------------	-------------

On woollens, thus:
Duties by the bill of 1832,	- 4,080,000
By the present bill, nearly	- 2,000,000

Making the reduction	- $2,000,000
----------------------	---------------

Making the reduction on these two articles only four million six hundred thousand—say four and a half millions—three-fourths of the whole reduction to be made; of which New England must suffer twice as much as all the rest of the Union, equal to three millions out of four and a half millions; and this aside from her proportion in the rest, and a very severe proportion, too, in paper and glass, and some other articles; and besides having to bear her proportion of the high duties on sugar, coal, and lead, &c. (whatever it may be,) which the other sections retain and gain. But let us look at it in one more view. The whole amount of dutiable articles imported is reckoned at eighty-nine millions dollars, and the amount of cottons and woollens about thirty millions dollars—say one-third of the whole importations. The proportional part of the whole six millions, therefore, on these two articles, cottons and woollens, would be but two millions; whereas the reduction put upon them is four and a half millions; of which New England must bear twice as much as all the rest of the Union, besides her proportion in other articles, and the disadvantages as in the calculation before. But, sir, I will not pursue this unpleasant view any further. It seems to me it would have been hardly possible to shape a bill more pointedly destructive to the interests of New England without expressly mentioning her by name in the bill itself.

Comparatively speaking, the whole burden of this great change of our financial affairs is put off on New England. She, without lot, is made the scapegoat to bear off (and to some "uninhabited land" it is to be hoped) the present ordinary and extraordinary sins of the nation. Of her the committee demand a bullock for the sacrifice; of the rest, two turtle doves or two young pigeons. In a word, I consider the bill as altogether capricious, partial, and arbitrary in its provisions, and, as a whole, altogether unjust and insufferable.

Mr. HOWARD, of Md. next rose. I have hitherto been, said Mr. H., a patient auditor of this debate, and would have been content to remain so, if it had been confined to what I conceive to be the fair and legitimate question before the House. But the excursions which gentlemen have made into the almost interminable field of the tariff have been so extensive, and the light which they have shed diffused over such a wide space, in their successive illustrations of the obscure parts of the subject, that the point which we are called upon to decide has received but little illumination from their efforts, however brilliant. I know that, under the rules of the House, a motion to amend any part of the bill opens the consideration of the whole subject in the form of a discussion of the general principles of the bill; and I am not disposed to complain either of the existence or application of the rule. It is highly proper that a general debate upon the leading features of any bill, involving important general principles, should precede a particular examination of its clauses; in order that the House, having settled the main point, may be better able to adjust the details. If the debate, to which we have listened for so long a time, had conformed to the spirit of this rule, I should not have troubled the committee with the few remarks that I propose to submit. But it has not; and this deviation explains the singular and one-sided condition of the debate, presenting to the view of the nation a series of attacks upon this bill from every quarter, assailing it wherever a branch was thought to be practicable, whilst the garrison within preserved a stubborn and ominous silence. That the bill may have suffered in the estimation of the people, and even of the members of this committee, by the fact of its friends (with the exception of the committee who reported it) refraining from stepping forward in its defence, is not improbable; but if the debate had been confined to what is properly the general principle of the bill, it would not have been difficult to muster a force sufficient to establish that general principle triumphantly. It purports to be a bill to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government. This is its main object. A secondary one is to "otherwise alter the duties upon imports," so as to make our tariff more conformable to the present condition of things. But this last object can only be inquired into by adjusting an immense mass of details; and it is in this confused heap of yards and pounds, and per centages, that gentlemen have been searching for some general principle, when no such thing can be found, as the subject is now placed before the House. If the question were "shall this bill pass?" and the committee had previously determined that all these details should stand, then indeed it would be easy to extract the essential spirit of the bill, and examine it by any alembic that might be thought applicable. But the committee have yet to pass through the investigation of all these minutiz. If a child were learning A, it would be thought strange to thrust upon him the acquisition of all the other letters of the alphabet at once. Whilst the investigation of the details of the bill is, as yet, nothing more than a distant prospect ahead, we find our attention constantly drawn to every part of it in succession, at the imminent hazard of this accumulated information being all forgotten, when the time shall arrive at which it might be useful. During our last session, we passed a bill to reduce the revenue; but found, after we ceased to work at it, that it was insufficient to answer our purposes, because its effect would be to create more revenue than sound policy would justify us in collecting. It became manifest that, owing to the amendments engrafted upon the original bill as it passed through the Committee of the Whole, and which were added to give further protection to this or that species of manufacture, the amount of money that would flow into the treasury would not fall short of eighteen millions of dollars from imports alone, and the general principle of this bill is, "shall the revenue be reduced to a sum proportioned to the expenses of the Government?" the affirmative of which proposition few would deny. A few years ago a theory was partially broached, that the Federal Government should intentionally raise more money than its ordinary expenditures require, that it might have a fund upon which to draw for donations for various purposes. But the opinion of the people was soon found to be unfavorable to this doctrine; and now no party maintains it. From the moment, therefore, of passing the act of 1832, it became apparent that it must be reviewed; and the precise point of time when this review should take place, could be a matter of small moment, except that the permanent adjustment of the tariff is so desirable to all interests and classes of men, that every consideration of justice and policy concurs in recommending its speedy accomplishment. The proper question now before us is merely "shall we now undertake this review?" after deciding which in the affirmative, every section, line, and letter of the bill will be brought under our view, and will of course be open to amendment. If these amendments are rejected when offered, or are not satisfactory when adopted, then will arise the proper question, whether the bill is, upon the whole, a proper bill, and ought to pass. But the only inquiry is now, whether we will look into the subject at all.

I have been surprised that the most strenuous opposition to reviewing the tariff is made by those members of the House whose votes are recorded against the act of the last session. One would have thought a law which was so objectionable as to receive the hearty condemnation of these gentlemen both by voice and vote, would have been repealed by them at the earliest opportunity, and yet, when a proposition is made to reconsider and review it, they instantly take shelter under its protection, and insist upon its remaining the permanent law of the land. Have they changed their opinions with regard to it? Or if not, how can they reconcile what appears to me an irreconcilable inconsistency, of desiring a bad law to remain upon the statute book? No interests have been built up, no capital invested, no durable arrangement of labor taken place as yet under the act of 1832, and it may therefore be reviewed without meeting with those serious difficulties that oppose us when about to change a law which has been in force for years. But it is said that it would be better to suffer this bad law to remain, than to incur the hazard of having a worse one. Are we not, sir, the same members identically who enacted the other law? and what reason can be given for the apprehension that a worse law will be the result of our deliberations, any more than the existence of a hope that we shall pass a better one? The members of this Congress studied the subject of the tariff for nearly six months last winter, and have renewed their attention now. How unreasonable is it to expect that a body of men will ever assemble here, who have devoted more time to the investigation of this complicated subject. One of the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] assumed the position that an equitable tariff might possibly be made, which would satisfy the reasonable men of all parties, and contended that this result could only be the work of patient research, laborious investigation, and cool judgment; and yet protested against this Congress undertaking it, who have bestowed more time and attention upon the subject than any future Congress can be expected to give. I dissent from the opinion expressed by that gentleman, that such a tariff could be produced by a single effort, however much preparatory labor had been expended upon it. I think that it can only be the result of repeated efforts; and therefore it is that I am willing to try again. Gentlemen object to this bill, but do they forget the course of the bill of the last session? We set out with one intended to raise a revenue of twelve millions, and ended with one producing eighteen millions. I voted against many of the amendments as they were successfully engrafted upon it in its passage through the Committee of the Whole, but was in a minority. But I cannot see how those who were the most zealous supporters of those amendments, and who carried a majority of the House with them, should now be afraid to trust that majority. There is, indeed, one consideration which was rather hinted at than argued, by the gentleman from Connecticut, who opened this debate, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] who said that "he was not insensible of the weight of Executive recommendations in this House." If he means to say that the President is exerting the influence of his station to conciliate the jarring and sectional divisions that now unhappily prevail, and that have made discord where there formerly was harmony, I agree with him in the fact, and will further express my belief that the people of this country will sustain him in this effort. This Congress may or may not respond to his sentiments; but the irresistible power which shapes and directs the course of this Government in all its concerns, I mean the calm and disinterested voice of public opinion, will array itself upon the side of "moderate and healing councils," and compel its decision to be respected. But, in the mean time, differences of opinion are passing into acrimonious strife; the breach between the two grand divisions of the country is becoming wider and wider, and the difficulty of a final adjustment of this fiercely contested question is enhanced as each Congress leaves it as a legacy to its successor. I am disposed to review our legislation. Those who think that the act of 1832 is the last effort that ought to be made on the part of the Federal Government, who are content to see a surplus revenue of six millions of dollars flow into the treasury forever, or who anticipate more knowledge, better feeling, and greater tranquillity in legislation, on the part of the succeeding Congress, with less acerbity in the public mind to be encountered, do well to postpone the present consideration of the subject. What aspect this bill will wear when it issues from the Committee of the Whole, whether it will experience the fate of its predecessor of last year, and be so altered, that, like Anson's ship, after her voyage round the world, scarcely a stick of the original timber remained in consequence of its repeated patchings; or whether it will wear the appearance that the Committee of Ways and Means have given it, no one can foresee. The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. YOUNG,] who has just taken his seat, has expatiated upon the destruction it would bring upon the woollen and cotton factories, and has argued arithmetically upon the condition of those establishments. I think there is a vitious principle in the whole of our legislation upon the subject of woollens; I say vitious, because it does not accomplish the end in view. In the discussion of the last tariff, we first fixed upon a duty to be put upon raw wool, for the purpose of protecting the wool grower; and then proceeded to assess the duty upon the manufactured article by the argument and calculation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] raising it so as to correspond exactly with the duty upon wool; for, said he "the manufacturer will have to pay an enhanced price on his raw material, and must therefore have additional protection." So that, after having protected the wool grower, we next proceeded to render the manufacturer entirely independent of him, by putting it in his power to import his wool, and regulate the duty for the express purpose of enabling him to import it. We place the grower of wool entirely at the mercy of the manufacturer, (an antagonist interest,) and then tell him that he is well protected. Sir, is there any philosophy in this legislation? In practice it works exactly as might be supposed. The manufacturer having the growth of the raw material entirely at his command, can beat him down to whatever price he chooses to give. Hence it is, that, upon recurring to the statistical tables upon our desks, during the last year of which we have any returns, nearly seven millions of pounds of raw wool were imported, paying a duty of upwards of two hundred and seventy thousand dollars. I should like to show this to one of our farmers, and ask him how he relishes such protection. But it may be said that the price of wool is enhanced by it, because, if the domestic seller will consent to take a little less than the cost of importation, he will be sure of a market. The argument is specious, and deserves a moment's consideration. When the proprietor of any article is more anxious to sell than the purchaser is to buy, depreciation is the necessary consequence. The farmers are detached from each other, and have little opportunity of judging how much it costs to purchase wool abroad, and pay its freight home. He is offered a price, and he has no means of comparison between this price and the cost of the foreign article. All that he knows is, that the foreign article can be imported to advantage under our laws, and that if he does not sell it at less than this cost, whatever it may be, he will lose the sale altogether. The purchaser can turn his back upon him and look abroad for a supply, and our laws put it in his power to do so. But a convincing proof that our present system of legislation is of no service to the wool grower, is found in the fact, that (except in the year 1831, in which a speculation took place in wool, temporarily raising its price,) the price has not increased since the act of 1828. Its average value has remained the same as it was prior to that law. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. APPLETON] declared in his speech that he had always felt himself authorized to say, on behalf of the manufacturers of woollens, that a clear duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem would be a sufficient protection, provided wool was made free. For one, I would at once close with his suggestion, and adopt it; and I would myself make the proposition, if there was any chance of carrying it. But I fear there is none. I thought in 1828, and I think still, that the substantial interests of the wool growers would be promoted by the adoption of a policy which would build up the manufacturing establishments in the first instance, and when they had struck the roots of their prosperity deep into the soil, to look forward either to the competition amongst them, or to subsequent encouragement, for the producers of the raw material. But the effort to build up two rival, and, in some respects, hostile interests simultaneously, involves too much contradiction to be successful. If either one of them had been strong, you might have burdened it for the advancement of the weaker; but where both are weak, it is almost impossible to foster both at once.

The Tariff Bill.

It may be thought that these views upon the propriety of introducing the raw material from a foreign country, free of duty, are inconsistent with opinions expressed a few days since, adverse to the importation of fossil salt from Liverpool. But the difference is clear between the two cases. I stated then that the gravamen of the complaint was, the encouragement of British shipping, owing to their enjoyment of a trade in which our vessels are not allowed to participate. Coming to Nova Scotia for timber, they can bring this article at a low freight, as otherwise they would come in ballast. If the American shipping could enter upon the competition upon equal terms, it might perhaps be conformable to my doctrine about wool, that the manufactories of this salt should be scattered over the Atlantic coast, and the raw material admitted free. But waiving for the present all other considerations, it is sufficient to rest the point upon the advantage afforded to British shipping and the consequent injury of our own. Our vessels from the Middle States go to the Southward for a cargo of cotton, which they take to Europe, and bring back in exchange foreign manufactures: but as the return cargo is not so bulky as the outward, and the surplus space cannot now, as heretofore, be filled up with salt, they must either lose a portion of freight, or charge more upon the transportation of the outward cargo, neither of which is desirable. In passing over this subject, I will refer to a statement which I have obtained from the records of the treasury, upon which the gentleman from Maine may ruminate until we arrive at the salt part of the bill. It appears that, during the year ending on the 30th September, 1832, the importation of salt into the district of Passamaquoddy, which includes all that part of Maine into which this fossil salt is brought, amounted to 9,781½ tons, valued at $17,078 11, and that the item of tonnage stands thus:

			Tons.
American	-	Entered,	3,553
	-	Departed,	4,222
Foreign	-	Entered,	63,356
	-	Departed,	63,274

The very recital of this disproportion is enough to create astonishment. A gentleman near me says, "the West India trade." Not so, sir. I have examined the original returns made by the collector, of all the articles imported into the district, and will show to the House, when the proper time arrives, from the nature of the importations, that this redundancy of British shipping is not owing to the West India trade. On the contrary, the arrangement of that trade, as settled by this administration, has been held unjustly responsible for the sin of the fossil salt duty.

The gentleman from Connecticut, who has just addressed the committee, [Mr. YOUNG,] deplored also the consequences that would fall upon the cotton spinners, by the smallness of the duty proposed to be levied upon cotton yarn or cotton twist. Upon this point, I hope that his complaints are premature, and that the committee will arrange this duty differently when we come to that part of the bill. I am inclined to think that it can be changed for the better.

There is now lying before me the latest Liverpool price current, by which it appears that the price of cotton is as follows:

Sea island	-	-	-	11½d	to 20d
Stained	-	-	-	6½	10
Bowed, Georgia	-	-	-	6½	7½
Mobile	-	-	-	6½	7½
Alabama	-	-	-	6½	7½
Surat	-	-	-	4½	6
Bengal	-	-	-	5	5½

The price of the East India cotton is generally in proportion to the above rates. I confess I cannot see why the Committee of Ways and Means should have made a distinction between the duty upon cotton yarn and cotton

JAN. 28, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

goods, making the former less than the latter; nor can I acquiesce in its propriety. The yarn spun from the East India cotton is, of course, an inferior article, and the cotton mills of our country are not calculated to spin it, and cannot do it without an entire alteration of their machinery. This yarn, therefore, should be kept out of the country, because it is too unreasonable to require the cotton mills to revolutionize their spinning apparatus. And besides, it is better to consume our own cotton, under every view of the subject. This is one of the cases in which I should hold it unwise to introduce the raw material of another country. Gentlemen may call it a solitary exception or a special exception, or what they choose; but an exception it ought to be made. I will also join the gentleman from Connecticut in keeping out fabrics made of this East India cotton, in some advisable mode; whether this can be best done by the adoption of the minimum principle, put just high enough to act upon articles made of East India cotton, will best appear when we examine minutely that part of the bill. With regard to the other coarse cottons, our documents show that they have successfully encountered the competition of British cottons in the markets of Mexico and South America; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. APPELTON] declared, if I understood him correctly, that the great Waltham factory always had orders for goods three months ahead, intended for exportation. In and near Baltimore, about two millions of yards of cotton goods are manufactured, and from four to five millions are received from the Eastward annually, a large proportion of which, perhaps one-half, is exported. The continuance of the practice of exportation indicates that the merchants do not lose by the operation; and surely no good reason can be assigned why this competition with the rival factories of England could not be as successfully maintained at Charleston or Savannah as at Mexico or Valparaiso. It will scarcely be said that the intelligence of the inhabitants of the former places is not sufficient to enable them to distinguish between a superior and inferior article. The advantages of the tariff system are many to those places where the manufactories are situated. It keeps money at home, encourages industry, and affords a market for agricultural produce. But I have never been able to perceive any advantage that the Southern States derive from it. If it be said that they are supplied with cheaper and better goods than they could import from foreign countries, then they would voluntarily keep them without being coerced to take them. The only plausible argument is, that the general consumption of cotton goods throughout the nation is increased, and the sale of cotton thereby extended. This may be, but the extent of the benefit is the subject of conjecture, not calculation.

But it is said, Mr. Chairman, that Congress ought to suspend its action upon the tariff, on account of the position of South Carolina, and not be driven by fear into a change in its legislation. Fear! sir. Fear of what? Are our lives, or liberties, or property endangered? Can no other motive be found than this miserable and contemptible one of fear? For one, I repel and scorn it. I have observed, sir, through life, that brave men are always the last to attribute fear to another. Not conscious of the influence of the motive themselves, they are not aware of its power over others, and, being unable to estimate its force, are not apt to make the charge. Gentlemen mistake the feeling that they mean to appeal to. Pride, sir, pride might do much to induce us to withhold legislation for the present; and of the influence of this feeling, I confess that I have not myself been entirely destitute. Reflection, however, has subdued it. With South Carolina we shall have to deal hereafter. When the proper committee of the House shall report upon that matter, I shall be found ready to support such measures as I may judge necessary for the enforcement of the revenue laws.

I shall do it, sir, more in sorrow than in anger; but a sense of stern and inexorable duty will compel me to do it. But at present my business is not with her. I am dealing with the other Southern States. No one could have watched the course pursued by those States during the past six months without intense anxiety. The question of tariff or anti-tariff is often, much too often, made to turn in this House upon the distinction between free and slave labor. Whenever that position is taken, it ties another knot in the ligament that binds the South together, and preserves the distinction which at some day or other will be most apt to dissolve this confederacy. If it were not such a frequent occurrence to go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the very term ought to induce caution and forbearance upon this topic. The spirit of compromise that prevailed with our fathers when the constitution was adopted, has, in some measure, evaporated in these our days; and it might be doubted whether such a compromise as exists, with regard to representation in this House, could be now obtained. All the feelings of the Southern States were as much opposed to the tariff as South Carolina; but they have arrayed themselves on the side of the Federal Government, and for that I feel grateful to them. I listened, however, with pain to the declaration of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE], that he would not assist in the passage of any law for the collection of the revenue, until this tariff bill was passed.

For one, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that if that opinion were entertained by a majority of the members from the Southern States, I would cease action upon this bill instantly. I would plant my foot firmly, and not move another step, no, not an inch. But it is because I believe that such is not their opinion, that I am willing to proceed. At the first moment that a test vote shall be taken in this House, by which the opinion of members can be ascertained, if it should turn out to be contrary to my present expectation, my course is taken, and I will not swerve from it. South Carolina has placed herself, as I conceive, in what tacticians call a false position. I believe that the theory of nullification is erroneous, and cannot stand against the constitutional legislation of Congress. It rests for support upon this—that the legislation now existing is the entire exercise of the powers of the Federal Government. If the whole population of a State, acting through its courts and juries, should determine that every case shall be decided, whether in law or fact, so that the verdict of the jury or judgment of the court shall be against the revenue laws, no matter how their constitutionality may be drawn into question, it is impossible to carry those laws into effect as long as the State courts shall exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the United States, and refuse an appeal to be carried up to the latter. But it seems to me that these are dormant powers existing in the Federal Government under the constitution, by which it can give its own courts exclusive jurisdiction over matters relating to the revenue. This is then the point now at issue. This subject however will come up hereafter, and will doubtless receive a more extended discussion. But I cannot refrain from remarking upon an occurrence in our history, which shows how early and firmly our revolutionary ancestors exercised power, speaking in behalf of the nation. The circumstance was brought to my notice in examining what we call the old claims for French spoliations. On the 6th February, 1778, the Congress of the United States concluded a treaty of alliance with France, guarantying to her perpetually the possession of her West India islands. At the same time when this treaty was signed, Congress had absolutely no power at all, except a revolutionary authority depending upon voluntary obedience. The articles of confederation were not signed until four months afterwards, and yet this Congress plunged the nation into an agreement, which the treaty-making power of the present constitution would never venture to assume. And yet, when the obligations of this guaranty became oppressive, no one ever thought of disputing the authority by which the encumbrance was assumed. In the correspondence between Jefferson (whilst Secretary of State) and Hammond, the former distinctly took the ground that foreign nations were supposed to have a knowledge of the powers of the Federal Government; and yet the same officer never thought of questioning the authority under which the treaty of 1778 was made, although he was, in my opinion, more embarrassed in conducting the correspondence to which that treaty gave rise, than in any other period of his life. That the treaty-making power is more extensive under the present constitution, than it was under the confederacy, must be admitted by all; and yet, if the theory of nullification be true, all the obligations incurred with nations having commercial treaties of reciprocity with us, may be rendered nugatory by the action of a single State.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will not suffer myself to stray into the discussion of matters foreign, in a great measure, to the subject now under deliberation. I think that it is time to take the preliminary question upon the bill before the committee, and will no longer be an obstacle in the way of such a desirable event.

Mr. H. having concluded,

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD moved that the committee rise. The motion was carried: Yeas 77, nays 71.

The committee rose accordingly at a quarter past 6 o'clock.

A motion being made for adjournment,

Mr. WHITE, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays. They were taken, and stood as follows: Yeas 85, nays 75. So the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 29.

ESTIMATED REVENUE.

The resolution moved by Mr. APPLETON, and under discussion yesterday, coming up to-day, and the question being taken on the motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, to lay the resolution on the table, it was negatived: Yeas 53, nays 71.

Mr. APPLETON then said that it had been with extreme surprise that he had discovered that any disposition existed to lay these resolutions on the table. Nor could this be the case, as it seemed to him, unless the nature and object of the resolution had been misunderstood. The whole object of the bill at present before Congress was to reduce the revenue to the expenditures of Government. That was the only ground on which the bill had been brought forward. Now the first of the resolutions he had offered pursued the very words of the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, in which the Secretary declared that, taking the average importations of the last six years, the revenue under the existing law of 14th July last might be estimated at eighteen millions of dollars. Now, Mr. A. said that there was no process of calculation by which he was able to make the average more than fifteen millions. His object was to ascertain by what process of calculation the Secretary of the Treasury came to the result of $18,000,000. When gentlemen voted against such an inquiry, the natural inference would seem to be, that they feared the Secretary had been in the wrong, and were afraid to examine. He would in a few words present to the House the process of calculation by which he had arrived at the conclusion he had stated.

The average gross amount of foreign imports for the last six years, including 1832, is $86,200,000, from which, deducting $20,000,000, the average amount of foreign goods exported, $66,200,000, remains as the nett amount of foreign goods imported, on which the revenue is to be levied. Now, the table annexed to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means gives 23 2-3 per cent. as the average rate of the duty on the entire importation of foreign goods under the act of July 14, 1832, including free goods, taking the imports of 1831 as the basis of calculation. Applying this rule to the nett import of $66,200,000, the amount of revenue will be $15,660,000, from which is to be deducted more than $1,000,000, for expenses of collection, and $300,000 for a reduction on wines after the 3d of March, 1834, the permanent nett revenue will be $14,360,000; and even this is too high, according to the average assumed by the Secretary of the Treasury, because the committee have founded their average rate at 23 2-3 per cent. upon the importations of 1831, which contained an amount altogether greater than the average of six years, of wool, woollens, and cottons, paying duties much above the average; and after taking into the estimate about two millions of extra importation of worsted stuffs, the result will be a reduction of the average rate of duty from 23.66 per cent. to 22.44; and thus rendering the nett revenue $800,000 further, to $13,560,000. Then, sir, I try another process. So late as the 4th June last, the Secretary of the Treasury furnished us a table of the revenue which would accrue under the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, taking the import of 1830 as the basis of importation. That import was $70,876,000, or, deducting exports of foreign goods, $14,387,000, gives $56,489,000 as the nett amount of foreign imports for that year, and the nett revenue on those imports was ascertained to be $12,763,000. The bill of the 14th of July reduced the duties on silks, linens, tea, and coffee, a million of dollars below those calculated in that table, or, allowing for debentures, $800,000, leaving the nett revenue, on the basis of the import of 1830, something below $12,000,000. Now, if $56,489,000, the nett import of 1830, gives $12,000,000, $66,200,000, the nett average import of six years, will give $14,100,000 as the nett revenue arising from the basis assumed by the Secretary of the Treasury; subject, however, to the reduction of $300,000 for the reduced duty on wines after March, 1834, leaving $13,800,000 as the actual revenue, instead of the $18,000,000 of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. A. asked whether any gentleman could show a result different from this. Mr. A. did not, indeed, see how the amount could rise even so high as fifteen millions, admitting the basis taken by the Secretary to be a correct one. It was true, indeed, that the Committee of Ways and Means had assumed as their basis that the imports would amount to 100 millions. But this was too monstrous an assumption to need refutation. The year from the 1st of April, 1831, to the 1st of April, 1833, was one of monstrous overtrade, and swelled enormously the official imports of 1831 and 1832. Mr. A. had obtained from the treasury quarterly returns of the last two years, (which were not before the House.)

As to the second resolution, whoever would turn to the message of the President of the United States, and especially to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of this session, would find the fact put forward, that the Secretary of the Treasury had at the last session recommended a reduction of the duties to the amount of the expenditures of the Government, and that the failure of Congress to meet those recommendations furnished the ground and occasion for further reduction; and yet, to my utter astonishment, as I stated on a former occasion in Committee of the Whole, I find, by accurate calculation, that the reductions on the articles of low woollens, stuffs, silks, linens, coffee, tea, and wines, amount to $3,377,026; whilst the additions on the articles of wool, woollens, including flannels and carpetings, sewing silks, indigo, and salt, amount to $2,322,289; leaving the actual reductions made by the bill of the 14th July, 1832, $1,054,737 greater than those proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his bill communicated to this House.

JAN. 29, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

These two facts seem to me to lie at the very foundation of the question of acting upon the tariff at all. If my statements are correct, there is not the slightest pretext for reducing the revenue at all. If they are not correct, I wish to be corrected. The refusal to apply to the proper quarter for information would seem to imply that the friends of the administration have no confidence in the general statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the matter will not bear examining. These returns went to show a difference of nine millions in the last quarter, ending the 30th of September last, compared with the corresponding quarter of 1831, and five millions in the previous quarter; and every gentleman acquainted with the actual state of the trade and commerce of the country, knows very well that a reduced importation continues, and must continue for a long time to come; so that the average of $86,200,000 for several years to come must be considered a full; if not a high estimate.

As to the estimates of the Committee of Ways and Means, as another proof of the incorrectness of those estimates, they had assumed the average of debentures, and expenses of collection, at 20 per cent. on the gross amount of duties. Mr. A. denied this to be the true average; and if it were, it was no rule on which to calculate for the future; for there was no necessary ratio between debentures and imposts. The only case in which it had been applied under the existing rates of duties, was to be found in the estimate of the 4th of June, (Doc. 264,) in which the gross revenue is stated to be $16,738,037; the debentures, bounties, and expenses of collection, $3,975,000; being 24 per cent. instead of 20, as asserted by the committee.

Mr. CLAY said he had moved to lay the resolutions on the table, because he thought that all the objects of the resolutions could be obtained from the Secretary's report, and on looking into that report he found he was not mistaken. He should send a portion of the report to the Clerk's table to be read, which would show this. But he wished to know why the offering of these resolutions had been kept until now. The report of the Secretary had been before the House since the 5th of December. Could not the gentleman have discovered the supposed error of the Secretary before this time?

The inquiry would have come with a much better grace from the gentleman, if he had brought it forward before the present bill had been for weeks before the House. He could conceive no motive for such a procedure, unless it was a desire to consume time and to delay action. Should the call be agreed to, then the House would be told that they must not act until it had been answered.

Mr. C. was against every thing of this sort, and he protested against them. The Secretary had told the gentleman what his data were. If he should now send a new calculation, some other gentleman would probably find some error in that; and then there must be a new call; and where is the business to end? Mr. C. concluded by moving to postpone the consideration of the resolutions until the 2d day of March next.

Mr. APPLETON said that he might sooner have offered the resolutions had he sooner made, most unexpectedly, the discovery on which they were founded. As to what the gentleman had caused to be read at the Clerk's table, it was the very clause to which he had himself referred; that clause gave the result to which the Secretary came; but it gave no grounds on which the conclusion was founded. What Mr. A. wanted to know was, how the Secretary came to such a result.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had voted to lay the resolutions upon the table; but it was not from any want of courtesy towards the gentleman from Massachusetts, but the House was passing resolution after resolution, to call upon the Secretary for information, which every member had as much in his own power as the Secretary.

Mr. C. had listened to the very ingenious calculations of the gentleman; and he placed about as much reliance upon them as upon the estimates from the Committee of Ways and Means, and no more. The gentleman would have the House to believe that they had last year reduced the revenue, not by three millions—nor five millions—but ten millions! Could any one want any data to discover the folly and falsity of such a calculation? Such calculations showed a want of tact, a want of knowing how to arrive at just results. Should the gentleman obtain the information he sought, still he must pardon Mr. C. if he refused to believe that the revenue had been reduced nine or ten millions. Without going into any details of calculation, he was disposed to believe that the estimates of the Secretary were made with as much accuracy as any estimates could be expected to be made. Mr. C. however, was for rejecting all their arithmetical calculations—he placed no reliance upon them. However, as a mere question of curiosity, he would not refuse the inquiry: but the answer would come after the bill had been acted upon.

Mr. APPLETON replied, that he asked no vote from the gentleman from New York on courtesy; he desired no gentleman's vote on any such ground. The gentleman had said, he would place no reliance on his [Mr. A.'s] calculations. When the gentleman had said this, Mr. A. thought the gentleman was coming out with a counter statement—a counter calculation. But no such thing had appeared. Now it was said, and said truly, that "figures could not lie." And Mr. A. was willing to put his own calculations against the gentleman's. But since the gentleman had chosen to put his own calculations in competition with Mr. A.'s, he would say, that in all the calculations which had come either from the Committee of Ways and Means, or the Secretary of the Treasury, he had found nothing that would compare with the gentleman's assertion that the protected articles amounted to fifty millions!

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, that if the gentleman would take as much pains on the subject of tonnage—

Here Mr. CLAY called to order. Gentlemen were referring to matters which had no relation to the resolutions.

Mr. CAMBRELENG resumed. The gentleman had said that figures never lied. But Mr. C. had put the lie on all those which contradicted the statements from the treasury. But it was not true that figures never lied. It was an old adage, that in matters of finance figures did not tell truth. When the gentleman undertook to correct his calculations, he hoped the gentleman would furnish a little information on the subject of the domestic and foreign tonnage of this country: a subject far more important than that involved in the gentleman's resolutions.

The question was now put on Mr. CLAY's motion to postpone, and decided by yeas and nays: Yeas 78, nays 82. So the House refused to postpone.

Mr. VERPLANCK now moved for the orders of the day:

Mr. E. EVERETT hoped the gentleman would defer this motion until the question should be taken on the matter which the House had just refused to postpone.

Mr. VERPLANCK declining,

Mr. DICKSON demanded the yeas and nays on proceeding to the orders of the day. They were taken, and stood—yeas 94, nays 67.

[The resolution was on a subsequent day agreed to without further debate.]

So the House proceeded to the orders of the day, and went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WATTS in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. WILLIAM B. SHEPARD being entitled to the floor, rose to address the committee. He said he had moved last night that the committee should rise, not because he had any thing to say, that could not be as well said then as now, or that he had not as lief say then as now, but because he had not the physical ability, after a session of six hours, to give coherency to the few ideas with which it was his intention to trouble the committee. I am well aware, said Mr. S., that every gentleman here is desirous of disposing of this tedious subject, without more debate; none can be more tired of it than I am.

Man has been denominated by some enthusiastic admirers of political economy, an animal that makes exchanges; he has here been called a plundering animal; were I permitted to add one to the many definitions which have been given by philosophers of that singular creature, I should say he is an animal that makes tariff speeches. The definition would undoubtedly characterize him, as he is known in the United States, more particularly on this floor—here "docti indodique," we all speak on this subject; I shall, therefore, make no apology to the House for indulging a national propensity—" 'tis no sin for a man to labor in his vocation." I am not, however, one of those gentlemen who believe that all knowledge on this subject is derived, like Falstaff's knowledge of the true prince, from instinct; it is to me, viewed in any way I am capable of viewing it, a subject of great difficulty. It is peculiarly at this time a subject of fearful interest, and requiring for its adjustment all this House possesses of intelligence, integrity, and patriotism. Sir, I most solemnly believe the times require each man should speak out, candidly and freely, his real sentiments upon the subject of this protective policy; that a great responsibility rests upon the members of this House, a responsibility which, if we fail now to meet, we basely abandon the high trust committed to our care.

The United States exhibit, at this time, a spectacle hitherto unseen and unknown upon earth; one that, for the credit of humanity, it is to be hoped will never occur again—a people endowed with all that heaven or earth can bestow to make them happy and contented, abounding in every thing essential to prosperity, and even grandeur, among the nations of the world, (if the term is not offensive to some around me;) and yet, amidst all these blessings, we daily hear it proclaimed, in high places, we are on the eve of revolution. A revolution to put down what? Some usurper living on the vitals of the community? Some conqueror revelling in the spoils of vanquished provinces, snatching from wealth its abundance, from penury its pittance, to swell the pride, the pomp, and power of an individual? No, sir! A revolution to put down the power of the majority of the people themselves—a revolution which I can compare to nothing in the history of the madness and folly of mankind, but the infidel fury of the anarchists of France, who desecrated the temple of the only true God, to erect what they called the statue of reason in its stead. The nations of Europe are now contending for self-government: we seem to be getting tired of it: they are contending against the will and dominion of one man; some here complain of the dominion of the many. What, on the other side of the Atlantic, is called by an admiring world the beau ideal of liberty, I have heard on this floor pronounced the perfection of despotism. Such, alas, is the unhappy, the miserable condition of poor human nature!

Whatever may be the final action of Congress upon the subject of the revenue, nothing should be done without caution and deliberation, and after a careful inspection of our commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing situation. Upon our decision of this question rests the prosperity of every man in the community. I look, sir, upon the man, who would discover these three great interests, indissoluble in their natural affinities, and essential to the prosperity of every great nation, as a mere empiric, a political quack whose nostrums may momentarily infuse vigor into the body politic, but eventually leave it haggard and depressed. And unless the fickle legislation of Congress is to be the reproach of our institutions, and the curse of the people of this country, we ought to place this matter on such a basis, that, hereafter, every man may rest secure, himself and his property, of being under the protection of equal, just, and permanent laws. For, if there is a tyranny more peculiarly hard to bear, more harassing to the spirit, it is that of fluctuating legislation. Its oppression is more severe from being unexpected; no industry can obviate it, no sagacity can foresee it.

When the tariff laws of 1824 and 1828 were under discussion, it was contended, with great force and justice by the anti-tariff party, that all free Governments should interfere as little as possible with the domestic arrangements and industry of its citizens; that all material changes in the policy of a nation, the object of which was the transferring capital from one occupation to another, should be made with great caution, and only on great emergencies. If these propositions are true of such Governments generally, they are still more worthy of attention in a Government like ours, which is of strictly enumerated powers, and dependent for its stability on public opinion—in a Government where the fashion of to-day may be reprobated by to-morrow; and an investment of capital, made under the sanction of the National Legislature, may be prostrated by a fickle legislation, influenced by the whim and caprice of the moment, or the varying policy and interest of rival political parties. It was upon such principles of general reasoning that I am now, and always have been, opposed to the policy of the tariff laws.

I thought such a system ought not to be forced on the country, but that every man should be permitted to follow such pursuits as were most congenial to his habits and disposition. That if by this policy the people advanced more slowly in the accumulation of property, they would be more virtuous, less exposed to the temptations of extraordinary wealth—a state of things but little congenial with plain republican institutions. I thought likewise, that if the policy of protective laws was less doubtful, the tariff of 1828 was ill-judged and inexpedient. It attempted too much; it embraced subjects of opposite characters: while with one hand it gave a bounty, with the other it imposed a tax upon the same thing, showing, as has been correctly observed by the anti-tariff memorial, that there was "an avowed want of information on the subject; it would have been a wiser course to wait until that information was obtained." In fact, sir, the tariff of 1828 was not intended by many of those who assisted in making it, to aid peculiarly any species of manufacture except that of a President; and we are now reaping the bitter fruits of such legislation.

The act, however, has passed; it was imposed on the country for weal or for woe; it has disappointed in some measure the hopes of its friends and the predictions of its enemies; it is recorded among your laws, and no human power can place the country in the same situation it was in prior to its passage.

The question now, however, is not one of laying on, but one of taking off duties; we are inquiring how we shall provide for the present posture of affairs. Our national debt is about to be paid off; we shall have upon our hands a large surplus revenue; how shall we relieve the country from the anticipated danger of this alarming plethora? We are told by some of our statesmen, (I beg pardon of the shades of the illustrious men who once bore that name, I meant some of our politicians,) that the National Legislature cannot be trusted with one dollar more than the bare necessities the stern exigencies of the Government require. Bargain, intrigue, and corruption, we are told, will stalk barefaced and uncovered throughout this hall, unless speedily prevented. I have not yet, sir, lost all confidence in republican institutions; I do not believe the people of this country are yet sufficiently corrupted to send members to this House base enough, either to barter away their liberty or squander their money; when I do believe it, I shall think representative Governments a mere delusion. I have, however, no objection that gentlemen should estimate their power of resisting temptation by whatever standard they please.

It is impossible at this period to discuss this matter of the tariff exclusively on its own merits; it has become so intermingled with all the political questions of the times, has been the cause of so much excitement, that it is thrust into every question and relation in society. In the few discursive remarks which I intend making on this subject, I hope the committee will pardon me, if, in following the example of others, I talk about that subject most interesting to myself. It may very properly be asked, why this inordinate desire, at this session of Congress, to hurry through the House a bill of such vast importance as this evidently is? The bill of July, 1832, has not yet gone into operation; no man can tell its precise effect upon the revenue of the country. Has that bill been found to deceive its friends in reducing the revenue? I will trouble the committee with a few words in relation to that measure. I am more inclined to do so, because I perceive it is about to be murdered in the womb; and before the final blow is struck, I will do it an act of passing justice. Having voted for that bill, in company with a large majority of my colleagues, and a majority of the Southern delegation, as a bill to reduce the revenue of the Government, and to relieve the people from the pressure of the tariff system, I am surprised to find endeavors very industriously made to circulate a belief, that, so far from alleviating the burdens of the South, they are aggravated by that bill. I saw an article in the Telegraph of this city, published a few days ago, addressed to the people of Georgia, and bearing, among others, the signature of a gentleman on this floor, [MR. CLAYTON,] containing the following words: "The character of the act of 1832 is distinctly marked. Its diminished credits, its requisition of cash payments, its increase of the value of the pound sterling, its discriminating duties, will show that the burdens imposed upon you are decidedly increased, yet you are told that this act is a concession, 'an effort to moderate the burdens of the South;' that, like the travelled dove, it comes with the olive branch to give you future security. The treacherous kiss of Judas is not more deceptive. A concession with the odious principle of protection retained as the permanent policy of the Government! No, it is no concession; its object is rather to lull you into false security." This paper, although addressed to the people of Georgia, is evidently intended for the whole South, and conveys an imputation upon the intelligence and integrity of every Southern anti-tariff gentleman who voted for the bill of 1832. As one of those individuals, I am not disposed that the slightest taint of inconsistency shall be attached to any vote of mine to gratify any man, any set of men, or any party whatever. Upon the subject of this tariff I have acted upon but one set of principles, and upon those same principles I intend to continue to act.

This is a repetition of a charge contained in an address published by the South Carolina delegation shortly after the close of the last session, and circulated very generally throughout the Southern country. These loving appeals to one's constituents are not generally fair subjects of criticism; they are intended for the partial eye of friendship. Some of those names attached to these statements are, however, so notorious in connexion with this tariff matter, that they carry great weight with them among two-thirds of the people south of the Potomac; it therefore becomes necessary that even small errors, such as great minds inadvertently make, should at once be corrected. It is very idle to say that the tariff bill of 1832 recognised the principle of protection; it recognised it no more and no less than every act for reducing revenue, or raising revenue, has done since the organization of the Government. The allegation, therefore, is merely gratuitous. As regards "diminished credits and cash payments," the impolicy of the existing law was so satisfactorily shown by the memorial of the anti-tariff convention, that I voted to repeal it, in compliance with the unanimous wish, as expressed in the memorial of the Southern people.

Another source of lamentation is "the increased value of the pound sterling." By the law of 1799, regulating the value of foreign coins, the pound sterling of England was estimated to be worth four dollars and forty-four cents of our currency; owing to the fluctuation in the relative value of gold and silver, its real value had become four dollars and eighty cents. I voted to put it at its true and real value, because I like to call things by their right names; I had, however, a still better reason: when I vote for a bill laying a duty of 10, 15, or 25 per cent., when I assist in publishing to the world that such a duty has been laid, I am desirous of dealing candidly and fairly with the public. I would not assist in granting a boon in the first part of an instrument, and insert a condition in the latter part rendering the grant valueless. To have pursued a different course might have evinced more political cunning, but would not have added much to the reputation of the American Congress; as one of the humblest of its members, I am willing to share the odium of that measure.

The bill of July, however, it is said, makes discriminating duties; it releases luxuries from taxation, and throws the burden of supporting the Government upon the necessities of life; it oppresses the poor; "this is pitiful, 'tis wondrous pitiful," and, doubtless, has been the foundation of many a moving address and eloquent harangue. It may have been said in the furious language of the day, that a grinding, cruel, and unrelenting majority of Congress, insensible to the miseries and sufferings of an oppressed people, have had the unprecedented, enormous, and daring effrontery to grant to a high-toned and chivalrous people their tea and coffee without tax. Horrible as this charge seems to be, and alarming as it is to a conscientious man, it is very easy to show that it comes with a very bad grace from the source it does, and, as applicable to the state of things in the South, has little or no foundation. It is difficult, in a country so prosperous as every part of the United States is, to draw a distinction between luxuries and necessities; in every community, they are merely correlative terms; in rude and savage states of society, necessities are such articles as sustain existence; as society advances in refinement, what was formerly a luxury becomes a necessary. I would here remark, that the argument of the honorable gentleman near me, [MR. CHOATE,] that the Southern people, in proportion to their wealth and population, are non-consumers, is literally true.

It is perfectly well known to every gentleman familiar with the domestic arrangements of the mass of the Southern people, that two-thirds of them are clad in their own domestic manufactures: I have known many planters, the owners of large families of slaves, who purchase nothing from the stores but iron, salt, tea, coffee, sugar, and a few other trifling articles of luxury or convenience. Now, is it not more important to these men that they should purchase such articles as tea and coffee cheaply, which are of daily and constant use, than the broadcloths of England? The latter surely are not so essential to their comfort, and the want of them is not depriving them of an article upon which they set much value. They prefer their own domestic manufactures, and I hope the day never will arrive when the loom and the spindle are to be silent around the hearths of our fathers. To me there is no sight more cheering than of a family clad entirely by its own labor. It presents a spectacle of substantial comfort and sturdy independence, not surpassed in any quarter of the globe. I confess I never visit such scenes without returning from them elevated and purified in feeling; I go back in imagination to other times, when the men of homespun were legislating in your halls of Congress, and fighting the battles of the revolution. So long as the Federal Government's tax gatherer does not cross the doors of this worthy class of society, they are independent of its legislation: secure in the "noiseless tenor of their way," they are happy, unmolested by the visions of avarice, or the dreams of ambition. If this distinction between necessities and luxuries were substantially true, who has any right to complain? If luxuries tend to elevate man in the scale of social existence; if they follow in the march of civilization, and make a part of it, why, in a Government of equals, should not every thing that tends to refine our natures, to smooth the asperities of life, and elevate man in the scale of animated beings, be placed within the reach of the poorest individual in society?

Having disposed of the morality of this matter, let us now look to its logic. I will not take up the tariff bill of 1832, and, comparing it with the act of 1828, ask gentlemen if a reduction of the duties on iron, on cotton goods, on sugar, on woollen cloths, on negro clothing, on blankets, &c., was not a reduction of the duties on the necessities of life: this would be confuting them by the plain rule of subtraction, a species of argument utterly beneath gentlemen who deal in the subtilities of metaphysics: I will take the rule they themselves have furnished.

The theory which has produced such excitement in one portion of the South against the tariff, and which I presume is believed by all those who condemn the act of 1832, if we include the ultra-tariff men, who, by their associations in that vote, illustrate the truth of the proposition, "that the extremes are sometimes nearer together than the means," is thus expounded by one of its ablest supporters: (Report of Committee of Ways and Means by Mr. McDuffie, February 8, 1832.) "As the restrictions imposed upon the productions of Southern industry are affected by the agency of indirect taxes, the burdens imposed upon the planting States by the protecting system are not very inaccurately measured by the amount of taxes levied upon their productions. And when the inequality of the Government disbursements are added to the inequality of contributions exacted by import duties, it may be confidently affirmed that the burdens imposed upon the planting States by the taxation, prohibition, and disbursements of the Federal Government are more than equal to the amount of taxes levied upon those imports which are obtained in exchange for the three great agricultural staples of cotton, tobacco, and rice. That a duty upon an import is equivalent to the same amount of duty upon the export which has been exchanged for it, is but a self-evident proposition to all who correctly comprehend its import. The planter is as injuriously affected by the one duty as he would be by the other, without any reference whatever to his own consumption."

Here is a direct and unequivocal admission that the consumer of an article, as such, has no interest at all in the duty paid by that article; it is therefore of no importance to him whether the duty is ten, fifteen, or thirty per centum, nor from what article the revenue is collected. Now, if this proposition is true, and I admit its truth for the present occasion, the growers of rice, cotton, and tobacco, which articles constitute two-thirds of the American productions exchanged for foreign goods, pay two-thirds of the gross amount of duties charged on foreign importations, or, as has been estimated, forty per cent., a per cent. somewhat below the true amount. Let us apply this rule to the reduction of duties by the tariff of 1832, to ascertain the relief yielded to the rice, cotton, and tobacco men. If the reduction of the revenue by the bill of July, 1832, amounted to $5,187,078, as was estimated by the Treasury Department, the relief to those individuals, exclusively, was $2,074,831. Is this no relief to this class of society? They must know otherwise if they honestly believe they bear so large a share of the burden: and if we take into consideration the small class of individuals, even in the South, directly interested in the production of these articles, the relief to them under this view of their case, and by that bill, was of vast importance. But, sir, what becomes of this oppression on the poor? Are the poor the growers of rice, cotton, and tobacco? or was it intended as a mere figure of speech, a pathetic appeal?—

Spargere ambiguas voces
In vulgum.

Had I voted against the bill, believing this modern doctrine, I should have felt myself bound, as a consistent man, to have gone home and told my constituents that a proposition was made in Congress to relieve them from two millions of their burdens, which I had rejected with scorn, but that I had brought them the glorious remedy of nullification. I knew the temper of that people too well; I knew they were devotedly attached to the Union of these States, as the last hope of liberty upon earth, and that they were not inclined to jeopard it upon a doubtful point of political economy. Whenever, sir, I persuade the people whom I represent, to resist the laws of this Government, it will be such resistance as freemen should make, with arms in their hands, and not a pettifogging chicanery through the courts.

But, sir, if the bill of 1832 was radically wrong, the same objections apply to the bill on your table; it has also the mark of the beast upon it. This bill does not restore the credit system; it does not restore the false valuation of the pound sterling; it has likewise discriminating duties; it only carries out the principle of the bill of 1832, and reduces the revenue nearer to the wants of the Government. Its discriminating duties are of a more partial character than any bill ever presented to this House; it protects some species of iron (the most oppressive part of the tariff) by a duty of 76 per cent.; while cotton goods, a manufacture nearly acclimated, are protected by a duty of 20 per cent. When, however, the contest is for principle, I will not do any one the injustice to suppose that money will answer, should it amount to thousands; and unless that principle be yielded, nothing has been gained. I do not know how gentlemen will vote on the final passage of this bill; all that I am anxious about is, that if hereafter there should be any charge of inconsistency, it may rest precisely where truth and justice demand.

This act of 1832 was no favorite of mine: I was satisfied it would not answer the purpose for which it was intended, and that it did not extend its own principle sufficient for the occasion. During all the discussion on this subject, I watched the scene with a great deal of anxiety; I was desirous of seeing a deliberate expression of opinion between the two great antagonist principles in the country, "protection and no protection;" or if there were a third principle that would satisfy all parties. I listened in vain for the latter principle; I heard, day after day, speeches upon crude and ill-digested theories, but heard nothing more practicable than the mode of concession proposed in the bill of 1832.

The principle of collecting the revenue of the Government from one set of articles in order to give incidental protection to the manufactures of the country, establishes nothing new in our legislation; it is a doctrine as old as the constitution; and in 1816, when this matter of the tariff first began, it was distinctly admitted by the anti-tariff party. When the tariff of 1816 (the cause of all our woe) was under discussion, Mr. Telfair, of Georgia, a strenuous opposer of that bill, said "he would not deny that, in the imposition of duties for the purpose of revenue, it is wise to select your objects; that while the original intent is secured, the interest of the manufacturer is regarded as an incidental consideration." It is not, however, necessary to go so far back in our history for a legislative recognition of this principle. The present President of the United States, in his message to this House, of December 8, 1829, said: "Looking forward to the period, not far distant, when a sinking fund will no longer be required, the duties on those articles of importation which cannot come in competition with our productions, are the first that should engage the attention of Congress in the modification of the tariff. Of these, tea and coffee are the most prominent; they enter largely into the consumption of the country, and have become articles of necessity to all classes. A reduction, therefore, of the existing duties will be felt as a common benefit; but, like all other legislation connected with commerce, to be efficacious and not injurious, it should be gradual and certain." In compliance with this Executive recommendation, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of that day [Mr. McDuffie] reported a bill to this House reducing the duty on tea and coffee, which became a law, and which I voted for with great pleasure.

The address of the anti-tariff convention of Southern people, assembled in Philadelphia, in 1831, likewise admits the constitutionality of a tariff for incidental protection. That address, said to have been written by one of the gentlemen who signs this Georgia manifesto against the act of July, 1832, (Mr. Berrien,) contains these words: "They admit the power of Congress (speaking of the opinion of the South) to lay and collect such duties as they may deem necessary for the purposes of revenue, and within these limits so to arrange these duties as incidentally, and to that extent, to give protection to the manufacturer."

It seems to me, if we were to raise a revenue by imposts, it is a matter of but little consequence to the community, generally, upon what articles it is raised. Take, for example, sugar and coffee. Can it make any difference to the consumer of these two articles (I take it for granted he is the only person concerned) whether he pays two and a half cents a pound on sugar, and a half a cent on coffee, or three cents on sugar, and nothing on coffee? I contend it does not; the drinker of a cup of coffee neither feels nor cares upon which of the two articles he pays the duty. It makes, however, a vast difference to a large and valuable interest in the nation; for by one process you injure the sugar planter, without communicating a benefit to any interest whatever. If it really makes any difference to the mass of the community, of such vast magnitude, upon what articles the revenue of the country is raised, I confess I cannot perceive it, and I presume it is only visible to our political metaphysicians, who "Have optics keen, full well I ween,

"To see what is not to be seen."

One assertion, I presume, is as good as another in this matter; I have, therefore, no hesitation in saying that, under all the circumstances of the case, and considering the situation of the country, the act of 1832 was a great and valuable concession of the majority of this House to the alleged grievances of the minority. For if there is a principle which should be held sacred in the legislation of this country, it is, that an interest created by the law should not be wantonly destroyed by the law. If, moreover, the bill of July was not as beneficial to the South as it might have been, it was, in some measure, the fault of the South. The bill, as originally reported, contained a clause giving partial relief to the shipping interest of the country, from the excessive burden laid on that interest by the tariff of 1828: this clause was struck out by Southern votes. It requires, I should suppose, no argument to prove that a free trade people ought to encourage the shipping interest; and if the people of the South are, as we have been told, industriously engaged in manufacturing British woollens out of Southern cotton, they ought, as a reward for their ingenuity, be permitted to carry these articles to market in an untaxed vessel.*

Did I believe it essential to the prosperity or welfare of the Southern States, that the manufactories of the North should be levelled with the dust, it would be an unpleasant duty to vote a benefit to myself which would be the entire ruin of another. A few summers ago, while flying from the demon of ill health, I visited New England. I found her towns and villages crowded with an industrious and enterprising population; her hills and valleys redolent with health, prosperity, and contentment. Every mind seemed to be intent; every hand was occupied. The world does not contain a more flourishing community. There the advantages of education are extended to the poorest individual in society, and that society receives its remuneration in its sober, industrious, and economical habits. If the divine Plato were alive, he would no longer draw upon his imagination for a specimen of a perfect republic; he would there find a community in which the humblest individual had the same voice with his more wealthy neighbor in laying the public burdens for the public welfare. I asked myself if it were possible that the prosperity of this people could be the hot-bed production of an artificial system, or rather if it were not the result of long continued toil, of an industry that never tired, of an economy that never slept. I looked upon the scene around me with no feeling of murmuring discontent; I felt the more rejoiced that it was a part of my country.

"Homo sum humani nil a me alienum puto" was said by a freed Roman slave. Those persons who will study the mode of assessing taxes in New England for schools and other purposes, her town meetings, in fact, the whole organization of society in that community, must have a strange misapprehension of things if they can discover any aristocratic principle. They will find, however, an elasticity of character, of facility of adapting their situation to the times, great moral energies which will enable them, should your legislation prostrate them to the earth, to rise, like Antæus, with new vigor from the fall.

It is contended by some of those persons who complain the most of the operation of the General Government, (Mr. McDuffie's speech, May, 1832,) "that it could no longer be disguised that, under the unjust legislation of Congress, and without any agency of Providence, a radical hostility of interests existed between the two great

* This allusion will be unintelligible to those persons who have not attended to the discoveries which have been made in political science within the last three years at Washington. It is very gravely contended in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, above mentioned, "that whether the duty be laid on the export or the import, it is equally laid, in both cases, upon the production of the planter. There cannot be a more palpable and delusive error than the vulgar notion that imported manufactures, which have been purchased by the agricultural staples of this country, are foreign productions. They are as strictly and exclusively the productions of domestic industry as if they were manufactured in the United States. Looking, then, at the planting and manufacturing States with the eye of an enlightened philosophy, these two great divisions of the Union must be regarded as devoting their capital and labor to the production of the same articles for the very same market. The Southern States manufacture by the agency of ploughs, and hoes, and horses, what the Northern States manufacture by the agency of machinery," &c. The whole ingenuity of this argument consists in confounding the meaning of two very plain words, viz. property and production—an indistinctness of perception, which is occasionally the ruin of many ingenious gentlemen.

subdivisions of this confederacy." Now, sir, I deny that such hostility does exist, or that there is any fair reason for presuming it can be made by any legislation of Congress to exist. The great father of our institutions, foreseeing this state of things, has told us that upon this rock we were likely to split. He has implored us, in his last advice, to resist such an impression; to scout such an idea.

We are daily becoming more and more the same people in our habits, pursuits, and interests; and travellers have already remarked the sameness of American life and manners. The constant and daily communication among our people is wearing away by the friction of social intercourse, the petty prejudices of situation. "Mountains interposed, no longer make enemies of nations." I knew that there was a party in this country dating their origin from the adoption of the constitution, who have always been endeavoring to persuade the people of the different States that they have contrariant interests—a party composed of restless, ambitious spirits, who had "rather be the first man of an Alpine village than the second man at Rome." I did, however, hope that this sect was gradually dwindling into insignificance. I firmly believe the interests of the different sections of this country so dependent on each other, that it is impossible for one part permanently to flourish without communicating its prosperity to those around it: this fact has been satisfactorily attested by the astonishing results of the internal improvement of the country. Who has not heard of a new world brought into existence in the western part of New York by the genius of Clinton? With a mind soaring above the miserable economists of his day, he penetrated the mysteries of nature, dissipated the prejudices of the weak, the fears of the timid, and, like Columbus, opened a new world to the enterprise of his countrymen. Why, then, should I, or any man, wish to cripple the prosperity of two-thirds of this Union with the vain or illusory idea of benefiting the other third?

This question of the tariff has been discussed repeatedly, and very properly as one peculiarly interesting to the South. I will consider it, for a few moments, as it affects that portion of the country. In doing so, I shall consider it entirely as a question of compromise: I have not that contempt for compromise which some gentlemen seem to entertain. If we were legislating for a horde of savages who chased their daily food over the neighboring hills, and, in case of accident, depended upon plunder or the roots of the forest for subsistence, we might despise all compromise; but in legislating for a highly refined and artificial state of society, we should remember that civilization is the result of compromise. Our constitution is itself the result of compromise; and the history of the very clauses under which we are now acting (with which I will not trouble the House) is a strong illustration of its general character.

It is very common, in the political manœuvring of this country, to start a theory, and, by way of giving it currency and enlisting the prejudices of an ardent people, to call it the Southern doctrine. On "argument alone my faith is founded," and I shall support no doctrines and no theories my understanding does not teach me are correct and proper. Although I am opposed to the tariff system in general, I do not think it that "monstrum horrendum" some gentlemen seem to suppose it. I neither think it produces the bilious fever at Charleston, nor the yellow fever at New Orleans: it has sins enough of its own to bear; I will not saddle it with those of the imagination.

The great doubt originally entertained upon the capacity of this country to manufacture for itself, caused many persons to oppose the system. It was thought premature; that the country was too young; that we had too much waste land, offering a healthier and better occupation for our population. The experiment has, however, been tried; the country has paid part of the cost of the experiment. It is now admitted that we manufacture some articles as cheap in this country as in any other, and we have been informed by documents laid on our tables, that $250,000,000 are invested in the different manufactories of the country. Can this amount of capital be destroyed in any part of our country without producing distress and embarrassment throughout its wide border? I should suppose no political economist could for a moment doubt upon such a proposition; at all events, I am satisfied it would very seriously affect that section of the country whose interests are confided to my care.

If there are any two sections of this country designed by nature for a close political and commercial union, they are the southern part of the Chesapeake bay, the seacoast of North Carolina, and the New England States. Our earliest colonial history contains the most satisfactory evidence of this connexion; the cheap navigators of the North then formed, and yet form, our principal means of intercourse with the markets of the world; while, at the same time, New England is becoming a great and growing consumer of our products. Of the article of Southern corn, alone, the towns of Boston and Providence consumed, in 1831, 897,793 bushels. Would it not then be madness to destroy this market, without some positive and certain assurance of bettering the condition of the country? As gentlemen tell us, therefore, this is entirely a cent. per cent. question, let the corn planter ask himself if he is not willing to pay a higher duty on broadcloth than on coffee, for a few years, sooner than prostrate his best customer, and drive him to the fertile lands of Michigan and Indiana for a maintenance.

I said that the bill on your table carried out the principle of the act of 1832, and reduced the revenue of the country nearer the wants of the Government. It does so, with a few exceptions. Where those exceptions propose to impose a duty, I shall vote against them. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment before us, for striking out the duty on tea and coffee. I cannot, in January, vote to put on a duty which, in July preceding, I voted to take off, when no sufficient reason has been assigned for doing so inconsistent an act. Were I to give such a vote, I should in truth suppose I deserved some of the epithets which have been so liberally bestowed upon the Congress of the United States that passed the act of July, 1832. The duty on tea and coffee is likewise a violation of the principle on which the bill is reported, which, if I understand it, is to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, committing as little violence as possible to the existing interests of the country. This is the principle contained in the President's annual message, where he says, "the soundest maxims of public policy, and the principles upon which our republican institutions are founded, recommend a better adaptation of the revenue to the expenditure; and they also require that the expenditure should be limited to what, by an economical administration, shall be consistent with the simplicity of the Government, and necessary to an efficient public service. In effecting this adjustment, it is due, in justice to the interests of the different States, and even of the preservation of the Union itself, that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war. If, upon investigation, it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to any particular interest is greater than is indispensably requisite for these objects, I recommend that it be gradually diminished, and that, as far as may be consistent with these objects, the whole scheme of duties be reduced to the revenue standard as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will permit."

The Tariff Bill.

That the revenue should be reduced to the wants of the Government, is one of those plain and palpable truths which I suppose would be assented to on all sides. In fact, this proposition has been admitted by several gentlemen who are opposed to all the provisions of this bill. I would, therefore, observe to the gentlemen, that, as they have the majority on this floor, if this bill is injudicious they ought to amend it in such a way as to reduce the revenue six millions of dollars, the surplus mentioned by the Secretary of the Treasury, with as little injury as possible to themselves. For it never can be expected that the people of this country will consent to pay more money than is necessary for the ordinary wants of the Government, either for the protection of manufactures, internal improvements, or any other purposes.

And yet, sir, I would not narrow down the Government to a mean and niggardly economy.

That a duty on imports is necessarily a tax on any part of the community, although the converse of the proposition is paradoxical at first sight, I do not think has been satisfactorily maintained. Take, for example, the articles of salt, coffee, and molasses: on these three articles the Congress of the United States have been reducing the duties, with the view of reducing the price of them to the country; and yet such has not been the result. We find that when we took the duty off of salt in this country, the article rose in the West Indies; the truth is, the possession of the American market is so essential to the producers of these articles, that they are obliged to have it at all hazards, and, consequently, whenever Congress lays a heavy duty, their profits are reduced down to the lowest ebb that will sustain the business their situation compels them to follow.

And yet these facts, curious as they appear, are but fallacious grounds for a Government to lay heavy duties; although the consumers of the country, as such, may be but little interested in the matter, the commerce of the country is vitally interested. In proportion as we cultivate an intercourse with those nations, who, by position or by natural advantages in the production of such articles as are necessary for our comfort or pleasure, are disposed to trade with us on fair terms of reciprocity, we promote the general welfare of society, and give a stimulus to the commerce of the country, which, next to agriculture, should be the favorite of the nation. Should it be true, therefore, that the consumer of coffee would be no wise interested, whether there is a duty on it or not, still, the ship owner, who transports the article, the corn planter and the lumber getter, whose productions are exchanged for it, are interested that the trade should be on the most liberal footing. I will not, therefore, as a representative of a portion of this interest, assist in laying a burden on it, not required by the policy of the Government, or essential to its revenue.

I have no doubt, sir, this tariff matter can be adjusted, if we will approach it candidly and fairly, divesting it of its political bearings, without producing injury or showing unjust partiality towards any portion of the country. In laying a revenue duty so as to give incidental protection, let us select those manufactures whose interests are deeply rooted and widely spread throughout the country, viz. cottons, woollens, and sugar.

It is said and admitted here, generally, that we manufacture coarse cottons in this country as cheaply as in any part of the world; the price being less than the duty, the duty, therefore, cannot possibly be a burden on any one. The memorial of the anti-tariff convention says, "the duty is nominal in reference to most goods under fifteen cents, which not only are afforded as cheap by the American manufacturer as the foreign article, but compete with this in foreign markets." Why then disturb it? Is it not, the part of wisdom to let well enough alone?

The amount of cotton made in the United States, in the year ending in October, 1831, was 375,925,303 lbs.; in 1819, 87,397,645 lbs. There is now manufactured in this country more than one-fifth of the whole production, about one-third of what Great Britain manufactures at the present time. The manufacture of cotton has increased 100 per cent. in the last four years, an increase greater than ever took place in Great Britain in the same space of time. These facts manifest, beyond all doubt, that this country is well adapted, both by situation and capacity, to sustain such a manufacture, as well as any other country; and, therefore, it deserves the attention of the Legislature. We now produce 150,000,000 lbs. more of cotton than Great Britain consumes, of all sorts. Where is this large surplus to find a purchaser? Shall we prefer to build up the manufactures of all other countries to our own? I think when it is so very convenient and advantageous to ourselves, there is no great sin in permitting charity to begin at home. The cotton manufactured in this country amounts to about 214,882 bales; capital employed, 44,914,984 dollars; annual value, 32,056,760 dollars; aggregate of wages of hands employed, $12,155,723; employing about 50,000 men and women. Does not this benefit the grower of cotton? I have heard it so very vehemently denied, that I am indisposed to hazard any opinion of my own. I will, therefore, quote one that will be respected by all parties. During the summer of 1831, a convention was held in Philadelphia, of persons opposed to the tariff; that convention was composed principally of Southern men; they appointed a committee to draught a memorial to Congress, pointing out the burdens of the tariff laws. That memorial was written by Mr. Gallatin, and, as might be expected, is incomparably the ablest exposition of the evils of the tariff these very prolific times have produced. In it are these words: "Whatever impulse may have been given to the production of American cotton by the domestic manufactures of that material, is therefore a clear gain to the community. This, for the very reason that the amount cannot be calculated with precision, has, undoubtedly, been greatly exaggerated. But it cannot be doubted that the consumption of cotton goods in the United States has, to a certain extent, been increased by the establishment of domestic manufactures, and that the fluctuations of price are lessened by having a greater number of markets; in this case one nearer, and so considerable, even though the aggregate of sales was not materially increased." The cause of the fall of the price of raw cotton is thus accounted for: "The reduction of the price of the raw material was solely due to the increased supply compared with the demand." These admissions of the convention are very ungenerous; they are the "unkindest cuts of all;" the greatest of known rebukes is, "out of thine own mouth I will condemn thee." If, therefore, we are to believe the cotton planters' memorial, and not their advocates on this floor, they are decidedly benefited by the tariff. It is not the least curious part of this matter that, while this House was listening, day after day, to the most pathetic descriptions of the miseries and sufferings of the cotton planters, from the tariff, a memorial was laying on our tables emanating almost exclusively from this interest, admitting themselves benefited.

Let us now examine what claims the article of sugar has to a slow death. When Louisiana was purchased from France, the cultivation of sugar had commenced in that country; common justice requires that we should not unnecessarily cause the planter to regret that he had ever exchanged the yoke of the Spanish or French monarchies for the free government of America.

At the close of the war in 1816, Congress added half a cent to the duty as a part of a general system, which duty has given a great stimulus to the cultivation of sugar in

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

Louisiana; which country now produces two-thirds of the sugar consumed in the United States. I presume it will not be doubted that the duty is essential to the prosperity of the plantations, and, without it, the cultivation of sugar must cease. The present price of sugar is about five and a half cents per pound in New Orleans: the whole expense of producing sugar, I am informed, is about three and a half cents per pound, leaving about two cents profit to the planter; which two cents are his means to purchase slaves and increase his cultivation. If, therefore, you diminish his profits one half cent, you diminish his capacity to purchase one-fourth. The consumption of sugar in the United States amounts to about 150,000 hogsheads, the crop of Louisiana to about 100,000. An increase, therefore, of one-half the present number of slaves in that country must take place before the domestic consumption of sugar can be supplied. And when we take into consideration the astonishing increase, both in numbers, and the means of consumption of the Northern, Middle, and Western States, it is but fair to suppose that Louisiana will, for many years to come, furnish a market for the surplus slave labor of the South. The present number of slaves in the United States is about 2,153,370, worth $430,674,000; the destruction of the sugar cultivation would, undoubtedly, depress the price of slaves in proportion as the impetus it has hitherto given has increased it, which has been estimated, and I think very moderately, at $50 a head. An enormous depression of the value of property for no conceivable benefit. The bill on the table does not propose to reduce the revenue by it; for it proposes to take a half cent off of sugar, and put a cent a pound on coffee. Now if the revenue is really wanting, why make this absurd exchange? If not, it must share the fate of every thing. There is no State in this Union whose prosperity is so closely interwoven with the welfare of the others, as Louisiana; she is a great consumer for the rest; her labor is drawn from the old Southern States to cultivate her fields; her clothing from the North, and her food from the West. It is worthy attention to remark the gradual reduction in the price of sugar, even under the duty of three cents per pound. During the last twelve years sugar has been gradually declining in price, until it has reached a depression somewhat below half its price in 1819 and 1820; nor is it altogether certain that, if the duty were entirely removed, the consumer would derive any immediate benefit, although ultimately the article would be cheaper. The price of an article is regulated by the proportion of supply to demand; unquestionably, therefore, if the duty were suddenly removed, prudence would dictate to the Louisiana planter to contract immediately his operations, in order to avoid ultimate ruin. Unless, therefore, the reduction of supply at home were relieved by the increase from abroad, the price would rise; which state of things would, at all events, produce great fluctuations in the market. The production of sugar is not like that of cotton or woollen goods; this article is annually produced in a limited section of country, and cannot be increased or diminished at will; the winds and the rains of heaven must be consulted.

If there is any part of the tariff system more peculiarly unjust and indefensible, it is the duty on iron; this is an article absolutely indispensable to every class in society, and yet it is more highly taxed by this bill than any thing else, and without a corresponding benefit. Upon rolled bar iron the duty is seventy-six per cent., on sheet and hoop iron ninety-three per cent. Were I disposed to appeal to the meanest and basest passion that actuates the human mind, the passion of avarice, a passion that regards its personal wants, its personal appetites as every thing, the sufferings of others, the glory and independence of the country as nothing, it would be an easy matter to produce an excitement against this unjust preference of one interest to another. There is no article in the whole catalogue of human wants so essential to man as iron, nor one that so immediately contributes to his wellbeing; its use marks the first step from barbarity to civilization; and yet it is more favored by this bill than any thing else. Why is this? Has Pennsylvania deserved a better fate than any other State in the Union? Did she bring to the South in 1828, "in her utmost need," one solitary vote? No, she went in a solid phalanx for the "bill of abominations." And she is to be spared—the lightning glances over her, illuminates, but never touches her. Happy Pennsylvania, she has thirty electoral votes, and no candidate for the Presidency!

It is said by Mr. Gallatin, that "the iron works of West Pennsylvania were, and still continue to be, protected against foreign iron, and that made within one hundred miles of the seashore, by the expense of transportation, which is still forty dollars a ton." There certainly, then, can be no propriety in taxing so greatly the whole seaboard, from Maine to Louisiana, to sustain a manufacture which cannot flourish under these natural advantages. The mountains of North Carolina are full of iron ore, and yet no reasonable man would think the Government justifiable in placing a duty upon iron, sufficient to compensate the owners of those mines for making railroads and canals to bring their iron to market. Sir, I believe, if the duties on iron and hemp were removed, the much abused tariff of 1832 is preferable to the bill on your table.

It requires, it has been said by an ingenious writer, a great deal of philosophy to observe that which is seen every day; if this were not true, it would be impossible to account for the discrepancy of opinions upon the practical results of this protective system. Every one sees that the country is generally prosperous, for which different causes are assigned. I do not think the prosperity of this country dependent upon the action of the Government, nor is it desirable that it should be. I believe there is an elasticity and vigor in the American character, that will adapt itself to any system the wisdom or folly of this House may adopt. That the tariff compels the consumers of many articles to pay more for them than they otherwise would, is true; but that it produces one-half of the evils or benefits charged to it, is a position that has no existence, except in the heated imaginations of partisans.

It is said, all this may be true; but by some legerdemain not yet explained, although we have heard repeated attempts, the whole burden is thrown upon the South, the tax-paying South. It is extraordinary that any section of the country should claim the peculiar privilege of paying the taxes of the Government; the idea results from a species of egotism, as absurd as that of an astrologer, mentioned I think in the Spectator, who had studied the aspect of the heavens with such intensity of zeal, that he at length believed himself master of the winds, and would very graciously, and with extreme condescension, offer to a friend going a journey, any wind he might have a fancy for. There is, however, we are told, a theory, a self-evident proposition, that explains the matter. It has been said, (report of the Committee of Ways and Means, by Mr. McDuffie,) "as the restrictions imposed upon the productions of the Southern industry are affected by the agency of indirect taxes, the burdens imposed upon the planting States by the protective system are not very inaccurately measured by the amount of taxes levied upon articles exchanged for those productions," or, in other words, a duty on imports is equivalent to a duty upon exports. I regard this as the most pernicious dogma that ever has been started in this country; its direct and inevitable tendency is a destruction of the Union; for if their position be true, collect what amount of revenue you may, whether twelve per cent. or fifty per cent., the greater part of the revenue must be paid by that portion of the country producing articles best adapted to foreign markets.

I will not say, sir, as was said by a gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DAVIS,] during the last session, "He doubted whether any Government, except the State Government, was worth the taxes the people paid for it;" but this I will say, that on these terms, or if this theory is true, the Federal Government never can sustain itself. Could I believe, by the inevitable acts of your legislation, I was made a hewer of wood and a drawer of water for the rest of the Union, I should feel myself degraded were I to come here to debate the matter. I should feel myself impelled by every principle that ever nerved the arm or swelled the bosom of an American freeman, to resist such oppression. I am not therefore, surprised that sections of our country are maddened almost to frenzy under the operation of this doctrine. To have believed it, and borne it so long, is a proof of their great patriotism and most eminent discretion. This theory, however, confines its operation to the growers of rice, cotton, and tobacco; it is of course of no importance to persons not connected with the production of these articles, what the tariff may be; their portion of the burden being thrown upon their more substantial neighbors. I have shown, by an extract from the memorial of the cotton planters, that they conceive themselves benefited by the system in some measure. I shall, therefore, trouble myself no more with the subject, than to make a few remarks upon a corollary that has been drawn from it. We have been told by the same document "that the fairest portion of this great confederacy, and of heaven the most favored region of the earth, is literally undergoing a silent but irresistible process of decay, produced by the gross perversion of the very power which is under the highest of human obligations to prevent it." I admit that the South is not as flourishing as some portions of this confederacy; but I deny that its depression is to be attributed to the action of the General Government, and I am much astonished that any person could overlook the plain and palpable causes there existing, sufficient (without stimulating the natural prejudices of the people against the General Government) to account for all the horrors of even warmer imaginations.

The peculiar character of the emigration alone from the old Southern States, an emigration which carries off both the labor and capital of the country, leaving nothing to supply its place, is sufficient to account for many of our miseries. Does not that labor find the tariff as grinding and oppressive in the Southwest as in either of the Carolinas? Why, then, should it abandon its native soil to waste and desolation, because a fresher and more fertile soil invites it? There are two other causes operating unfavorably on the Southern seaboard; one a moral, the other a physical cause. I will not, however, sir, dilate on this subject; to me it is an unpleasant one. I love the South, with all her misfortunes—I love her, "'tis my own, my native land," "tecum vivere amem tecum obeam libens"—it is from the affection I bear her, I am induced to speak thus plainly to her.

There is another cause operating to the serious disadvantage of the best portion of the South, and, I admit, "of heaven the most favored region," if we regard soil, climate and situation: I mean the interior of the Southern country, particularly of North Carolina and Virginia. Why is it that this section is not as flourishing as the interior of New York, and Pennsylvania? The climate is equally, if not more congenial to the constitution of the white man, and the soil is more productive in every thing that can contribute to the prosperity of the people. Why is it that a silence, as of death, pervades their thousand hills, there we find no busy hum of men, no throng of flocks or of herds? It is because the hostility of the South to the improvement of the country leaves every thing to nature. We complain that the revenue of the country is collected at the South, and expended to the North. If this is true, it is our own fault. Is there a proposition to remove a sand bar or deepen a river in any part of this country, that does not encounter a solid phalanx of hostility (with a few exceptions) from the whole Southern delegation on this floor? During the last session, an honorable friend of mine, [Mr. CAMSON,] when the annual appropriation bill, for the improvement of the harbors of the country, was before the House, proclaimed it an imposition on the people.

Does any one propose to appropriate a few thousand dollars from an abundant treasury, to open a road through our beautiful interior, that it may communicate with the markets and civilization of the rest of the world, we are immediately told of violated constitutions, and all the slang which has been current on this floor for the last twenty years about State rights, is repeated "usque ad nauseam." It seems as if some gentlemen supposed every thing which was calculated to promote the prosperity, to enlarge the sphere of action of the mass of the people, was a violation of the constitution.

At the last session of Congress, a bill came to this House from the Senate, proposing to settle the policy of our public lands—a bill whose object was to prevent them from being given ultimately to the West—a bill to restore to the old Atlantic States some portion of the treasure they had so liberally spent in purchasing that vast region, and to remunerate them in some measure for the constant drain upon their resources, produced by emigration. Was that bill lost by Southern votes? Let your journals answer.

This Government may spend millions upon millions on its army or its navy; it may pave the road of the Indian beyond the Mississippi with ingots of gold; it may squander the enormous amount of our public lands, to purchase a little personal popularity in the West, and all is well; but if it attempts to spend one dollar of the public treasure for the public welfare, we are told of violated constitutions. Sir, should the South become, in the process of decay, what one portion of it has been threatened with, "a howling wilderness," there is scarcely a monument on its wide border, of the liberality of those who have governed it, to prove to the industrious antiquarian that it had ever been trod by the foot of civilized man. There might be found some barren and blasted fields, as if the sirocco of the desert had passed over it, but there would be no Applan way, resisting the efforts of the barbarian, or the decay of time. I did suppose, when I first entered these walls, something might be done to revive the stagnant and wasting energies of the South; but when I heard what on this floor are proclaimed as Southern doctrines and Southern principles, I felt that sickness of the soul which awaits on hope deferred. Perhaps it was the result of a retired life that led me to believe that some higher duty was assigned a member on this floor, than a mere vote for the annual bills to pay the salaries of the Government officers, and it may be folly to suppose that a legislator should be, or could be, a benefactor of mankind. I am, however, satisfied that a new generation of politicians must arise, after the present one has fretted its little hour upon the stage, before the southern part of this Union can derive its full share of the benefits of the liberal institutions of the country.*

*That the Southern people have lost much in spending their time disputing about the meaning of the constitution, instead of devoting their energies and resources to the improvement of the country, I think must be apparent to every man who will calmly and dispassionately view the whole ground. It is impossible, in this age, for any people to stand still; they must either advance or recede in the scale of importance among nations. The human mind is now so active; so intensely bent on developing all its resources, that those nations which, like Spain, or Portugal, with a blind bigotry, shut out every ray of light, must either relapse into barbarism, the prey of military despot-

The Tariff Bill.

It has often been asserted in the two Houses of Congress that the South, in particular, would be a gainer by the system of direct taxation; a false position, which has been too currently circulated through the country, although there has been, during the frequent discussions upon this subject, a very satisfactory refutation of this notion. I take it for granted that the only correct theory is, that the man who buys and consumes an article is the one upon whom the tax, if any exists, ultimately falls. It is said that in Louisiana a plantation producing a crop of cotton worth about ten thousand dollars, consumes, in the production of that crop, about two thousand eight hundred dollars' worth of articles not made on the plantation. Of this consumption, one-fourth, about seven or eight hundred dollars, is of taxed articles. This is a very favorable calculation for all the planters north of Louisiana, particularly for those who make their own pork, as some have told us they do. Let us apply this rule to South Carolina. South Carolina exports about 8,000,000 dollars of produce. All the productive labor, and all the plantations of South Carolina, are occupied in producing this 8,000,000 dollars, one-third of which sum, 2,666,666 dollars, is the amount of articles consumed, and not produced by the plantations, one-fourth of which, viz. 666,666 dollars, are articles upon which the General Government leaves a revenue. Now, supposing the duty constitutes half the price of an article, an extravagant supposition, the enormous burden which is now weighing South Carolina to the dust, and to throw off which she is convulsing this country, and placing in jeopardy all our institutions, is 333,333 dollars.

ism, or sink into insignificance. The desire manifested by many, of increasing the hostility to the improvement of the country, by connecting it with the tariff, is unjust, and an unstatesmanlike view of the subject. There is necessarily no more natural connexion between the tariff and internal improvement, than any other modes of policy which produce great national benefits. With as much propriety may it be said that the surveying and settlement of the public lands should be arrested, for fear of furnishing, in future times, a valuable market to our domestic manufactures. These manufactures must, in process of time, if they succeed in supplying the home market, reduce the revenue: the policy, therefore, that would unite these two interests is rather short-sighted, if it is supposed that one is to become a permanent fund to aid the other. While this temporary swell in the treasury, produced by the American system, exists, sound policy demands that a surplus, unavoidably remaining in our coffers, should be applied to the improvement of the country.

There is another reason for this view of the subject, which I wish to address to the South in the words of Mr. McDUFFIE. In his letter on the subject of internal improvement, published in the Newark Advocate, of March 15, 1828, are these words: "I think the Southern and Western States are the natural advocates of a system of internal improvements, and I regret that the constitutional scruples of a portion of the Southern people should prevent a hearty co-operation. This is the only form in which the Southern States can be indemnified for the tax levied upon them, to sustain the manufactures of the Eastern States." That a power of this character may be abused, is very true; such is the fate of all human undertakings; it has, however, as yet, never been much abused, and, from the conflicting interests always found on the floor of Congress, it is not very likely to be. The whole sum ever expended by the Government of the United States, in drawing forth the resources of the country, by aiding works purely intended for that purpose, does not yet amount to the expenses of its army and navy for one year.

Should the amount necessary for the support of the Federal Government be levied by direct taxation, and the negroes of the South pay according to the ratio established in the constitution, the proportion of South Carolina would be about 900,000 dollars. I have selected the State of South Carolina to illustrate this proposition, in preference to North Carolina, because, from the nature of the situation of North Carolina, it is impossible to estimate the amount of her exports. Our Southern counties trade to Charleston, and our Northern ones wagon such articles as will afford the transportation over bad roads, to Petersburg and Richmond, where they exchange their produce, not for State money, but for the money of the Union, and a peculiar manufacture, in which the latter town is said to be very skilful, called "State rights;" an article so cunningly contrived that it can be understood only by the makers, and of so little use elsewhere, that it is supposed to be made, like Pindar's razors, exclusively to trade with. Should North Carolina, however, become imbued with the doctrines of the new philosophy, and the taxes of the Government be directly levied, instead of paying her portion of the revenue upon such articles as are consumed within her border, and by the persons who do consume them, to the amount of some three or four hundred thousand dollars, she would be taxed, according to her population, at least a million. Sir, let this Government ever change the present oppressive mode of collecting revenue for its ordinary peace establishment; for the odious system of direct taxation, and it will hear a murmur, to which the present discontent is like "the sweet South wind, breathing o'er a bank of violets."

When I first entered these walls, some three years ago, I did so imbued with the doctrines of the free trade school. I admired them for their liberality, thought them sound in principle, and best adapted to a republic. Disposed to act upon these views, I had hardly taken my seat before I discovered that a great political drama was about to be acted, called "the Tariff;" that the characters were cast, the dresses provided, the speeches in rehearsal, and even the home-made thunder prepared; I found that the old armor of the party was to give place to one more brilliant, more calculated for effect. Seeing this to be the state of things, I very coolly and deliberately took my seat in this very comfortable arm-chair, determined to observe in silence the contest, to see if it would prove a tragedy or a farce. "Equidem non invidio, miror magis," and here I should have sat contented had I not discovered that there was no longer safety in inaction; "there is no great divinity in aye or no!"

There is one point, sir, before I take my seat, that I am desirous of saying a few words upon, with no view of arguing the subject, but simply to express an opinion: I mean the constitutionality of our several revenue acts of 1824-'28-'32. I am the more inclined to do so, because the members of the Legislature of North Carolina lately acted on the subject, and although they forbore to express any opinion themselves, have asserted that a large part of the people believe those laws unconstitutional. I fully coincide with the general scope and tenor of those resolutions, and rejoice that the Legislature of my native State has forbore to lend the sanction of its name to a temporary delusion. And I hope she will continue to pursue that course which honor and which duty points out, treating with contempt the silly jests and scoffs of idle babblers and stump orators, come they whence they may, or be they whom they may. It is with great diffidence that at any time I would differ from a large portion of the people upon a mere constitutional question, but the construction of the constitution upon this subject has so long been settled by the concurrent sanction of every President, the vast majority of the people, and of the ablest jurists of the country, that to doubt now that these laws are constitutional, is supposing the plainest and most obvious propositions in the constitution have for forty years been misunderstood. There is scarcely a public man of any character or standing, who for the last forty years has been before the people, that has not acquiesced in the exercise of this power; nor do I believe doubts upon the subject were entertained until it was found convenient to retreat behind that eternal source of disputation, the constitution of the country.

For myself, I have always regarded the constitution of our country as a great charter of human liberty—a charter not wrested by the sword from some ambitious tyrant, but a free-offering of the American people upon the altar of liberty—an offering composed of their local passions, their local prejudices, and their local interests. Believing such to be its character, I have endeavored to approach its construction, not with the feeling of a mere carping attorney, but with that elevated philanthropy that would endeavor to construe the instrument with the spirit that engendered it. Where it was necessary to give the General Government a power, I believe it given fully and beneficially; when a power is denied, it is denied entirely.

Now, sir, with these principles of construction, can any rational man doubt the meaning of these expressions in the constitution? "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," &c. "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It is said the power to lay and collect duties and imposts is a part of the taxing power, and was intended to supply the Government with revenue alone. This is probably true, and very forcibly proves that the words "to regulate commerce" were intended to have a more enlarged construction. The constitution, in saying "that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another," shows clearly that, as regards commerce in all its various branches, we are one entire nation, and that the whole subject is surrendered to the Federal Government. That there is no clause in the constitution giving Congress the power to protect manufactures, eo nomine, is certainly true; and it is likewise true that there is no clause in the constitution forbidding the Legislature to regulate commerce by discriminating duties, tonnage duties, or in any other way which to them may seem meet and proper.

It is amusing to observe the inconsistencies in which "the State rights gentlemen" involve themselves in arriving at the conclusion that the acts of 1824, 1828, or 1832, are unconstitutional. They tell us, when reasoning against the power of the General Government to appropriate money for internal improvement, that the constitution must be construed strictly; that all constructive powers are dangerous to liberty; that it is inadmissible to seek out of the constitution the meaning of the constitution; that the General Government may have the amount of the bond, but nothing more; all I ask is, that it may have nothing less. How, then, do gentlemen discover these acts are unconstitutional? The power over the subject is expressly granted. Will they apply to the proceedings of the convention that framed the instrument, and the traditions of the times, to ascertain the meaning of the words "to regulate commerce?" Certainly not—their principles forbid it.

It is melancholy to see, in the political discussions of the country, a constant disposition to reason from the inexpediency of a measure to its unconstitutionality; and, whenever a law bears a little upon our pride or our prejudices, a desire to pronounce it unconstitutional. Sir, the man who is not willing to bear a public burden for a public good, has the soul of a slave, and is unworthy the name of a freeman. If this power does not rest with the General Government, we exhibit the singular spectacle of twenty-four republics, populous and energetic in themselves, yet self-immolated at the shrine of the avarice and extortion of the rest of the world. I said that I merely intended to express an opinion, valueless as it may be—I would have been false to myself, false to every tie that binds me to the society in which I live, more than all, I would have been false to those I represent, had I failed to do so.

Mr. SLADE, of Vermont, next obtained the floor. He said he regretted the necessity which had been imposed on him, by ill health and other causes, to defer the execution of his purpose of addressing the committee at so late a period of the debate. He felt deeply the embarrassment incident to any attempt which he could make to engage the attention of the committee, after the subject in debate had been so fully and ably discussed by others. But it was too momentous in its consequences, both to his immediate constituents and the whole country, to permit him to remain entirely silent.

The bill on your table, said Mr. S., contemplates a great and vital change in the protecting system; a system whose operations are more complicated, and affect a greater diversity of interests, than perhaps any branch of our national policy.

The people, whose Government this is, and whose interests are deeply involved in this question, are not, and cannot be here, to decide it for themselves. They have entrusted the power of legislating upon it to us; and they have a right to expect that we will so exercise the power that our legislation shall be a faithful reflection of their will; and that great and radical changes in the public policy shall not be made, but in obedience to strong and unequivocal expressions of that will.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a new question. Congress has, it is true, often legislated upon the tariff. But it has been for the purpose of building up a system of protection to the industry of the country. 'This is a question, not of building up, but of pulling down; not whether the American system shall be sustained, and so enlarged and modified as to perfect, as far as practicable, the long cherished policy of extending protection to every interest requiring it; but the main pillars of the system are sought to be prostrated, and its entire proportions changed.

Regarding the measure in this light, I have been led to inquire—does the public voice demand it? Who has heard that voice? Where are the evidences of the desire of the people to commence the work of destruction? Are there any memorials on your table? Have the people spoken to us in their primary assemblies? Have they resolved that their industry does not need continued protection? Is there not, on the contrary, most obviously, a general conviction of the beneficence of the protecting system? And does not the unexampled prosperity of the country bear the most decided and ample testimony to it?

But it is sometimes said, and urged in the form of argument, that the disposition of the country to abandon the protective policy has been plainly indicated by the reelection of the present Chief Magistrate. Now, sir, who does not know that tens of thousands of votes were given to General Jackson without the slightest reference to the question, whether he was in favor of a high or a low tariff, or no tariff at all? And, besides, was he not urged upon the freemen of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Louisiana, as a decided friend to the protective policy—disposed to carry it to the point of effectually sustaining the industry of the country? Does any man believe that, but for this, he could have obtained even one of the one hundred and twenty-four votes which were given him by those States? Would his friends have dared to present a draught of this bill to the freemen of either of them, with an assurance that he would, if elected, lend his influence to secure its passage? And yet the people are now told that his reelection furnishes evidence that the country calls for this measure.

Mr. Chairman, the people have not, either directly or indirectly, spoken to us on this subject, for the best of all reasons. Almost the whole of our last session was occupied in legislating upon it. We made a general revision of the system, embracing numerous and material reductions, in accommodation to the diminished amount of needed revenue, as well as to the complaints of our Southern brethren. The whole country considered the question, as to the extent of protection, to be, for the present at least, settled. Nothing was further from the imaginations of the people than that the same Congress which had thus revised the whole system of protection with a full view of the existing and protective condition of the revenue, and upon a deliberate consideration of all the arguments which the most excited ingenuity could urge against it, would, in the short space of five months, and before their legislation had taken effect, be seriously deliberating upon a proposition involving, substantially, an abandonment of the protective policy. So firmly, indeed, had the conviction taken possession of the public mind, that the question would not be soon moved, that even the organ of anti-protection and nullification, in this city,* actually delayed the printing of the testimony on the subject of manufactures, taken last summer and ordered to be printed, upon the ground, as he himself has expressly stated in his communication to this House, that it would not be wanted at the present session of Congress. And, after all, we are told that the people call for the measure we are now urged to adopt. Sir, the people, I repeat, have not spoken to us on this subject: They have not asked us to revise our legislation. They have, in fact, rested in full confidence that we would not do it.

In this state of things, the present session of Congress was opened, and the President's recommendation that the revenue should be reduced to the wants of the Government, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The sessions of the committee were hastened, and a bill was reported. And for what? To reduce the revenue merely? No, sir. A very different subject had engaged their deliberations. It was the system of protection; and to reduce that protection, rather than the revenue, seems to have constituted the burden of their labors. The bill on your table—a bill which carries the country back, in the scale of protection, sixteen years in one, was the result.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to trace, for a moment, the history of this bill. Soon after its introduction, the House was astonished by the declaration of a very distinguished member of the committee, [Mr. WILKES] that he should refrain from entering into an exposition of its principles or details, because he had, in this case, adopted the maxim, that it is for minorities to talk, and majorities to vote. Sir, who authorized the honorable member of the committee to assume that there was a majority of this House in favor of the bill? Was it to be carried by a mere party vote, that the necessity of sustaining it upon its merits was thus, in effect, disclaimed? Well, sir, the minority did talk; and they talked to so much purpose, that it began to be doubted whether the assumed minority would not turn out to be a majority. It was, therefore, deemed necessary by one of the committee, [Mr. POLK,] to attempt to sustain the bill; in doing which, he surprised us with the production of the voluminous testimony relative to manufactures, taken during the last summer, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; testimony which the public printer has not thought it necessary to print, and no part of which had been ever seen by the other members of the House; but which they were thus called upon to weigh in the decision of one of the most complicated and difficult questions which could be presented to them. I will not detain the committee with an examination of that testimony. It has been amply exposed by the "cross-examination" of my able colleague, [Mr. EVANS], especially as far as it regards my own State.

While the honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means, who introduced this testimony, has utterly failed to sustain by it the bill on your table, he has furnished what should be to him, certainly, a most conclusive reason for postponing the whole subject to a future period. By attempting to use the testimony, he has shown us that he considers it material to the issue; and if it is material, then, certainly, should those whose interests are involved, have an opportunity to examine and explain it. If it is to be used for the purpose of sustaining such a bill as this, in the name of the people, I ask that it may be published and submitted to their inspection. Sir, the farmers and mechanics of the country are on trial before this body. And is not this testimony a surprise upon them? May not their agents here claim for them at least one continuance? Shall a decision be forced upon them now? Mr. Chairman, if it must be, then, certainly, may those who represent them claim the privilege, at least, of a patient hearing; and such a hearing assuredly they may expect at the hands of those who aided in building up the system which they are now laboring to destroy.

The first position which I ask the opponents of the protecting system to consider is, that the public faith stands pledged to sustain it. The Government has legislated forty years upon the principle of protecting, by discriminating duties, the industry of the country. The tendency of this policy has been to invite the investment of capital in manufacturing establishments, and in the various branches of industry connected with, and dependent upon them. These investments have been made to an almost incredible amount; and made in the confidence justly inspired by our legislation, that no sudden change in the public policy would render them valueless. And, sir, the pledge thus given derives additional sacredness from the fact that the investments of which I speak have been invited, not merely on the ground that they would be beneficial to capitalists, but on grounds of public policy—not, in fact, so much for individual, as for public benefit.

But the claims of domestic industry rest on still stronger ground than this. The capital of New England was, on a memorable occasion, actually forced into manufacturing; and that at the expense of sacrifices which are now to be doubled in forcing it back again.

Permit me to ask, Mr. Chairman, how much the right to protection, thus created, differs from the commonly received idea of a vested right? What difference is there, in principle, between the plighted faith of the Government in this case, and in that of a turnpike or bridge company? A grant is as substantially made in one case as in the other; and investments are made upon the faith of it. And can those who would revolt at the injustice of the legislation which should attempt to deprive such a company of the right of taking toll, after complying with the terms of the grant, be indifferent to that withdrawal of protection from millions of manufacturing and agricultural capital which must subject it to the most ruinous sacrifices?

I admit, indeed, that the affairs of men, so far as they stand connected with general legislation, must be subject to its ordinary fluctuations, against which a prudent foresight will be able to guard. But no foresight could guard against the change which is contemplated by this bill. No man had a right to expect it. No man—I speak of those upon whom its weight is mainly to fall—did expect it.

The Tariff Bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, our duty in this matter rests upon broader ground than this. We are bound, upon the soundest principles of public policy, to sustain the system of protection to the industry of the country, and to the whole industry of the whole country, against foreign competition. Nor are we to limit the exercise of our power of doing this, to the temporary counteraction of some particular act of foreign legislation. We are bound to adopt and maintain a system which shall permanently secure the country against the general tide of that legislation, in all its fluctuations. Let me illustrate this by an example. Suppose that Great Britain suddenly abolishes her prohibitions of the importation of our breadstuffs, which she has long maintained, for the purpose of sustaining her agriculture. Should we, therefore, immediately open our ports to the admission of her manufactures free of duty? Certainly not. What would be the consequence? The moment our manufacturing establishments should be prostrated, as they would be by this operation, with the sacrifice of millions, Great Britain might resume her prohibitions, and we should be left with our agricultural produce rotting on our hands, while she would enjoy a monopoly of our market for the sale of her manufactures. Our true policy is to guard against all such fluctuations of foreign legislation, by adopting and steadily maintaining a system which shall give the highest possible development to the capacities of our people and our soil; and thus establish, upon deep and enduring foundations, a barrier against the broad stream of foreign policy which is perpetually struggling to overwhelm us with the productions of foreign labor, and paralyze the creating energies of our own.

This view of the protecting policy was obviously in the contemplation of Mr. Madison, when, in his first executive message, he recommended manufactures to "the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress;" and this is what Mr. Jefferson subsequently denominated "the true republican policy." It has, sir, been the cherished policy of this Government, from the passage of the first revenue law, in 1789, down to the present time.

And need I speak of its effects? how it has stimulated the industry, diversified the pursuits, developed the resources, and augmented the wealth, and population, and happiness of this great people? Is it not fully realizing the predictions of its early friends, and fulfilling the beneficent designs of the framers of the constitution?

But, sir, a new era has arisen. The fathers of the republic are gone! The constitution, the noble monument of their wisdom, is committed to other hands. And now in face of the construction undeniably given by them to that instrument, and inscribed in broad characters upon our statute book, in the memorable preamble to our first revenue law; and notwithstanding that construction has been sanctioned and settled by the practice of this Government for more than forty years, we are told, not only that there exists no constitutional power to regulate commerce with a view to the protection of our industry, but that its exercise must be forthwith abandoned, at the hazard of revolution!

I will not, Mr. Chairman, detain the committee a moment with an attempt to vindicate the exercise of this power upon constitutional grounds. It has been ably and conclusively sustained in this debate. I will ask the indulgence of the committee only while I advert, briefly, to one or two objections urged against the protecting system, on the ground of expediency.

For the purpose of rendering the system odious, we are told that it builds up monopolies. Sir, nothing can be more unfounded than this. What sort of monopoly is that which leaves to all the free enjoyment of its benefits, which throws wide open the door to competition? I need not stop to expose such an absurdity. But the objection sometimes assumes another form. The few, it is said, are enriched at the expense of the many; and overgrown capitals are accumulated, and lordly nabobs reared up to ride over the necks of the people. Sir, how is the capital which puts in motion the great mass of your manufacturing establishments invested? Is it not, to a very great extent, in the form of joint stock companies, in which all have an opportunity of participating who are able to purchase a single share? If, therefore, the benefits were wholly confined to manufacturing capitalists, there would be nothing to alarm even the most strenuous advocates for liberty and equality. But they are not alone, or mainly, benefited by this system. Their capital, which is the object of so much jealousy and apprehension, is but the minister of good to the farmers, the mechanics, and the laborers of the country; and they, sir, have too much good sense not to see and feel it. Talk to them of odious monopolies and overgrown capitalists, they will tell you to look at the improvements in agriculture and the mechanic arts; the increased value of every species of productive labor; the enlarged capacity, and augmented products of the soil; the enhanced value of the forests; the new created wealth of the mines; and the flocks and herds covering the extended valleys, and rambling upon the thousand hills; while they will invite you to listen to the busy hum of free and happy industry which is the crowning glory of the whole. Here, they will triumphantly tell you, are the genuine fruits of the protecting policy—these the creations of the American system.

But, we are told that this system is fraught with oppression to the South—oppression which it cannot, and will not, endure.

Mr. Chairman, my constituents are an inquisitive people; and, having incurred a full share of the responsibility of building up the protective system, they want to know what are the real grounds of the complaint that it is intolerably oppressive. They have, indeed, been told that the exporters of our productions, in fact, pay the whole of the duties levied on the importations purchased with them; and that, inasmuch as the largest portion of the dutiable imports are purchased, directly or indirectly, with the principal Southern staple, therefore the cotton-planting States pay nearly all the revenues of the country. Now, sir, the utmost ingenuity of the advocates of this new theory has never been able to convince either my constituents or their humble representative of its correctness. We still adhere to the old doctrine, that the consumer pays the duty, except when prices are so reduced by competition, as, in effect, to throw a portion of the duty upon the foreign manufacturer.

Mr. Chairman, do gentlemen who advance this theory perceive in what, if carried out, it will terminate? If it be correct, it applies not merely to duties levied for protection, but to all duties. It strikes at our whole system of revenue, and overturns the established opinions, not only of this, but of all commercial countries, with regard to the operation of impost duties. And has the world been so long laboring under a delusion, which it is reserved to the political economists of South Carolina to dispel? If it is a delusion, it is certainly a most extraordinary one; for, in adjusting every system of taxation, the leading and prominent questions must always be—upon what objects is it to operate? And upon what portion of the community are its burdens to fall? And yet, upon these vital questions the world has, for ages, been entirely mistaken. Even the framers of our constitution, who are generally allowed to have been, at least, respectable for wisdom, were in utter darkness on the subject. They provided, among other things, for the laying of "imposts, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare." Does any one believe that it entered into their imaginations that the exporters of produce, instead of the consumers of the merchandise purchased with it, were to bear the burden of these imposts? Why did they provide that all imposts should be "uniform throughout the United States?" Obviously for no other purpose than that of equalizing the rates of taxation among the consumers of imported merchandise. Upon the South Carolina theory, such a provision would have been idle and useless. They provided, too, that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." But here they were, according to the South Carolina doctrine, still in the dark; for while they intended effectually to secure our exports from taxation, they did, in fact, subject them to the burden of paying the entire revenues of the country. The wise men who framed the constitution, did not, it seems, understand the work of their own hands; nor had the accumulated wisdom of the whole country been able, in the process of forty years' administration of the Government, to understand it, until the light of the "forty bale theory" burst upon the world.

It has not been my intention, Mr. Chairman, to detain the committee with a minute investigation of this theory. The arguments by which it has been met and overthrown are familiar to all, and I think I may venture to say that there are not ten members on this floor, who would now soberly attempt its vindication. And yet, preposterous and revolting to common sense as it is, it has been successfully employed in South Carolina, to the purpose of seducing her people into resolutions of resistance to what they have thus been made to believe is intolerable oppression—insupportable tyranny.

But we are told that the duties upon consumption are oppressive, because unequally burdensome, to the South. Now, sir, how does it appear that the South sustains an unequal portion of the burden of imposts? The rates of duties are the same every where. The only question then is as to the comparative amount of the consumption of dutiable articles by different sections of the country. And as it is a fundamental principle of the constitution that the burdens of taxes and the benefits of representation shall be equal, no State can justly complain of burdens as unequal, which do not exceed the measure of its representation. South Carolina, for example, ought not to complain, if she pays no more taxes than another State, having an equal representation. Now, sir, South Carolina has nine representatives on this floor, while Vermont has but five. South Carolina, then, should pay nearly twice as much as Vermont. But who will seriously undertake to maintain that she contributes in that proportion to the expenses of this Government? Why should her contributions even exceed those of Vermont, when her white population is fifteen thousand less than that State? It is true, she has 315,000 slaves, with a representation here of four on their account—one, only, less than the entire representation of Vermont. But what amount of dutiable articles is consumed by these slaves, compared with that consumed by an equal number of Northern freemen? Almost the entire amount consists of the coarsest and cheapest woollens; and yielding, therefore, even at a duty of fifty per centum upon their value, but a very inconsiderable portion of the whole revenue, compared with the more expensive clothing of the population of the North. But even this pittance, constituting almost the entire revenue derived from the slave consumption, has been nearly relinquished by the act of last session, coarse woollens, for the sake of peace, having been brought down to a mere nominal duty of five per cent.—thus almost entirely exempting from taxation the consumption of a portion of the population of South Carolina, equivalent, in point of political power, to four-fifths of the people of the State of Vermont. And yet, sir, South Carolina comes here and talks of oppression—intolerable oppression!

But, ask Southern gentlemen, is it not oppressive to compel us to purchase the articles of our consumption, at an advance, resulting from the protecting duties, of from fifty to one hundred per cent., when that advance enures to the exclusive benefit of the Northern manufacturer? The burden of this complaint rests upon the assumption that, but for the protecting duties, the articles upon which they are now levied might be purchased for their present price, less than the whole amount of the duties; and that, therefore, the South pays that amount as a tribute to the Northern manufacturer.

Now, sir, let us test the correctness of this assumption by reference to a few of the articles on which protecting duties are levied. The price of nails, for example, is six cents per pound—the duty five cents. Does any body believe that, if the duty were entirely taken off, nails might be purchased for one cent? Lead sells at 3½ cents, and there is levied upon it a duty of 3 cents. Who believes that it could be purchased at five mills, if exempted from duty? So also the price of cottons within the 30 cents minimum averages ten cents per yard. The duty is equal to 7½ cents. Where could they be purchased for 2½ cents, if the duties were removed? I might pursue the illustration, by a reference to numerous other articles which enter extensively into the consumption of every part of the country. Indeed, I believe it may be safely asserted that the general effect of an increase of duty for the purpose of protection, upon any particular article, has been to reduce its price to the consumer; while the sudden diminution of a protecting duty has produced an advance of prices—if not immediately, at least after the domestic manufacture has been so checked as materially to affect the competition created by it, and subject the market to the control of foreigners.

There seems to me to be a radical and fatal error in the reasoning of the opponents of the tariff on this subject. Directing their attention, exclusively, to the transition from a high to a low duty, they ask—cannot the merchant who sells goods to-day on which he has paid a duty of 50 per cent., afford to sell 50 per cent. cheaper to-morrow, the same kind of goods, on which he shall have paid no duty? Certainly he might; but whether he would or not, depends upon the grand regulator of prices—the relation between the demand and supply. But whatever may be the momentary effect of this abandonment of a protecting duty, we must, in legislating upon the subject, look at its ultimate permanent effect. That that effect would not be a reduction of price equal to the reduction of duty, would seem necessarily to result from the fact, that the advance of price, on the laying of a protecting duty, has in no case been permanently equal to the augmentation of duty. The truth is, and it rests on undeniable facts, that such a diminution of protecting duties as has the effect of diminishing the amount of any particular domestic manufacture, though the increased importation which produces that effect may temporarily reduce prices, will finally result in such an increase of the price of the substituted foreign manufacture in the foreign market, as to keep it undiminished to the consumer here. So that the precious privilege of employing foreign labor to supply our wants, will constitute the whole benefit of an abandonment of that protection which has hitherto cherished our own.

But, say our Southern friends, your system of protection diminishes the importation of British goods; and by as much as that importation is diminished, by so much is diminished either our export of cotton, or the prices of it. Let us, therefore, have free trade. Now, sir, to test

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

the force of the objection thus raised by the cotton-planting States, I propose to give them free trade for a while, and see how it will operate.

The whole export of cotton from the United States was, in 1830, about 300,000,000 pounds. The amount consumed in the United States was about 75,000,000. Total 375,000,000. To meet the wishes of the South, suppose we break up our establishments, and transfer the whole of our present manufacture to Great Britain. The British manufacturers would then want an additional supply of cotton, to form fabrics of that article, equal in amount to those previously manufactured in the United States; that is, just the 75,000,000 pounds, and no more. So that success in this long contest for free trade would simply transfer to Great Britain, to give employment to her industry and capital, the 75,000,000 which had been previously consumed in the United States, for the benefit of our own.

As free trade would thus add nothing to the present amount of the sales of Southern cotton, so neither would it enhance its price. The price of cotton, as of every thing else, I need not say, is regulated by the relation which may exist between the demand and supply—a disproportionate demand raising the price, and a disproportionate supply reducing it. Now, sir, would the transfer which I have supposed, increase the demand for raw cotton? Would the world, in consequence of it, want any more cotton fabrics than before? Certainly not. And, on the other hand, would the supply of the raw material be thereby diminished? Would the cotton planters of India or Brazil, for example, diminish their culture of that article, for the purpose of enabling our Southern cotton planters to illustrate the advantages of free trade, by having an increased demand for their production, in the market of Great Britain, and of the world, so as to be enabled either to sell an increased quantity, or command an increased price? Certainly not.

The South complains that the price of cotton has greatly diminished under the operation of the protecting system. It has, indeed, diminished: but I deny that the diminution has been produced by that system. It has resulted from an increased production of cotton every where; a production that has outrun the consumption of the world. It has greatly increased in Egypt, Brazil, and the East and West Indies; and has been extended from the Atlantic to the Southwestern States. Thus, in the United States, the cotton crop has increased from about ninety-two millions of pounds in 1816, to about three hundred and seventy-five millions in 1830. And this has been accompanied by a probable corresponding increase of production in other cotton-growing countries. Can South Carolina wonder that the price of her staple has sunk under the pressure of such an accumulated production as this?

That the fluctuations in the price of cotton have not been produced by the protecting system, is rendered yet more apparent, by a glance at the quantity compared with the value of that staple exported from the United States in various years. Thus, 92,000,000 lbs. exported from the United States in 1818, were worth $31,000,000, while 88,000,000 lbs. exported in the following year were worth but $21,000,000. So, in 1822, 144,000,000 lbs. were worth $24,000,000, while 173,000,000 lbs. in 1823, were worth only $20,000,000. So, also, in 1825, the value of 176,000,000 lbs. was $36,000,000; whereas, in the next year, 204,000,000 lbs. were worth but $25,000,000. Now, whence these fluctuations of price? No material variations of the tariff occurred during either of these biennial periods. The great and sudden fluctuations could not, therefore, have resulted from tariff legislation. They must be traced to other causes.

I have said, sir, that the effect of free trade upon our cotton planters would be to enable them to transfer to Great Britain the amount of their staple, previously wrought in the cotton mills of the United States. This, however, is not altogether true. Break up our cotton manufacturing establishments, and there would be a diminution of our consumption of cotton fabrics, resulting from the diminished ability of our people to pay for them, and accompanied by a substitution of fabrics wrought from other domestic materials. It is obvious, therefore, that there must be a corresponding diminution of demand for the raw material, and that its present consumption in the United States would, to that extent, fail of being transferred to the cotton mills of Great Britain.

The consumption of cotton fabrics in the United States has been almost immeasurably increased since the introduction of their manufacture, because of the increased facilities of purchasing them with the products of our labor and our soil. Drive our people to the British manufacturers for the purchase of these as well as other fabrics, and what have they to pay with? What of the products of three-fourths of our country will Great Britain take in exchange for them? The truth is, that the consumption, as well as the price, of the great Southern staple is actually increased rather than diminished by a protecting tariff. In fact, sir, the general prosperity of the country, which results from the protecting system, is emphatically the prosperity of the South. The augmented value which that system gives to the industry of the East, the Middle, and the West, not only furnishes an increasing demand for Southern staples, but also increases the demand of the country for those foreign productions which may be purchased with them. Thus, the consumption of cotton in the United States has increased from 11,000,000 lbs. in 1816, to about 80,000,000 at the present time; and there has been, also, a constantly increasing demand at the North for the flour, the corn, the rice, and the tobacco of the South; while the exportation of cotton has rapidly increased, and the aggregate importations been greatly augmented.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another benefit connected with the protecting system, which I cannot wholly omit to notice. It is its tendency to strengthen that bond of our Union, which is formed in the free intercourse produced by reciprocal wants and mutual dependence; to make us, in interest and in feeling, one people. Vain, sir, will be all efforts to sustain this Union, while those who have, under Providence, the control of its destinies, disregard this great principle. Let us, then, aid its full development, by sustaining that system which enlarges the sphere of the national industry, multiplies the objects, and improves the channels of a free commercial intercourse, and thus deepens the sympathies, identifies the interests, and cements the union of this great people.

And now, Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to press upon those who complain so loudly of the oppressions of this system, the inquiry—how its abandonment, so sternly demanded, will furnish the desired relief? The people, sir, whom I represent, want light on this subject. They now believe, and I can assure gentlemen that silence will not shake that belief, that South Carolina must look to other causes than the tariff, for the source of the evils of which she complains. They believe that the depression in the price of her great staple is to be traced to causes entirely disconnected with the protecting policy. And they believe, what it is to be feared South Carolina has yet to learn, that the wealth and prosperity of a community mainly depend upon the proper cultivation of its soil; the habits of its people; their domestic economy; and, above all, upon the amount of their productive labor. And, sir, their highly cultivated fields, their comfortable dwellings, their frugal habits, and their universal untiring industry, exhibit a practical illustration of the correctness of their belief. They show their faith by their works. And can a people, who have long presented a perfect contrast to all this, wonder that they, at length, find themselves in a state of decay, or even of impoverishment? To speak only of the state of industry at the South—what is it? It has been asserted here that one-half of the able population perform no labor, but are entirely dependent upon the labor of others. To put the case, however, beyond the reach of all possible doubt, I will suppose the proportion to be one-third only. Now, to illustrate the effect of this, let me suppose that one-third of the able, and, of course, the laboring portion of the population of Vermont were transported to a barren rock, in the midst of the ocean; and that the remaining two-thirds were compelled to provide for them the necessaries, and even the luxuries of life, with the personal service necessary to ensure to them a complete exemption from the labor of taking care of themselves. Need I ask what would be the condition of Vermont under the operation of such an exhausting process? And yet this is very far from presenting a perfect illustration of the evils of slavery; for there would still be left the indomitable energies of a free people to struggle forward beneath the burden. No comparison can fully illustrate the influence of slavery upon the condition of a community.

The Tariff Bill.

But, sir, I will pursue this subject no further. I know how exceedingly irritating it is in certain quarters, and have, therefore, alluded to it with great reluctance. But its consideration is forced upon us, by the glowing descriptions which are constantly given of Southern impoverishment and distress, produced, as we are told, in no measured terms, by the "oppressions" and "robberies" of the "tyrannical" and "abominable system of protection. To shut our eyes, under such circumstances, to one of the most prominent and efficient causes of Southern depression, is as impossible for one portion of the country as it is suicidal in the other.

And what is the remedy which South Carolina proposes for the evils under which she labors? Nothing less, sir, than the entire prostration of the protecting system; the sacrifice of millions in accomplishing the ruinous result; and the reduction of the labor of freemen to a level with that of slaves. And, after all, who can say that this will be an effectual remedy? Will it restore the worn out lands of Carolina? Will it add fifty per cent. to the amount of her productive labor? Will it blast and consume the cotton crops of Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana? or convert into deserts the fruitful cotton fields of Brazil, Egypt, and the Indies? Or will it take off the mighty incubus which sits, with sable visage and haggard form, upon the southern portion of our country? If it will not do all this, then I hazard nothing in saying that it will not reach the fountain of South Carolina's sufferings, and bring her the desired relief.

Permit me, now, Mr. Chairman, to glance at the extent and suddenness of the change which this bill proposes; the grounds on which it is urged by the committee who reported it; the strength of the argument drawn from the present position of South Carolina; the consequences of yielding to it; and the certainty that yielding to it, by the passage of this bill, will not settle this vexed question.

In regard to the first subject of inquiry, I will not trouble the committee with a minute examination of the details of the bill, which have been very fully gone into by gentlemen who have preceded me. The deep interest of my constituents in the production of wool must, however, be my apology for devoting a few moments to this branch of the subject.

And, in the first place, it should be remembered that the act of the 14th of July last, to take effect on the 4th of March next, abolishes the duty on wool costing eight cents, and under, and reduces from more than fifty to five per cent. the duty on woollens costing not more than thirty-five cents, and from 38½ to 5 per cent. on coarse blankets. In addition to these reductions, the present bill provides for a reduction on wool costing over eight cents, of about one-half the present duty, immediately; in one year two-thirds, and in two years four-fifths; and on woollens, costing over thirty-five cents, one-fourth immediately; in one year one-half, and in two years two-thirds, of the existing duty.

Now, sir, I do not undertake to determine the precise effect upon the price of wool, of any given reduction of duties upon it, or upon its manufactures. But let us look at its probable operation.

Prices being regulated by the relation between demand and supply, it is obvious that a reduction in the demand for wool, the supply remaining the same, or an increase of its supply, the demand remaining the same, will alike reduce its value.

Now, although the reduction of one-fourth the present duty on woollens might not produce an immediate suspension of the operations of our woollens establishments, it must, necessarily, be followed by a material reduction in the prices of wool, of labor, of provisions, &c. to enable them to continue their operations. That the commencement of the second year, however, when the duty will be brought down to one-half its present amount, would find them overwhelmed with foreign importations, can admit of no doubt. It would be the signal for an attack of the main body of British manufacturers, with their redundant capital and pauper labor, before which our infant establishments, with their dependent interests, must inevitably be crushed.

But the heaviest blow which this bill inflicts on the wool-growing interest, is the immediate reduction of the duty on wool; for, even if there were no reduction of duty on woollens, and the demand for wool should be undiminished, the supply would be increased even to a glut of the market, by the importations which must follow the reduction of duty. No one can doubt this, who will take the trouble to recollect that, even under the present duty, the importations of wool, in the year ending on the 30th of September, 1831, amounted to 5,622,960 lbs. If such an importation was made under a duty of not less than 75 per cent. need I ask what would follow an immediate abolition of one-half of that duty?

Now, sir, let me illustrate the probable effects of this reduction upon the wool-growing interest, by a reference to the district which I have the honor to represent.

Of the twenty millions of sheep in the United States, Vermont is estimated to possess one million five hundred thousand. Their value, estimated at two dollars per head, is $3,000,000

The land required for their subsistence, estimating one acre for three sheep, would be 500,000 acres, which, at 10 dollars, would amount to 5,000,000

The annual product of wool, estimated at 2½ lbs. per head, is 3,750,000 lbs., which at 40 cents, amounts to 1,500,000

To complete the account, there should be added the labor employed in rearing the flocks, and washing and clipping the wool, and transporting it to market, and the value of the land necessary to subsist the labor thus employed.

Now, sir, contemplate, for a moment, the effects of an immediate reduction of even one-third in the present price of wool. That reduction would, in my district alone, amount to half a million of dollars on the crop of the approaching season. To a farmer owning one thousand sheep, it would be three hundred and thirty-three dollars; while there would be a corresponding reduction in the value of his flock and his farm which would amount to an additional sum of one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six dollars. And let it be remembered that this farmer has been gradually enlarging his stock of sheep, perhaps suddenly by purchase, upon the assurance that there would be something like stability in our legislation.

JAN. 29, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

Perhaps he has added to his farm upon the same assurance, and, in the course of this operation, has become indebted, with the expectation of an ability to pay from the produce of his flock—making his purchases of sheep and land at prices regulated by the standard of existing values. Now what will be his condition when he finds that the magic of our legislation has, in effect, stripped him of one-third of his coming crop of wool, and reduced, in the same proportion, the value of his flock and his farm? His debts must be paid to the last farthing. Our legislation cannot reach them.

The case I have supposed, while it may be literally the case of thousands, furnishes an illustration of the general effect of the contemplated change in the protecting system upon the relation of debtor and creditor throughout the community. The mass of existing debt must be discharged; and what will become of the debtors under the operation of such a material and sudden reduction of the means of payment?

So much has been said, here and elsewhere, of the aristocratic manufacturing monopolies, that men have insensibly come to look at their prostration with a strange, unaccountable indifference, not reflecting that their operations have become so intertwined with the whole business of the community as materially to affect the value of land, of labor, and of all the productions of both. Sir, it is upon these interests, the interests of the farmers, the mechanics, and laborers, that you are about to let in the broad and desolating flood.

But it is said that excessive importations will not follow a reduction of the tariff; that combinations of foreign capitalists cannot be formed to flood our markets at a sacrifice, for the purpose of prostrating our manufactures. There is, sir, no necessity for supposing the existence of combinations to produce such a result. It will as necessarily follow a withdrawal of protection as would the inundation of Holland, the prostration of her dikes. The redundant capital and labor of Great Britain are perpetually struggling to find a market for their productions, the sale of a portion of which, even at cost, is an important object; because it prevents that surplus in the home market which reduces the value of the whole stock. Shall we not learn wisdom from experience? What followed the diminished protection produced by the peace of 1815? Let the overwhelming influx of foreign goods, and the sacrifices, the bankruptcies, and the wide-spread desolations of the few following years, answer. The imports of 1815 amounted to one hundred and thirty-three millions of dollars; the exports were but little over fifty millions of dollars. Further evidence of the excessive importations may be found in the fact that the receipts from customs, in the years 1816-'17, were about sixty-two millions of dollars.

Similar effects followed the peace of Europe, in 1814, in the excessive exports of British manufactures to the continent. A description of them may be found in a speech of Lord Brougham in the British Parliament, from which I beg permission to read a short extract.

"After the cramped state in which the enemy's measures and our own retaliation (as we termed it) had kept our trade for some years, when the events of the spring, 1814, suddenly opened the continent, a rage for exporting goods of every kind burst forth, only to be equalled (though not in extent) by some of the commercial delusions connected with South American speculations. Every thing that could be shipped was sent off; all the capital that could be laid hold of was embarked: the frenzy—I can call it nothing else, after the experience of 1806 and 1810—descending to persons in the remotest circumstances, and the farthest removed, by their pursuits, from commercial cares."

After describing the reaction, and general distress which followed, Mr. Brougham adds:

"The peace with America has produced somewhat of a similar effect; though I am very far from placing the vast exports which it occasioned upon the same footing with those to the European market the year before; both because, ultimately, the Americans will pay, which the exhausted state of the continent renders very unlikely, and because it was well worth while to incur a loss upon the first exportations, in order, by the glut, to stifle in the cradle those rising manufactures in the United States which the war had forced into existence, contrary to the natural course of things."

Mr. Chairman, what took place on the continent of Europe in 1814, and in this country in 1815, will, as surely as like causes produce like effects, befall us in 1834 if this bill becomes a law. It will result not only from the natural operations of trade, but from the systematic policy of our great rival, which is ever intent on "stifling" the manufactures of the United States, whose existence and prosperity it regards as "contrary to the natural course of things." Yes, sir, in the eye of a British statesman, and, may I not add, in the eyes of some of our own, the "natural course of things" is, that British industry shall supply our wants, rather than that we should cherish our own industry to supply them ourselves. Shall we, sir, by our legislation, aid that policy which thus augments the industry, the wealth, the population, and the power of the "fast anchored isle"? or shall we cherish and build up the system which puts in motion the capital, and enterprise, and ingenuity, and industry of our own country, and thus increases its wealth, advances its population, and renders solid and permanent the foundations of its prosperity and its power?

There is, Mr. Chairman, one general feature of this bill, to which I beg permission to devote a few moments' attention. The claim of the nullifiers, as embodied in the South Carolina address to the people of the United States, is, that duties shall be made equal on all articles, as well those which need as those which do not need protection. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the raising of a revenue not exceeding fifteen million dollars, upon such an apportionment of duties, will involve a surrender of the protecting system. And does not the bill on your table, in its obvious disregard of the discrimination which is vital to that system, evidently point to such a result? Permit me to examine it, for a moment, in connexion with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Committee of Ways and Means, to whose joint labors it obviously owes its existence.

The Secretary says, in the first place, that "it is not to be concealed, that a permanent system of high protecting duties directly tends to build up favored classes, ultimately prejudicial to the State." "Favored classes!" Let me stop to look at this a moment. Who constitute the favored classes, the building up of which fills the mind of the Secretary with such alarm for the safety of the State? Sir, they are, in truth, the farmers, the mechanics, and the laborers—the men by whom, and for whom, this Government was made. The system of protection builds them up, and, therefore, the State is in danger!

The Secretary proceeds: "Little doubt is entertained that, in a tariff framed on proper principles, the reduction of six millions, now recommended, may, for the most part, be made upon those commonly denominated protected articles, without prejudice to the reasonable claims of existing establishments." Now, let us see what are regarded as "the reasonable claims of existing establishments." The bill, which, the House has been told, embraces the Secretary's project of a tariff "framed on proper principles," provides for the following, among other reductions of duties, within two years, viz. wool, from more than 75 per cent. to 15; woollens, from 55 per cent. to 20; woollen twist and yarn, from 25 to 15; cottons from 48½ to 20; and cotton yarn and thread from 37½ to 10.

The Tariff Bill.

Now, sir, if, in reference to the great and vital interests of wool, woollens, and cottons, these reductions constitute the measure of their "reasonable claims" to protection, I should like to know by what rule the reasonable claims of certain other interests are so estimated as to keep permanent duties of 28 per cent. on hammered iron; 35 on pig iron; 76 on rolled; 93 on sheet and hoop iron; 62 on nails; 72 on spikes; 48 on anchors; and 37 on castings; protected, as most of these articles are, to no inconsiderable extent, by the heavy freight on their importation. And why, I may add, is a duty retained upon sugar, of 46 per cent., tobacco 33, and coal 47? As the Secretary's report throws no light on these inquiries, let us see if we can find any in the report which accompanies this bill.

The committee say that they have "arranged the duties at rates of from 10 to 20 per cent.," with certain exceptions, founded upon the necessary protection of articles "essential to independence in time of war." On looking over the bill, I find these exceptions to embrace fifty-two articles, which range from 23 to 111 per cent.; among the most prominent of which are those I have just enumerated. Now I should be glad to be informed how it is that tobacco, sugar, paper-hangings, coal, boots, nails, mill-cranks, and castings, to mention no other articles, are necessary to independence in time of war, while cotton and woollen cloths are unnecessary. Is not clothing as necessary to an army as sugar and tobacco? or even as lead and iron? But it seems to me to be taking a very limited view of the subject, even to confine the essentials of independence to munitions of war, and the clothing of an army. Must not the country be clothed as well as the army? But the national independence, of which the committee speak, necessarily takes a still broader range, comprehending the ability of the country to pay the taxes, and sustain the general shock of war. And, in the present state of the world, nothing can lay a solid foundation for this independence but the protecting system. May I not even ask Carolina, whether it is not necessary to her independence in time of war? Where, in case of a war with Great Britain, for example, is she sure of finding a market for her cotton? The enemy might, indeed, for her own special benefit, furnish such market. But she might not furnish it. And where then would be the cotton of Carolina? She would have no home market, for she would, if she could, effectually destroy it by breaking down all the manufactures of her staple production.

The committee say, further, that, for the purpose of benefiting "some branches of industry," some of the raw materials are admitted at a low duty. Benefiting some branches of industry! What regard for the industry of the country is manifested, by reducing the duty on wool to 15 per cent.? True, it may save the woollen manufactures from immediate destruction. But where, in the mean time, are the wool growers? Are not the twenty millions of sheep, and their annual product of fifty millions of pounds of wool, regarded as of sufficient importance to be set down in connexion with "some branch of industry?"

And here, sir, let me ask why the committee have imposed a tax of 17 or 18 per cent. on tea, which we have the authority of the President, in his annual message of 1829, for saying is "an article of necessity to all classes," and which needs no protection, while they have brought down to a duty of 15 per cent. wool, which does not need it. Why, I ask, in the name of the wool growers every where, and especially in my own State, why was this tea duty transferred to wool, where it might have the effect of saving millions of sheep from the knife, and thousands of farmers from ruin? The whole amount of that duty, added to wool and woollens, would still leave them with less protection than this bill provides for iron, and sugar, and many other articles. And why this disinction? Can those who are connected with those interests be deceived by a discrimination in their favor, at the expense of some of the most important interests embraced in the protecting system? If the citadel is carried, do they expect that their positions will be secure from assault? It must be a very delusive idea of security, which shall induce the iron interest, for example, to sit quietly by, and see the Government going back sixteen years in one, in the protection of woollens, and more than sixteen years in thirty days, in that of cottons, while iron is kept up to about double the duty of 1816, under the pretence that it is essential to our independence in time of war. The policy which now strikes a fatal blow at the leading interests to which I have adverted, will spare no interest when it can be successfully assailed. The bill before us brings down wool, woollens, and cottons, to a standard of mere revenue, utterly regardless of the great principle of discrimination, which is vital to the protecting system. "Duties for revenue and not for protection," is inscribed in broad characters upon its front. The work of ruin is thus commenced; and if the principles of this bill are to be carried out, there is not a protected interest in the country which will not be finally doomed to destruction. Can the friends of the protecting system on this floor shut their eyes to the danger which thus threatens it?

But, sir, if we are not awake to the danger, the people will be roused, when they feel the effects of our legislation. I do not say they will rebel. No, sir. But let me tell you what they will do. They will go to the ballot boxes, and there tell us, in language not to be misunderstood, that their interests shall be protected. We may break down the barriers, and let in the flood. Millions may be sacrificed, and thousands ruined. But the people cannot, I trust, be permanently blinded to their true interests; and if their power in this Government is to be any thing more than a name, those interests shall yet receive an ample and permanent protection.

And now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to ask, and to press the inquiry, what reasons exist for the great and sudden change of policy which this bill contemplates? Surely, sir, we cannot take this step without reasons the most urgent. Do they exist? What are they? Has the protecting system we have so long cherished, brought us so near the verge of national ruin, that we should thus precipitate its destruction? Where are the evidences of general distress? Rather may I not ask, where are not the evidences of general prosperity—a prosperity unexampled in the history of this, or any other country? Sir, this change should not be made without reasons, so strong, and so deeply fastened in the convictions of the people, as to find utterance here, through their primary assemblies. And have they thus spoken to us? Have even their representatives risen up in their places here, and undertaken to speak for them? Whose voice has been heard in an attempt to convince us that the protecting policy ought to be abandoned? Sir, it would seem that we are no longer to be reasoned with on this subject. But one of the States of this Union, while her representatives on this floor are silent, as if by instruction, places herself upon her "reserved rights," and, instead of saying to us—you ought not to execute your protecting laws, says, in a tone of proud and insulting defiance—you shall not!! The question, then, and the only question for us to decide, is—shall we yield to this argument?

It has been said, sir, that the Committee of Ways and Means, in reporting this bill, "took counsel of their fears." In repelling this charge, I was glad to hear the honorable chairman of that committee do justice to the courage which dares to do right, at the hazard of incurring the imputation of cowardice. Sir, I am far from believing that the committee yielded to any thing allied to personal fear. There is a just fear, a fear of inflicting injury on the country; and there is, too, a just pride, which, I think, the honorable chairman of the committee should have substituted for the "false pride" which he imputed to those who refuse to act under the influence of menace. The "fear" of the committee, and the "pride" of others, I am willing to believe, amount to the same thing, and resolve themselves at last into the question—what is, on the whole, best for the country now, and in all time? This is the question for us to determine. Neither personal pride, nor party pride, nor party purposes, should have any thing to do with it. This is the time to try our principles, to throw off the shackles of party, to cease from man worship, to look deliberately over the broad face of our country, with a just regard to the interests of the whole and of every part, and with a deliberate view of all the consequences, near and remote, of our legislation.

The Tariff Bill.

I must, Mr. Chairman, be permitted to express my regret that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] has, on this occasion, thought proper to invoke the spirit of party. After a significant appeal to the friends of "a certain distinguished individual" in the State of New York, to yield their support to this bill, he told them that "the question must be settled now, lest the power of settling it be placed in other hands." Sir, I say, unhesitatingly, I care not who settles this question, provided it be settled right. And if I am asked who I believe will be most likely thus to settle it, I answer, the people. I protest against committing this patient to the charge of political doctors. Let it have the fostering care of its natural parents, and it will be reared up to maturity in sound and healthy proportions. Give it up to the doctors, and if it survives their experiments, it will do it only to linger out a miserable, rickety existence. For one, I am opposed to political tariffs. If the great interests involved in the protecting system are to be made the mere sport of party, then shall I despair of its permanency. But, sir, I believe that, if we will permit the people to have a voice in this matter, they will settle it right. In their decision I will cheerfully acquiesce. They have reared up the protective system; and whenever they determine to give it up, and go back to their former state of dependence, then, and not till then, will I consent to its abandonment.

But, Mr. Chairman, suppose we do not pass this bill—what then? Why, I am told we shall have a civil war, and a dissolution of the Union. Sir, I do not anticipate either of these consequences. By this I would not be understood to say that there may not be resistance to our laws, or that a single State may not secede. But I mean, that there will be no general war, nor any breaking up of this Union. Suppose a State should try the experiment of secession. The entire Union is not thereby dissolved. The bond which holds the other twenty-three States together, would not be severed—nor even weakened, except so far as the example of a single State might encourage others to rebellion.

I know the idea has been industriously propagated, that we are about to make war upon South Carolina. And it is thus that the war spirit in that State has been blown into a flame. But, sir, who thinks of making war upon South Carolina? Certainly not the United States. We have passed certain revenue laws, which extend to South Carolina, in common with all the other States of the Union. Instead of making war upon that State, we shall calmly set about devising the means of collecting the revenue. And in doing this, we shall go forward, with the decision, and moderation, and firmness of conscious strength and justice; so providing for the enforcement of our laws, as to collect the revenue beyond the reach of any force, but such as shall assume an attitude of direct and active hostility. Will South Carolina assume such an attitude? Will she attack us in our defences? Will she attempt to drive us from our fortifications, or grapple with our naval power? Let her try it! Sir, let her try it!

But she has said she will secede, declare herself independent, and form a new Government. And suppose she does. Shall we then make war upon her? I answer, unhesitatingly, No. But what shall we do? Why, sir, while South Carolina is forming a Government, we shall be collecting our revenue. But will South Carolina actually rush upon the alternative of throwing off her allegiance, and putting forth a declaration of independence? Independence! Has she weighed the import of that word? Sir, it is one thing to make the threat, but a very different thing to execute it; one thing to dream of leaping from the precipice, but quite another to plunge, with open eyes, into the fathomless abyss.

But, if she shall be mad enough to do it, what then? Why, the people of South Carolina will then begin to understand what independence means. They will then come to feel its benefits. The forbidden fruit, now fair to look upon, will have been tasted; and the eyes of that people will be opened; I need not finish the comparison. South Carolina has been deceived—deluded: and, perhaps, there is no other way to dispel that delusion than to let her grasp the object of her pursuit. Sir, the delusion must be, will be dispelled. The bare majority which now rules the State with a rod of iron, cannot retain its power. Her Government will be placed in other hands; and South Carolina will come back to the fold again. But it is hardly necessary for me to say that, to secure this result, your measures, and their execution, must be marked with a mild, prudent, steady, unflinching firmness. Sir, decide without wavering. Go steadily and fearlessly forward, and leave the event, where you should leave every thing, in the hands of Him "whose path is the great waters, and whose footsteps are not known."

But I am asked, do you support this administration? How, says the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE,] will these new allies look at each other when they suddenly find themselves in fraternal embrace?

Mr. Chairman, I have opposed the administration of Andrew Jackson; and the world knows the ground of that opposition. I now support it in the doctrines it avows, and the measures it recommends, with regard to South Carolina; and the world shall know the grounds of that support. My opposition and my support are both founded on the same general principles. The leading measures which I have opposed, I believed, and still believe, were, and are insidiously undermining the constitution. But against the very pillars of that constitution has South Carolina blindly placed her hands, and threatened its utter prostration. And when the Chief Magistrate asks my feeble aid to save the constitution, thus assailed, he shall have it. I am not at liberty to refuse it. I will not refuse it. I go, sir, for the constitution. The gentleman from Georgia taunts us with "giving in our adhesion," as though there could be no support given to a measure of the administration, without going over to it, body and soul. I beg permission to assure the gentleman that I can give in no such adhesion to any administration. The "right or wrong" maxim I can apply to nothing but my country.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that the whole South will be united with Carolina in the resistance which she threatens. Sir, I do not believe it. There is too much sound sense and patriotic feeling to permit it. If, indeed, the people of the South could become converts to the opinions of the gentleman from Georgia, they might resist. If they could see the analogy which he sees, between the measures of which Carolina complains, and the grinding oppressions which produced our declaration of independence, they might resist, even to blood. But, sir, I must be permitted to think better of their intelligence. Who, among them, would not be utterly confounded, in an attempt soberly to draw up a declaration of

The Tariff Bill.

[JAN. 29, 1833.]

Southern independence, with a recital, in substance, of the causes set forth in the preamble to the declaration of 1776?

But let us consider, a little more particularly, the probabilities of a Southern Union to resist the laws and overturn the Government.

I am not aware that any one has ever undertaken to place the right of secession, or nullification, upon slighter ground than that of a "deliberate, palpable, and dangerous violation of the constitution;" not an infraction which is to be proved by hair-splitting, but one that is deliberate, palpable, and dangerous. Now, sir, what is the pretended violation of the constitution in the present case? The exercise of a power to regulate commerce, so as to give encouragement and protection to domestic industry; a power which, as I have before observed, was distinctly claimed and exercised by the first Congress, and which has received the explicit sanction of every President, and of almost every Congress, from that time to this; a power, whose existence has not, in fact, been so much as questioned until within the last ten years. Such is the power whose exercise is now to be treated as a violation of the constitution, so palpable and dangerous as to justify nullification and secession; in fact, revolution. What a severe reproach is this upon the illustrious men who passed from the convention, that formed the constitution, into the first Congress; upon all our chief magistrates, and upon the whole country, including its most distinguished statesmen, of every political faith. It is against this overwhelming current of authority that South Carolina stands up, buckles on her armor, and calls upon the whole South to sustain her! Will she, can she, be sustained?

But there will, we are told, be a strong sympathy in the cause of South Carolina, oppressed South Carolina. How is that sympathy to be excited? By what means is the flame, which has been kindled in that State, to be spread throughout the Southern section of the Union? Is it expected that the theory that exports pay the duties, is to bewilder the whole South, as it has a majority of the people in Carolina? Sir, this delusion has had its day, and met with the fate of thousands which have gone before it. It has, indeed, done its work in South Carolina; but that it is capable of so perverting the judgment, and exciting the passions of the great mass of the Southern population, as to bring them up to the point of revolution, I am not prepared to believe.

If, sir, we will dismiss unmanly apprehension, and look at this subject coolly, I think we shall be slow in coming to the conclusion to which some alarmists would carry us. By what process, let me ask, are the Southern States to arrive at the fatal point of dissolving this Union? By none, certainly, which will not include the agency of State conventions. Now, let me suppose a convention to be called, for example, in Virginia. I am not at liberty to suppose that it will come to the resolution of seceding, without ample discussion and patient deliberation. And how may we suppose the friends of Union would meet the proposition to unite with South Carolina in resisting the laws and dissolving the Union? Would they not press, with irresistible force, the fact, that South Carolina had unnecessarily precipitated this crisis; that she had assumed an attitude of armed resistance at the moment of relief from a considerable portion of her alleged burdens? Sir, do you believe that Virginia is going to join in rebellion at the moment of experiencing the benefits of the law of last July, which abolishes the minimum valuation of woollens, of which she has complained, and admits nearly the entire consumption of her negro population almost free of duty? Did the law which, besides embracing these provisions, made large reductions* on nearly fifty protected articles, which enter more or less into the consumption of the South, evince no disposition to listen to its complaints?

It is true that law did not surrender the principle of protection. But is Virginia prepared to demand that surrender at the point of the bayonet? Impossible! She cannot become so infatuated as to forget the origin and history of the protective policy. She cannot, if she would, obliterate from the records of that history the votes and opinions of her most distinguished statesmen. I will not repeat the abundant evidence which has been brought forward on this point. But I will ask the indulgence of the committee while I advert to one piece of testimony, which has not, I believe, been alluded to in this discussion. On the 7th of June, 1809, the following resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the United States:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare and report to this House, at their next session, a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress, for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States; together with a statement of the several manufacturing establishments which have been commenced; the progress which has been made in them, and the success with which they have been attended; and such other information as, in the opinion of the Secretary, may be material in exhibiting a general view of the manufactures of the United States."

Upon this resolution for "protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States," the votes of the four Southern Atlantic States, in this body, stood as follows: Virginia, yeas 12, nays 9; North Carolina, yeas 8, nays 3; South Carolina, yeas 6, nays 1; Georgia, yeas 1, nays 3. Total, yeas 27, nays 16.

This resolution, I need hardly say, is in perfect accordance with the general current of public opinion at the South during the first thirty years of this Government; with the recommendation of "protecting duties and prohibitions," by Mr. Jefferson; and the subsequent recommendation of manufactures by Mr. Madison, to "the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress;" and let me add, has been, since, most fully and unequivocally sustained by a distinguished son of South Carolina, who is, at this moment, pressing opposition to the protecting system, to the fearful alternative of its total abandonment, or a dissolution of the Union. Permit me, sir, to trouble the committee with a few extracts from his recorded opinions on this subject. In his speech on the tariff bill of 1816, Mr. Calhoun said:

"What is more necessary to the defence of a country than its currency and finance? Circumstanced as our country is, can these stand the shock of war? Behold the effect of the late war on them. When our manufactures are grown to a certain perfection, as they soon will, under the fostering care of Government, we will no longer experience these evils. The farmer will find a ready market for his surplus produce; and, what is almost of equal consequence, a certain and cheap supply of all his wants."

"To this distressing state of things there are two remedies, and only two; one in our power, immediately, the other requiring much time and exertion, but both constituting, in his opinion, the essential policy of this country; he meant the navy and domestic manufactures. By the former, we could open the way to our markets; by the latter, we bring them from beyond the ocean, and naturalize them in our own soil."

"Manufactures produce an interest strictly American, as much so as agriculture. In this it had the decided advantage of commerce and navigation; and the country will, from it, derive much advantage. It is calculated to bind together more closely our widely spread republic.

*Averaging about 50 per cent.

JAN. 29, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

It will greatly increase our mutual dependence and intercourse, and will, as a necessary consequence, excite an increased attention to internal improvement, a subject every way so intimately connected with the ultimate attainment of national strength, and the perfection of our political institutions. He regarded the fact that it would make the parts adhere more closely, and that it would form a new and most powerful cement, as far outweighing any political objections that might be urged against the system."

"In regard to the question how far manufactures ought to be fostered, Mr. C. said that it was the duty of this country, as a means of defence, to encourage the domestic industry of the country; more especially that part of it which provides the necessary materials for clothing and defence. * * * The question relating to manufactures must not depend on the abstract principle that industry, left to pursue its own course, will find, in its own interest, all the encouragement that is necessary."

I might multiply extracts of the same import, but I forbear. Suffer me, however, to advert for a moment to the opinions of another distinguished statesman of South Carolina, now on this floor,* in regard to the right of nullification. They are embraced in a series of numbers published in 1821, and accompanied by the explicit recommendation of another distinguished individual, who is now President of the nullifying convention.† I will detain the committee with but two or three extracts:

"The General Government is truly the Government of the whole people, as a State Government is of a part of the people. Its constitution, in the language of its preamble, was ordained and established by the people of the United States."

"A man who will contend that our Government is a confederacy of independent States, whose independent sovereignty was never, in any degree, renounced, and that it may be controlled or annulled at the will of the several independent States or sovereignties, can scarcely be regarded as belonging to the present generation. The several independent sovereign States control the General Government! This is anarchy itself."

"The States, as political bodies, have no original inherent rights. That they have such rights, is a false, dangerous, and anti-republican assumption, which lurks at the bottom of all the reasoning in favor of State rights."

"If, after the National Judiciary have solemnly affirmed the constitutionality of a law, it is still to be resisted by the State rulers, the constitution is, literally, at an end; a revolution of the Government is already accomplished; and anarchy waves its horrid sceptre over the broken altars of this happy Union."

Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to return to the supposed Virginia convention, and ask if it be possible that it can breast this current of Southern acts and Southern opinions, and solemnly decide that the laws shall be resisted, and the Union dissolved, upon the assumption that a protecting tariff is palpably unconstitutional. Sir, the thing is impossible. Justice, honor, consistency—all forbid it. Should Virginia do it, the very marble which bears the images of her illustrious dead, would break forth in indignant rebuke of her madness. Such madness, I know, exists in Virginia as well as Carolina. But that it can ever take possession of a majority of her statesmen, or her people, I will not admit to be possible.

But suppose I am mistaken; and that Virginia, disregarding the opinions of those she has been accustomed to reverence, and reckless of her own consistency, should seem ready to take the fatal step. Is there no other obstacle? Are there not peculiar hazards to be encountered in Virginia, as well as in all the South, which may well make the stoutest hearts tremble? Is the power of our arms the only power to be feared?

But, sir, there are other reasons why this Union will not be dissolved. There is, after all, every where, a deep and pervading conviction of its inestimable value. There may be moments of madness, indeed, when this conviction may almost cease to exert its power. The surface of the waters may be, for a while, disturbed by the tempests of passion. But the fountains of the great deep are not so easily broken up. There exists beneath the troubled surface a strong and steady current of patriotic feeling—of attachment to the Union: an attachment strengthened by a recollection of common dangers and sufferings, and a conscious enjoyment of common blessings, too precious to be lightly put at hazard. I do not, for I need not dwell upon the power of this Government to overcome resistance to its laws. That power exists. It can, and must, and will be exerted, in the last resort. Its existence or its capacity need not, however, be vaunted in this argument. But there is a moral power in the sound intelligence and sober judgment of this great community, which is more formidable than an army with banners. It finds no place, indeed, in the battle field, amid the strife of arms, and the fiercer strife of human passions. But it enters the abodes of peace. Its whispers are heard upon the midnight pillow. It penetrates the secret chambers of the soul. It takes hold of the conscience—moulds the judgment—subdues the heart. And may we not hope that Carolina, even Carolina, will yet be redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled, by its resistless power?

A few words, Mr. Chairman, upon the consequences of yielding to the menaces of South Carolina.

In the first place, sir, it is surrendering the protecting system; and this, not altogether by the reductions of duties for which this bill provides, but by the power which the act of submission gives to nullification to control all future legislation on this subject.

But the protecting system is not the only sacrifice. We yield something of more value than the tariff. We, in effect, sanction a principle, whose inevitable tendency is to work an entire change in the character of this Government, to subvert its very foundations, and prostrate it at the feet of unlimited State sovereignty. I will not, on this occasion, and especially at this late hour, detain the committee with an attempt to go over the broad field of discussion which this subject presents. But with your permission, sir, I will suggest, very briefly, one or two views connected with it.

The great principle which lies at the foundation of all our political institutions is, that the people are sovereign—that is, that they possess, individually, the right of self-government. Now, it is contended that the constitution of the United States is the creature of this original, individual sovereignty, and not of State sovereignty. What, sir, is State sovereignty? It consists, essentially, in the right of a community, associated for the purposes of government, to make laws which shall bind every member of that community. This right has no existence, antecedently to the act of association. It is a corporate right, derived through, and entirely dependent upon, the constitution. Without the existence of such constitution, in some form, there can, indeed, be no such thing as a State, or State sovereignty; and no act can be regarded as emanating from that source, which is not done under, or in virtue of such constitution.

Now, no State constitution conferred, either on the Government, or the people of any State, the right of ordaining and establishing the constitution of the United States. The act of doing this was, from its nature, an act of primary sovereignty—the same as that by which the people originally formed the State constitutions, and constituted the State sovereignties. Instead of being

† Gov. Hamilton.

The Tariff Bill.

done under the State constitutions, it was in defiance of them; being a resumption, by the people, of a portion of the powers which, in virtue of those constitutions, had entered into, and made part of the State sovereignties. It was, therefore, in the highest sense, the act of "the people." And in performing it, moreover, the minority were not, as in the case of an act done for State purposes, in pursuance of a State constitution, necessarily bound by the decision of the majority. There was no existing obligation to that effect. In reference to this investment of power, their assent—the basis of free Government—had been neither expressed in the State constitutions, nor implied in their acquiescence in them, because those constitutions contemplated no such investment.

Looking, then, at the origin, only, of the constitution of the United States, it would seem to be, in the highest sense, a popular Government, and not a league of sovereign States. But the correctness of this position, it seems to me, is rendered still more apparent, by a reference to the nature of the powers conferred by that constitution. The "people of the United States," by that instrument, vested legislative power in a Senate and House of Representatives; executive power in a President; and judicial power in a Supreme Court. Now, do not these powers appropriately, and exclusively, belong to any Government, in the popular acceptation of that term? Who ever heard of a league between sovereign States, which made provision for the exercise of such powers in such terms? The constitution is, moreover, in respect to the distribution of these powers, and the terms in which they are described, in precise analogy to the State constitutions; and, to the extent of the objects in regard to which it is provided they shall be exercised, are of precisely the same nature, and bear to each other the same relation.

Without examining further the question whether these powers were conferred by the people in their original sovereign capacity, or by the States, it is sufficient to say, that if the constitution, which provides for their exercise, has any binding force, and the grant of them any intelligible meaning, they must, of necessity, be supreme. The constitution expressly provides that "this constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." To maintain that the laws of the United States are supreme, the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding, and yet that they may be controlled and nullified by "any State," is a palpable absurdity. They are, in fact, supreme, the laws of all the States to the contrary notwithstanding. The concurrent enactments of every Legislature in the Union cannot make them void. The power that made them can alone unmake them.

It is assumed, however, that certain pretended laws are not laws, because not made in pursuance of the constitution; and that, therefore, a State may declare them void and resist them. But who is to give to that assumption the force of authority? In other words, how is it to be rendered legally or constitutionally certain that what is assumed to be true is true? Until that certainty is produced, it remains a mere assumption, to which no more importance is to be attached, when made by a State, than when made by an individual. Whose decision, then, is to give authoritative certainty to the assumption? Obviously, the right to make such decision can exist—except upon the ground of revolution—nowhere but with the power, wherever it be, which gave existence to the constitution. The supremacy of the laws made under it, would be but a mere shadow, if either a single individual or a single State possessed the right to deny their authority, and obstruct their execution. If "the people of the United States," who ordained and established the constitution, had provided no tribunal which could, in the exercise of its appropriate functions, decide upon the validity of the questioned enactment, then must it, of necessity, stand as law, until they decide that it exceeds the powers conferred by them. Such tribunal, however, they have provided. The constitution vests "the judicial power of the United States in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Now is it not an essential attribute of judicial power, that its decisions are final, and conclusive to the full extent of its jurisdiction? Does it not cease to be a judicial power the moment it ceases to possess the right of determining and settling what the law is? Is it credible that, if the framers of the constitution had intended that this ordinary judicial prerogative should be restricted, they would not have perceived the necessity of expressly imposing such restriction? Having failed to do this, by what authority can we define judicial power to mean one thing in the constitution of the United States, and another and a very different thing in the State constitutions?

Such, then, being the nature of the judicial power in question, and the constitution having provided that it "shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority," the question arises—does the same constitution either confer upon, or admit to exist in, every State in the Union, the same power? If it does, then are we involved in the absurdity of having coterminous and authoritative decisions of a precisely opposite character; and which, instead of sustaining, or nullifying the law, would only nullify each other.

The truth is, the judiciary is, in this Government, what it is in State Governments—a constituent branch of the supreme power. There may be a league, but there can be no Government, acting as does this, upon individuals, without it, existing either in a separate department, or united with some other. If, then, a State may nullify the laws, it may nullify the decisions of the judiciary upon them, and, by necessary consequence, the judiciary itself—and, of course, the Government. The supreme power, instead of being in the United States, will be in each and every one of the twenty-four States; while the nullifying ordinance of a single State will become the "supreme law of the land," instead of the constitution of the United States, and the laws enacted by its Legislature, and expounded by its judiciary. If this is not what I have asserted nullification to be, a subversion of the Government, then has revolution no meaning and no power.

Mr. Chairman, will you sanction a doctrine fraught with such consequences? Better, far better, yield to the power of an ordinary insurrection. In that case, indeed, you submit to force; but in this, you add to that submission the sanction of a principle which will, henceforth, form a fixed rallying point for revolutionary efforts. You, in fact, legalize rebellion, under the deceptive and dangerous guise of State authority, and incorporate in your very constitution the absurd and impracticable principle that a minority shall govern.

Such, sir, must be the consequences of the passage of this bill, or of any bill, under circumstances which will compel the judgment of the world to pronounce it an act of submission to South Carolina. If the protecting policy is, indeed, wrong, abandon it. If your laws are so framed as to make its operations unequal, alter them. If your revenue must be reduced, reduce it. And if that reduction must necessarily impair protection, impair it. But yield to no nullifying threats, unless you intend to arm nullification with tenfold energy; unless you are prepared to change the whole structure and action of this Government, to see it divested of its moral power, and become the scorn and derision of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, will our yielding to the menace of South Carolina, and passing this bill, settle this vexed question. We may, indeed, procure by it a temporary peace. South Carolina will, of course, be quiet, if we yield to her demands. But is this such an adjustment of the question of protection as will permanently satisfy the great body of the people of the United States? Gentlemen talk of the passage of this bill as a compromise, which is to settle the question and give quiet to the country. Now, sir, who ever heard of a compromise when one of the parties was mute? And what do we hear from South Carolina? Who has spoken for her on this floor? Who of her delegation here has condescended to tell us that this bill will satisfy her?—that she will not, in fact, make its passage the occasion of urging demands of a still more humiliating character? She nullifies our laws; arrays her whole military strength to resist them; demands the entire and unqualified abandonment of the protecting system; and, in a tone of proud and insulting defiance, says that if we will comply with her demands, “in due time,” and with a “becoming spirit,” she will be satisfied. Beyond this, she is silent! And yet this bill, instead of being called by its right name—a surrender at discretion—is denominated a compromise!

[H. OF R.]

But, sir, if South Carolina should consent to accept of this, and make it a compromise, would it settle the question? Do gentlemen believe that an arrangement forced upon us, extorted by insulting menace, can be permanent? Does not all history admonish us that it will become the prolific parent of future contentions? Sir, nothing but a free expression of the public sentiment, resulting from a deliberate examination by the people of the protecting policy, can really settle this question. It is utterly inconsistent with the genius of our Government that it should. The carrying, by a ruse de guerre, a measure affecting, so vitally as this does, the interests of the great body of the people, though it may serve a momentary purpose, cannot, will not satisfy them, unless they are prepared to abandon their high prerogative of governing, and submit to be governed. No, sir; if we really desire to have this question settled, we shall at once dismiss the consideration of this bill, and submit the whole to the judgment of the people. There will be ample time for them to deliberate, and full opportunity to exert their influence upon the councils of our successors. I am not afraid of their decision. Various causes may, indeed, contribute to make it what I should not altogether desire. But the decision, whatever it may be, will be their decision. They have a right to make it. Their interests are to be affected by it, either for good or for evil; and with it, if we will give them an opportunity of deliberating and acting like freemen, they will be satisfied.

Mr. S., after the expiration of the first hour of his speech, gave way to a motion by Mr. PEARCE that the committee rise: Yeas 40, nays 53.

There being no quorum, the committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

The SPEAKER, having counted the members present, announced that a quorum was then in attendance, when Mr. WAYNE resumed the chair in committee.

Mr. PEARCE now renewed the motion that the committee rise, which was negatived: Yeas 46, nays 68.

Mr. SLADE then resumed his remarks, and, after speaking an hour and a quarter, he gave way to a motion by Mr. HESTER that the committee rise, which was negatived: Yeas 45, nays 72.

Mr. SLADE then continued and concluded his remarks a quarter before 8 o'clock, having occupied the floor nearly five hours.

Mr. I. C. BATES then rose, and said: The question immediately before the committee, the policy of reducing the duties on tea in the manner proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, he did not intend to debate; but the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] to strike the whole duties on tea and coffee from the bill, he regarded as testing the preservation of the protective policy—a question of the utmost consequence, on which, notwithstanding the infirm state of his health, he should feel bound to offer some suggestions.

The question was then stated, on the motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, to strike out ten cents per pound on green teas, five on Souchong and other black, and three on Bohea, and insert five cents on green teas, three on Souchong and other black, and one and a half on Bohea; which was agreed to without a division.

Mr. BATES then moved that the committee rise, which was carried: Yeas 64, nays 60.

The House then, at half past 8 o'clock, adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30.

Mr. ADAMS presented to the House a memorial and sundry resolutions from the Legislature of Massachusetts, strongly expressive of its dissent to the passage of the bill before the House to reduce the tariff.

The memorial was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

NEW YORK CONVENTION MEMORIAL.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the SPEAKER whether he had received a memorial addressed to the House by the tariff convention of New York, with a request to present it.

The SPEAKER replying in the affirmative,

Mr. ADAMS asked the consent of the House that it might be presented.

The House having assented,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial from a permanent committee appointed by the New York Tariff Convention in opposition to the same bill.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the memorial.

This was objected to by Mr. WILDE and Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia; but the CHAIR decided it to be right, and the memorial was read accordingly, at the Clerk's table.

The reading having proceeded some time, the further reading was, on motion of Mr. ADAMS, dispensed with; and the memorial was referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

At a subsequent point of the morning business,

Mr. WILDE moved to reconsider this vote of reference, so far as it included not only the resolutions adopted by the Massachusetts Legislature, but also the report of the convention who had draughted those resolutions. He perceived that, in that report, the Committee of Ways and Means were charged with having reported a bill as one thing, which they knew perfectly to be, in reality, another thing, and a very different thing.

The further discussion of this motion was cut off, for to-day, by the expiration of the hour assigned to resolutions.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, who had the floor, gave way, for a moment, to

Mr. ADAMS, who gave notice that, after his friends had had opportunity to express their views respecting the bill, and to offer their respective amendments, he should move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, then rose, and addressed the committee in opposition to the bill, as follows:

I observed last evening, said Mr. B., that I consider the question arising upon the motion of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] as a test question, decisive of the protective system, and of more importance, consequently, than any question that has come before the House, or is likely to come before it, a question of peace or war not excepted. It was on this account I was desirous of addressing the committee, at this stage, in the progress of the bill. And while I am up, I shall take the liberty to make a few remarks upon one or two measures connected with the bill, upon the general tendency and bearing of the bill, and its purpose and object. The little health and strength which I bring into this debate, will be a sufficient guaranty that I shall not detain the committee long.

When, during the last session, we were encountering the cholera, and neglecting our own affairs and families to midsummer, I little thought that our attention would be so soon recalled to this angry and disturbing subject. I should have thought that, in the transition from one condition of things to another, in our financial affairs, by which great national interests are to be affected, any Government, deserving the name of a paternal Government, would have been content to feel its way, carefully and cautiously, to see what those interests can bear, and not, by one audacious leap, put them all in jeopardy. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, have presented this bill to us, and we must meet it as well as we can. I am opposed to it in all its forms. I was opposed to the bill of 1832, because I thought it was not so good as it ought to have been. I am opposed to this, because it is incomparably worse than that. This, it seems to me, is ground broad enough, and firm enough, and open enough, for a man to stand erect upon, without being subject to any injurious imputation. And while my friend from Maryland [Mr. HOWARD] reverses by his vote to-day his decision of yesterday, nothing is more natural than that the idea of inconsistency should be the first idea that should occur to him, he will permit me to express my surprise that it is not the last he should wish to talk about.

The Committee of Ways and Means, when they presented their bill, accompanied it with a report upon which it is founded, in which they sensibly and justly remark, that "it is vitally important to all engaged in any of those numerous commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural enterprises, which are affected by changes in the rates of import, now to know the intention and policy of this Government in regard to their several interests." Now, sir, if there be any one point of policy upon which the intention of this Government had been indicated, more distinctly than upon any other, and upon every other, from the foundation of the Government down to the close of the war, it is this, that the agricultural, manufacturing, and navigating interests of the country are to be protected against the rivalry and competition of foreign nations. The last war put the country upon its resources, and developed them, and was followed by the act of 1816, which was for the purpose of protecting the new creation of the war, and of the measures antecedent to it. That again was followed by the act of 1818; then came the act of 1824, then the act of 1828, and, finally, the act of 1832. By this act of 1832, it was established that the revenue of the Government was to be reduced to the wants of the Government; that it was to be derived from the duties imposed for protection, so far as those duties should be required for that purpose, and, therefore, you struck from that bill the duty upon tea and coffee. Many who hear me, will recollect that the chief difficulty, if not the only one we had, was in the apportionment of the duties. The policy of the Government was not only thus established by that act, but the intention of the Government was indicated in all the forms of legal enactment, sanctioned, of course, by the President himself. The Committee of Ways and Means seem to forget that it is necessary the policy of the Government should have a reach somewhat longer than a man's arm, and that the great interests of the country are not nimble, and cannot change their position oftener than the sun crosses the line. And if the honorable chairman of that committee complains that his bill fares worse at our hands than the weather did at the hands of Dean Swift, it is because his bill is more changeable than the weather, if not, in itself, more changing in its effect, and more chilling, malign, and deadly in its influence. If we are to have a new system oftener than twice a year, or at the commencement of every presidential term, we shall have systems enough, and we shall have nothing but systems. In this same paragraph the committee very justly remark again, "that uncertainty is worse than error in legislation." What a commentary this upon their bill!—the commentary of the committee upon their own act! It was only six months from the time this bill was reported, nay, not so much, not six, that you passed the act of 1832. How many voyages have been projected, and are in progress of execution, how much capital has been invested under the faith of that act, or how capital has been modified to accommodate itself to that act, no man can tell. And now, as has been well remarked, before the ink is dry upon the parchment of that act, "before the funeral bake-meas' are cold," I will not say you have committed murder and matrimony, or that you have committed the one that you might commit the other, or contract any unnatural or unhallowed alliance, but you have reported this bill, which, if it has not the turpitude of murder in it, has death enough—death enough to satisfy the grave. You cannot produce an instance in the history of the deliberate legislation of the world to parallel this. In other countries, whatever commotions arise, and however stormy they are, the great interests of the people are held steadily to one course, and are comparatively but little affected by them. A British minister, who should present himself to the House of Commons in the attitude of the Committee of Ways and Means to this House, would be found in the minority upon the first vote, unless the men of Lancashire should happen to be in the field, and then I suppose Parliament would have to give up.

I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether he does not call this "uncertainty" in legislation. And if he does not, I will thank him, with his philosophical knowledge, to tell me what uncertainty stands for in his report. Sir, it is uncertainty with a vengeance, and error too.

I have said that there is death enough in this bill—death to the great interests of the country—and I will proceed to show it. But it is not incumbent on the opposition to the bill to show this. The committee who propose the bill ought to show that it is consistent with, and promotive of, these interests, or it should have no friends here. Have they shown it? No, sir, nor attempted it: for what they have done does not deserve to be dignified with the name of an attempt. If they allege that their commission is financial, why, then, has not this bill been sent to the Committee on Manufactures for their examination, report, and judgment upon it? Or why has not the progress of it been arrested until the evidence which was taken at the last session, at much expense, could be printed, that we might have the benefit of it? Why was the bill urged on to its passage without even notice to those interested in it, and to be affected by it, of its pendency? I have many a constituent, who had rather be scourged at the post, or put in a pillory, or shut up in a jail, than that you should pass this bill, because, in the one case, he alone would suffer, and, in the other, he and his family will be involved in a common ruin. It is no answer to say that the people now have notice of the pendency of the bill. The time that has been allowed them has been extorted from the committee, and not conceded by them.

JAN. 30, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The bill is founded upon no petition or application from the people. It springs from the brain of the committee, or the promptings of others than the people. I mistake; it is said there has been one petition from Pennsylvania—one leaf in the air showing which way the wind blows, and so near the branch—the discript branch—covered with its decaying leaves—as to leave no doubt whence it came from, and as little as to the purpose for which it is abroad. But I will proceed, notwithstanding, to make good my position, that this bill will be ruinous to some of the most important interests of the country.

I shall confine myself to two, in my remarks upon this occasion, availing myself of some other opportunity, if need be, to ask the attention of the committee to others. And yet I am not sure but I misjudge, and that the better I succeed the more sure the bill will be to pass. If it were not known that there are such interests as those to which I allude, I would say to them as the Greek admiral said to his sailors when in a storm, they fell upon their knees, and went to calling upon their gods, "Peace, you dogs, don't let them know you are here." Bion's sailors, however, were wicked fellows; but these interests are hard working, honest interests, entitled to the favor of the gods, even, unless they be remorseless gods, delighting in human suffering. My first position, then, is, that this bill will destroy the woollens manufacture.

Mr. B. then stated that the duties upon woollen cloths, that come into competition with our own, have been as follows:

Before the last war the duty was 15 per cent.
By the act of 1816, it was 25.
of 1828, from 45 to 66, 90, and 112 per cent.
You imported in 1831, of cloth of less value than 35 cents the square yard, to the amount of	$1,005,660
Over 35 cents the square yard, -	5,893,023
Of blankets costing not over 75 cents, -	650,000
costing over 75 cents, -	650,000
	$8,198,683

Now note; by this bill the million of dollars worth of goods that were imported in 1831, paying a duty of from 45 to 66 per cent., you admit at a duty of five per cent. This is 20 per cent. less than the act of 1816, and 10 per cent. less than the duty before the war.

By this bill the near six millions of dollars worth of goods that were imported in 1831, paying a duty of from 45 to 112 per cent., you admit at a duty of 20 per cent. This is five per cent. less than the act of 1816.

The six hundred and fifty thousand dollars worth of blankets that were imported in 1831, at a duty of 35 per cent., you admit at a duty of five per cent. This is 50 per cent. lower than the act of 1828, and ten per cent. lower than the duty was before the war.

The six hundred and fifty thousand dollars worth, imported at a duty of 35 per cent., you admit at a duty of 15 per cent.

He then proceeded—

Now, Mr. Chairman, let it be remembered that these low duties of five per cent. and twenty per cent. are ad valorem duties—that they are to be assessed upon the value of the cloth in the foreign market, without any additional duty upon the cost of importation; that in most cases the value is to be fixed by the manufacturer, and with reference to the custom-house in this country, these goods being, to a great degree, shipped on his account; the difficulty, also, of detecting, with the best intentions on the part of the custom-house officers, an under valuation, and the committee will readily perceive that something short of the duty of five or twenty per cent. will be paid for their entrance. Let it further be recollected, that, with the duties which have hitherto existed, this interest has all along struggled against deep depression. How, then, can it be deemed possible that it can bear up against this bill? It is out of the question.

If it be said, then let it perish, permit me to remark, that the protection you have given it is not to be compared to that which you have given to cotton and iron, in nominal amount; and what you have given, did not begin to become effective until you had deducted therefrom the duties upon wool, dyestuffs, &c.; while from the protection given to cotton and iron, no deduction was to be made—the whole duty was effective.

But it has been stated that, under this bill, the reduction of duty upon wool, &c. will mitigate the severity of its operation upon the woollens manufacturer, and enable him to sustain himself. I deny that a reduction of duty upon wool ought to be made. We produced last year from fifty to sixty million pounds of wool. We imported only, of the finer quality, a little rising four million pounds. By this act you admit, free of duty, the coarser qualities of wool. Now, I venture to say, that our domestic supply, with the foreign wool which will be imported free of duty under this bill, will meet the demands of the manufacturer. Competition among the farmers will reduce the price of the article to the lowest point at which it can be produced; and that competition is now going on among the farmers of the different parts of the Union; and those who can produce the article the cheapest and best, will ultimately take to themselves the market. In this state of things, to reduce the duty upon fine wool, as proposed, would be an act of suicide, for which a man ought to be buried at the four corners, as unworthy of sepulture in a christian cemetery. At any rate, it would be an act of self-destruction, very unwise and very censurable. My friend from Maryland [Mr. HOWLAND] was pleased to say that to put a duty upon wool and the woollens manufacture was absurd, and to protect both was impossible. And yet, in the course of his remarks, he labored to satisfy the committee that there ought to be a duty upon the importation of raw cotton, while all admit that the cotton manufacture ought to be protected. Now, sir, in both cases the principle is the same precisely. The only difference is, that the relative price of wool here, compared with the price abroad, is greater than the relative price of cotton here, compared with the price of cotton abroad. And if it be essential to our independence, or our prosperity, to cherish the one or the other, it is equally important that we should encourage the growth of the raw material, else in time of war the manufacture will be of no use to us, and in time of peace subject to many contingencies.

But allow to the manufacturer the full benefit of the reduction of the duty upon wool, and the other articles as proposed in the bill; then deduct from the twenty per cent. allowed by the bill, the duty on ten per cent. added as charges of importation under former acts; the increased price which, after all, he will be obliged to pay for his stock more than is paid for it by his competitor; the portion of duty which will be evaded at the custom-house; and the excess of wages, especially for male labor, there will be little or nothing left for his protection. Why, sir, the twenty per cent., other things being equal, is not so much as the fluctuation of the market—the sea wall is not so high as the tide rises. No man, therefore, will make his garden by the side of it, for the very obvious reason he will have no security that he shall derive any benefit from it. At twenty per cent. the sweepings of the warehouses and manufactories of Europe will be thrown in upon us; a surplus, whenever it occurs, will be sent hither, and sold for what it will fetch; goods will be consigned to this market, as the vicissitude or exigencies of trade may require, or as commercial or manufacturing rivalry may prompt. The manufacturer will have no security of the market; capital will not be invested in this department of business, for it seeks safety, rather than excess of profit. And I put it to the committee, if, during the last year, with a specific duty of at least forty-five per cent., ranging upwards on the line of minimums, to a hundred and twelve per cent. you imported over eight millions of dollars worth of woollen goods, what are we to hope from this bill, with an ad valorem duty of five per cent. on coarse cloths, and twenty per cent. on others, or any bill approximating to this? There can be but one opinion about it, and yet there is no interest more essential in war as well as in peace than this—more essential to our independence or to our comfort. How was it during the revolution, when your army was in New Jersey, half naked, indicating the progress of their march by the blood from their feet? How was it in the last war, when you were obliged to dispense with your own laws in order to pay your annuities to the Indians, to keep the poor creatures from freezing? How was it with your own soldiery? And yet, according to the Committee of Ways and Means, nothing is necessary in war but iron; neither money, nor national resources, which are the sinews of war. You have only to send a soldier into the field naked, or plant him on the northwest angle of a fort in a December night, and put a cold iron in his hand, and that will keep him warm! I do the committee wrong; there is one other article: instead of a blanket, he is to take with him into the field a pot of coals! And these two articles, iron and coal, so far as I recollect, are the only articles protected as essential to our independence in time of war.

The Tariff Bill.

My next position is, that the bill will destroy the wool grower. If the business of the manufacturer fail, that of the wool grower fails of course; but in case the manufacturer can survive the bill, the wool grower cannot.

Before the last war wool was free of duty.

By the act of 1816 it was 15 per cent.

By the act of 1824 it was raised to 30 per cent.

And by the act of 1828 to four cents specific on the pound, and 50 per cent. ad valorem.

You imported, in 1831, of wool valued at less than eight cents, over a million pounds, and of wool valued at more than eight cents over four million pounds.

By this bill the million that came in at a duty of 50 per cent. and four cents specific, is admitted free of duty; 15 per cent. less than the duty of 1816.

The four millions that came in paying a duty of 56 per cent. will be admitted at 15 per cent.

Four million pounds of wool were imported during the last year, of the finer qualities, chiefly from Spain and Germany. It was clean wool, losing only from four to five per cent. in the perfect cleansing for the use of the manufacturer. It cost, as appears from the custom-house returns, a fraction over twenty-eight cents the pound. The charges of importation, as my commercial colleague tells me, may be put down at four cents the pound, to which add the duty of 15 per cent. on the cost abroad, making the price here about thirty-six cents the pound. How this can be afforded so cheap, I shall not now detain the committee to explain. It is sufficient that the fact is so. Our flocks yield upon an average two and a half pounds a head, which, at thirty-six cents, is ninety cents for the fleece. From this deduct 20 per cent. for cleansing to make it equal to the imported wool, for our habit is only to wash the sheep in brook water, and the fleece will lose from 20 to 30 per cent. in the process of cleansing at the manufactory, which will be eighteen cents, leaving seventy-two for the fleece. Now take into account the value of these flocks, which in many instances cost the proprietors of them large sums, or make no account of it, and take into account only the expense of keeping winter and summer, of washing and shearing, of transporting the wool to market, and often of a commission on the sale, you will scarcely have left of the fleece enough to pay the expense of keeping during the summer. The mutton is no object. I am not therefore surprised that the honorable chairman should dislike to see his worthy colleague, [Mr. Root,] at the head of the Agricultural Committee, driving down his flocks from the Delaware mountains. And he will give me leave to add, that I think he will be quite as glad to see the flocks as the proprietors of them will be to see him, after the passage of this bill, unless he is more regardless of their interest.

One word now, Mr. Chairman, if you please, as to the magnitude of these interests. The capital employed in the woollens manufacture has been estimated, upon pretty correct data, to be forty millions. My colleague [Mr. Davis] showed, at the last session, that a dollar employed in the woollens manufacture gives employment to five dollars of agricultural capital; that is, to two hundred millions. The sheep, upon an estimate in 1831, were twenty millions, producing fifty million pounds of wool. The annual product of this wool, as it comes from the hands of the manufacturer, is worth more than the entire cotton crop of the country. Of this annual product, five-sixths are agricultural. It is at this interest this bill strikes. I call upon the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, and on the friends of agriculture, if it has any friends here, to defend and protect it.

What will be the effect of this bill, and the overthrow of these interests? Upon the reduction of the revenue to be accomplished by this bill, the Committee of Ways and Means, I will not say they break out in strains of patriotic exultation, but they say, that "the people will have all the necessities and comforts and luxuries of life, and have them in greater abundance and of superior quality." The farmer, instead of one coat, is to have two; instead of homespun, they are to be of British, or German, or French texture. "Instead of the thorn, is to spring up the fir tree; and instead of the brier, the myrtle tree." The millennium of free trade is to come. But they conclude the paragraph in their report, to which I refer, by telling us that we shall have an increased importation annually of from eight to twelve millions. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to propound to you the question, how are we to pay for this increased importation, with diminished means? I know that the committee count upon the reduction of duties; but it will be perceived that the increased importation will far exceed any possible saving, from the nominal reduction of the duties. And let me remark further, that these duties, although in form, are not, in fact, paid by the consumer, nor by the country, but to a considerable extent are in effect paid by the foreign producer, who is obliged to sell to us at a reduced price, in consequence of our high duties, or he cannot sell at all. And so far as the reduction of duties shall enure to the benefit of the foreigner, it will be a loss to us. This consideration enters deeply into the policy of deriving a revenue from impost, and has a direct bearing upon a fashionable theory that is now afloat in this country. I only allude to this subject, but cannot stop to pursue it. We are to have an increased importation, of from eight to twelve millions annually. How, with diminished means, I repeat, are we to purchase and pay for it? Can the proprietors of the woollen manufactures purchase and pay for more? They are not generally men of wealth, but men of small means, who have some acquaintance with, or skill in, the business, or capacity to superintend it. How are they to pay when you overthrow their establishments, and sink their fortunes, limited as they are, and turn them and their families upon the world? How are the operatives, many of whom are foreigners, and, with no other business, are dependent, they and their families, upon their labor in this for support: how are they to pay when you take from them their employment, and leave them without means? How are the hundred thousand females who are employed in these establishments, and who are neatly and prettily dressed, as they should be, and who have their muslins and silks, and a dress besides for an occasion, with many of the little ornaments and luxuries of the toilet, and which they wear without a blush, for they have earned them, in an humble occupation, I admit, but the one that Providence has assigned them, and one that brings no shame, and leaves no regret: how are they to purchase and pay for more when they are thrown back upon the family mansion, where they are not wanted? How is the wool grower to purchase and pay when his flocks are scattered, not upon the Delaware mountains, but upon the mountains of this bill—the dark mountains of perdition to them all? How are the farmers to pay when you throw back upon them the manufacturing population, and, instead of one producer of wheat, you have two; instead of one producer of butter and cheese, you have two; and so on through all the departments of agriculture, when, with a greatly increased production, there will be a diminished demand for it? How is the owner of navigation to purchase and pay for more, when, instead of freight for ten tons imported or transported for the use of the manufacturer, he shall receive freight for one ton in the form of a bale of goods? And when the country can neither purchase nor pay, I will thank the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to tell me how the cities are to do it. They cannot; none can purchase or pay but your men of salary, of capital, of bank stock.

This bill ought to be entitled "a bill of sale and transfer of the poor and middle classes to the rich." And, before it performs this ungracious office, it will perform another still more so, that of depressing and annihilating value. First, will come upon the country a pressure for money, and with it distress; and, if the importations continue, universal bankruptcy will follow. Mr. Chairman, I am inflexibly hostile to any measure tending in the least degree to bring the free labor of this country into competition with the labor of other countries. It will follow, as certainly as effect follows cause, that we must work as cheap, live as cheap, and stoop as low as they do. I know well, that, for a time, the spirit of the freeman will give energy to the muscle of his arm, and he will struggle hard to bear himself, and those that God has given him, above this condition. But he will be obliged to yield to the dominion of this ever-active cause, slowly and reluctantly I admit, but yield he must. It may take a great while, many generations perhaps, for moral changes are slow, to put out all the lights of knowledge, that are now beaming from every cottage throughout our happy country, and refulgently and gloriously beaming; but one after another they will be extinguished, and with them the beacon light of liberty to the other nations of the world. This bill takes a giant's stride towards this result. The South will then find, too late for them and for us, that they have lost the best customer they ever had, and that it is the consumption of the North and East, the means of which the protective system has furnished, that has enabled them to sell such an amount of their staples as they have sold. Or, sir, another alternative will follow, to which I will but allude, lest what I may say be subject to misconstruction. When the free people of this country come to see how things are, by whom they are, and wherefore they are, and to realize the downward tendency, by feeling the effect of them, physical nature will make a throe and an effort to regain the height she has lost, and if she fails to do it, a storm will arise from the elements we are now compounding, and have been for years, of which no man who has been in this House, or acquainted with the public journals of the day, can be ignorant, that will break somewhere, and spend itself with desolating and terrific effect. You cannot depress a people that have once been enlightened and free, prosperous and happy, beyond a certain point, without igniting a mass, which you can no more control than you can the central fires that shake a continent to pieces. If you bring the free labor of this country into competition with the labor of other countries, one, and which I have no doubt, of these results will follow.

And now, sir, permit me to inquire, why is this bill proposed for our adoption? If there was any great and inevitable necessity for it, it might be borne as other evils are borne that cannot be avoided. I know the Committee of Ways and Means say that the act of 1832 will produce a surplus revenue, and that this bill is necessary to reduce it to the wants of the Government. But my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] in an argument which I will not weaken by attempting to restate, and who is of the Committee of Ways and Means, and has given his acute mind to the subject, has shown that the treasury is now bankrupt, and will be on the 1st day of January, 1834, and on the 1st day of January, 1835. And he says that the committee, in showing a surplus, have made two false assumptions: first, that the bank stock will be cash in hand to meet the funded debt; and, secondly, that it is bad policy to have in the treasury cash to meet the outstanding and unsatisfied appropriations of Congress. The funded debt of seven millions falls due next year and the year after. And the committee assume that the bank stock of seven millions will be in hand to meet the payment. Now, it will readily occur to you, that we may not be able to sell our bank stock; or if to sell it, only at a loss. The bank may fail; for if, as intimated, by the administration, it be an unsafe place of deposit, the stock itself is unsafe. Your banking houses may be burned up; your vaults may be emptied by a thousand casualties. Disastrous vicissitudes in commerce may put it out of the power of the debtors of the bank to pay. You may recharter the bank and retain the stock; or you may incorporate a new bank and transfer it. Congress may not authorize the sale of the stock, and Congress will not. You cannot hope to be in funds from your bank stock in time to meet your funded debt. The committee might as well say that we can sell our ships, or our forts, or our guns, or any other property we have, to meet the funded debt, as to count upon a sale of our bank stock for that purpose. Nor is it bad policy to have in the treasury cash to the amount of the unsatisfied appropriations. In the earlier history of our Government, when we were poor, such was the invariable practice; and now we have become rich, is it wise or statesmanlike for us to go upon our credit? Would it be deemed improper for a private gentleman to have in his pocket money to pay his debts, for which he was daily liable to be called upon, "although it was not usual for his creditor to call quite so soon?" And can it be unstatesmanlike and unfinancial for the Government to do the like? But if it be proper for the Committee of Ways and Means to make both the assumptions they have done, is it so absolutely necessary that you should sell your bank stock, or so obviously improper to have money in your treasury to pay your debts, as to lay the foundation of a necessity for this bill at this time?

But if there be such necessity, which I deny, why is this bill reported in this form? I shall not go into the errors and inequalities of the bill in its apportionment of the duties among the different protected articles. If we can maintain the protective principle, I shall be content to trust to the honor, the justice, and the liberality of my tariff friends to make such an apportionment of duties as the magnitude and condition of the different interests may require. After what was said by my friend from Pennsylvania, over the way, [Mr. MULLENBERG,] and what fell from my friend near me, [Mr. WATKINS,] I have no misgivings upon the subject. It was spoken as

Pennsylvania should speak. If this system is to be maintained, it must be as a whole in its symmetry and beauty. If it fail, there will be no one column, nor fragment of a column of the superstructure left to indicate the ruins. I cannot, however, but call the attention of the committee to one fact, not connected with the apportionment, but with the rule of apportionment, adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means. They tell us in their report, that they have arranged the duties in the bill, with the exception of the articles they name, from ten to twenty per cent., making the average duty to produce the revenue they desire, about eighteen per cent.; and they obligingly place the duty on woollens at the maximum duty of twenty per cent. My friend from Connecticut, [Mr. INGRAM], some two weeks since, stated to the committee that the average duty to produce the result desired, including the expenses of collection, was rising of twenty-five per cent. And if this be so, and the Committee of Ways and Means, in arranging the duties, have acted correctly upon their own principle, the bill is wrong throughout. How is this, sir? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, since the statement of this fact, has addressed the committee upon various other subjects, and said nothing upon this. His colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GILMORE], has also addressed the committee, without giving us any information upon this point. His other colleague from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK], merged himself entirely among the documents. And his other colleague still from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE], wandered among the classics, and lost himself in his admiration of Lord North, in a speech, the political morality of which I do not understand, and which, if I know any thing of my neighbors in New York, they will understand as little as I do—a speech partaking much more of the character of Sir Francis than of a Chancellor of the Exchequer; but as perfectly English as the noble lord whom he eulogized. I call upon the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to inform us how this is. Is it as my friend alleges, or is it not? Have the committee, in the construction of their bill, made a mistake in the average duty, of six or eight per cent.? After eighteen months' attention to the subject, we have a right to be informed how the matter is, before we act upon it. No lubrication that can be given the bill, will induce the committee to swallow it with this error—this camel of an error, in it. My friend asserts, and will maintain, that there is this error in the bill. Will the chairman admit or deny it? I should like to hear from him in due time on this subject.

This brings me to the point to which I wish more particularly on this occasion to call the attention of the committee, and to what I consider as the protective principle. And in the first place I admit, and, so far as I know, my tariff friends agree with me, that you may reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, and make the wants as limited or as liberal as you please. But we insist that the revenue shall be derived from duties imposed for the purpose of protecting the industry of the country, so far as that protection shall be needed. You claim by this bill a transfer of a portion of the duties from the protected to the unprotected articles, tea and coffee, which involves an abandonment of the principle on our part. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] puts it distinctly on this ground, and says "he shall vote against the bill" if this provision in it be rejected, showing that the reduction of the revenue is not the object, but the surrender of a principle. We claim it, because, when the revenue is derived from duties on protected articles, we gain not only the revenue, but a resulting benefit to the industry of the people; and if it be derived from duties on unprotected articles, we get only the revenue and lose the resulting good. It is not pretended this transfer of duties from the protected to the unprotected articles will afford any relief to the South; and after the intellectual and annihilating speech of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON], no one can believe that the South is disproportionately taxed. Far otherwise. Nor will it satisfy the South. No one tells us that it will. Why then is it found in the bill? I will tell you, sir; it is as the admission of a principle which the South will hereafter assert; and they will then say that upon this occasion, in tender consideration of the state of our manufactures and of our home industry, they only asserted, but did not enforce it. It is that it may be used as a fulcrum to the lever by which they intend to overthrow the system; as a temple step to their divinity of free trade. I therefore call upon my tariff friends to take a decided stand against it, shoulder to shoulder, in the confidence that we are right, that the ground we take is defensible, and that the people will sustain us. We ought not, we may not, and cannot recede from it, without bringing into question and endangering the whole protective system. Here, therefore, I repeat, we ought to take our stand and maintain it immovably, influenced by no entreaty, and awed by no power to abandon it, or any portion of it.

But, sir, admit that there is a necessity for this bill to reduce the revenue, which I deny; admit that the bill ought to be in its present form, which no one will pretend; why is it proposed at this time?

In considering this question, it may be well to look a little out of the House, and see how the subject is viewed there; and what its relations and bearings are. I will give you an extract from the official journal of nullification in this city of the 14th instant, because I think it presents the matter truly. "South Carolina, believing that the tariff laws are unconstitutional and oppressive, has given Congress the alternative of their repeal, or acquiescence in her measures of nullification, or declaration of war." You must, therefore, repeal your tariff laws, or you will have nullification, and, if need be, war to enforce it. I give you another extract from the official journal of the administration, of the same date. "Mr. Calhoun had the honor of aiding Mr. Clay in building up the American system, but General Jackson has robbed him of the honor of pulling it down. If Mr. Calhoun's object was merely to be able to exclaim upon the equalization of the reduction of duties, 'I did it,' let him make the vain-glorious boast; but the American people now know, and history will hereafter tell, that it was another" who did it.

You perceive, sir, that it seems to be taken for granted that the American system is overthrown, and the question in dispute is, who shall have the honor of having done it. The alternative proposition of South Carolina is, a repeal of your tariff laws, or nullification, and, if need be, war; and this by the 1st of February. Now, you propose not literally to repeal, but to supersede and modify, by a new bill, the old tariff laws, upon which alone the ordinance of nullification acts, and to yield up a portion of your protection. And you make haste, you run to do it, clearing away all the business of the House, and laying the course open, that you may get in in time. I say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that if, under these circumstances, you pass this bill, the American people will believe, and history will hereafter tell, that it was nullification did it; that both you and the President quailed and cowered before it, and gave up to it. It will be in vain for you to tell them that, instead of repealing the tariff laws in form, you only modified them; and instead of giving up the protective principle, you only gave up a part of the protection, to secure which, is all the principle itself is good for. They will not understand this special pleading; they will say, as I say, that, under such circumstances, to give up any thing is to give up all. And they will believe that nullification has done it. They will believe so for these reasons: It was only the last session you passed the act reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government; the act you passed reduced it more than the act proposed for the purpose by the administration; you established, by that act, the protective principle, by rejecting the duty upon tea and coffee. You contended that it ought to be satisfactory to the nullifiers; they said it was not, and took their position accordingly. And now, in order to create a necessity for a new act, they may do what the other did not—satisfy them; you assume that Congress will authorize the sale of the bank stock, which Congress will never do, and that it is bad policy to have money in your treasury to pay your debt, and that Congress will not divert from the public revenue the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, which Congress will do; and thus you zigzag to lay the foundation for this bill. You then call upon the same men who passed the act of 1832, to retrace their steps; and, without any unforeseen occasion for it, or any new occurrence, or any new evidence, or any new light from any quarter except that which beams from nullification, you reverse your own doings, and make haste in order to bring yourself within the day of grace allowed by the ordinance of nullification. Nay, more: From the time General Jackson was first named as a candidate for the Presidency, down to a very recent period, it was universally understood that he was friendly to the protective system. He was supported by his friends in my part of the country on that ground. Other gentlemen who hear me can tell how it was with them. I will not do him the injustice to suppose, for a moment, that he was capable of suppressing his opinion upon this great and interesting subject, or of dissembling or deluding the people with false hopes, or of permitting it to be done by others. If the capability had existed within him, the first vision of the high place to which he aspired should have annihilated it forever. A man qualified for that exalted station,

"Would not flatter Neptune for his trident,
"Nor Jove for his power to thunder."

Now, sir, I say that the people will believe that the nullifiers, aided by their anti-tariff friends over the river, or their anti-tariff friends aided by nullifiers, have not only overthrown the American system, but have changed the opinion of the President, and made use of him as an instrument by which to do it. Thus the people will not only believe, but history will record for all future time to believe, if she records the truth.

But I do not believe that the American system is overthrown, or can be overthrown without the aid of this House, as inconsiderable a body as we seem to be considered, and we are certainly made very small fish. My constituents believe that it was for the power of protecting our home industry, more than for any thing else, and for every thing else, that the constitution was formed; that it is in the constitution, and a part of it, vitally essential to their interest and wellbeing. And we shall not give it up to menace, nor to combination, nor to nullification, nor to secession, nor to war, even if that must be, unless the God of battles shall so decide it. No, sir, never, never. On this ground we stand, on this ground we fall. And I should not think that any man could be found, however demoted by the curse of God, mad enough to wish to destroy this infant and fair creation of so much wealth, and greatness, and independence, of so much power, and glory, and honor to this country, as the American system has produced. Sure I am its friends will not.

This brings me back to the question whether we are prepared to surrender any portion of the protection which the great interests of the country so much need; and whether we are prepared, in order to do it, to retrace our steps, and place our names, as my colleague well said, in damning contradiction to ourselves. The one, a point of interest, deep as the foundation of our prosperity;

the other, a point of national honor. • I will do neither. I am willing to plant myself with my tariff friends upon this rock, and to let the wind blow, and the storm beat, in the confidence that it will be in vain.

But the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in a speech, that did him credit as a man of taste and a scholar, and which, judging from the prematurity of its appearance in the journals of the city, was designed for the public, and well calculated to produce its effect from the charm of its style, and, I must add, sir, from the deceptive character of its positions, was pleased to say that we must "do justice and fear not;" and he puts this question: "Shall the majority of this House continue to impose upon the minority, even for another year, burdens which that minority believe to be oppressive, and this for the sake of collecting taxes which are no longer needed?" To this question, thus propounded, I answer, unhesitatingly, no; by no means. "The collection of taxes which are no longer needed," is no part of our object. And the gentleman must know that we maintain that the taxes are needed to defray the ordinary and inevitable expenses of the Government, and that there can be no surplus under the operation of the act of 1832, before the 1st of January, 1835. This is assuming what he assumes, that the calculations of the treasury are correct; and this we maintain by better arguments, as I think, than the assumptions to the contrary by the Committee of Ways and Means. The question then is, if fairly put, "Shall the majority continue to impose upon the minority burdens which that minority believe to be oppressive?" And to this, I answer, as unhesitatingly, yes; if they are needed for the protection of the industry of the country, and are not, in fact, oppressive, which, in both respects, is true of the tariff laws. Suppose the majority yield to the minority, and, by yielding, do their constituents a greater injury, in subverting their prosperity, than good to the minority, will the minority yield back? A multa fortiori they ought. If you are bound to yield to the minority, because they deem the tariff laws oppressive, why have you not done it before, when you could do it with honor? And why were you unwilling to do it until nullification brought you to your senses? What has been the practice of the Government upon this subject? When you imposed the perpetual embargo upon us, and fastened our ships to our wharves, until, as my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] said, the ropes fell off; and when you covered our wharves and our streets with grass that could be mown, and produced an amount of sacrifice and degree of suffering at which the heart of Pluto would have relented, were there any relents here? Did you relax the grasp by which you held us? When did you ever give up to us any thing? When Pennsylvania thought herself aggrieved, and undertook to assert what she thought to be her rights, did you give up? Tempora mutantur. It makes a great difference, Mr. Chairman, I perceive, from what quarter the wind blows.

But there is another answer to this inquiry. We admit that you may reduce your revenue to your wants, and make them large or small, as you please. But we claim that the revenue shall be derived from protective duties. You claim an abandonment of the principle, and, by this bill, a transfer of a portion of the duties from protection to non-protection. The amount, as the amended bill now stands, is small, made so for what purpose I will not say. When our fathers resisted the duty on tea, they did not trouble themselves about the amount of it. Will the duty on tea and coffee relieve the South? Not at all. Will it satisfy the South? Not at all. I have already stated for what purpose it is in the bill. But, according to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, justice requires that we surrender it. Justice to whom? Justice to the South? Who imposed the tariff system upon us? Virginia and South Carolina, more emphatically than any other States. They turned our industry into new channels, and left the old ones deep and broad and dry. They drove us from the ocean, when "our march was on the mountain wave, and our home was on the deep." And now, forsooth, they have found out that it was all unconstitutional, and that they are oppressed by their own doings, and require us to throw away our land gear, and into the water again. Let me ask the chairman, does justice to our constituents, who have committed their interests to our honor, to be by us defended and protected, who have invested their fortunes and estates under the faith of your laws, and following the lead of your laws, does justice to them require or permit that we should make this surrender? that we should break down the barriers which have been constructed for their protection, and roll the tide of desolation over them? Or that we should permit one particle, even the smallest dust of the balance, to be taken from them, when it is taken avowedly for the purpose of prostrating them? Are we to be reproached by the honorable chairman, because, being a majority, we refuse to make this surrender? Are we to be told that, having a giant's power, we make a tyrannous use of it? May not a giant, let me ask, use his power in self-defence? When the Philistines are upon him, may he not rise and shake himself? Or does justice require that he should give his head to the lap of the "Philistine Delilah," to be shorn of its glory and its strength, that he may be bound in fetters, and made sport of until he shall pray God to avenge his wrongs in the common destruction of himself and his enemies? Sir, I trust the majority of this House will not be wooed nor won to this by any art, or argument, or blandishment. In my judgment, if we make the surrender required, we do an act of traitorous and recreant and ruinous injustice to our constituents; and I must be permitted to add, as it seems to me, from fear, or something worse.

A man meets me in the street, and demands my purse. Its contents are not mine, but my constituents', which they value above price, and which they have committed for a time to my custody. He looks fiercely at me and demands it of me. As farmer Ashfield says in the play, "I'll argue the topic a little"—I am not afraid, that's clear, though I shakes some. It wont do for me to give up the purse from "personal fear," for that, as an honorable chairman says, is a "miserable weakness;" nor will it do to refuse to give it up "from the fear of doing right," because, although that is "an infirmity of a noble mind," I do not perceive that it differs much from "personal fear;" for if the "fear to do right" be an infirmity of a noble mind, it would seem to follow that the fear to do wrong is an infirmity of an ignoble one. So I assert and counts and analyzes the different kinds of fear, and goes on until I comes to the real statesmanlike, patriotic fear—and that, I says, will do; for if I refuse to give up my purse, nothing is more likely than that this fierce looking fellow will commit "a breach of the public peace," or he will do some other public mischief. At any rate there is great danger he will disturb the present subsisting tranquillity there is between me and him! So I gives up the purse upon the "patriotic fear." Now, Mr. Chairman, I may talk about my statesmanlike fear as much as I please: my constituents will believe that I was frightened out of my purse. And when they come to be told that, after all, this fierce looking fellow was not armed, and showed neither pistol nor dirk, they will almost swear, deacons and all, that I was an arrant coward. And let me tell my friend from Maryland [Mr. HOWARD] it will be of no use for me to say to them that they are all cowards themselves, or they would not think any such thing of me. They will persist in it, that I was either frightened out of my purse, or was confederate with the fellow, and balanced an old account or opened a new one, by giving it up. And let me say, further, sir, that they will never trust me again; and further still, they never ought to. I put this case, as the committee understand, of course, in illustration, and not as an identity.

If there be any gentlemen here from any of the States who have "debts of political gratitude" to pay, and who feel authorized and are inclined to make a sacrifice of the interests of their constituents in order to do it, let them take for the purpose lambs from their own flock, and not from their neighbors; let them sacrifice the interests of their own States, and not of others.

But, after all, Mr. Chairman, I have a firm conviction that these abused tariff laws, so far from being oppressive, are beneficial to the South, (I am not going into the subject, but only state generally,) in the new staple of sugar which they have given, and the consequently augmented demand and price for slaves and slave labor which they have created, and the immensely beneficial diversion, to the cotton region particularly, of the sugar lands from the cotton to the sugar culture, in the improved market they furnish for the staples and products of the South, and the reduced price at which they return to them many and most of the articles they have occasion to purchase. And there are physical indications of it, not to be mistaken, in the relative increase of their population, and the unrivalled thrift of many, and indeed most of the slave States, upon whom the tariff laws operate, as well as upon Eastern Virginia and South Carolina, and upon whom they would make and leave their impression, if they were "the withering curse" they have been said to be, and, above all, in this, that they continue to purchase many of the agricultural products of the other States, I speak now of South Carolina, paying freight, insurance, commission, and profit, for which their own soil and climate, and labor, are well fitted, finding the cultivation of their own staples so much more profitable than the agriculture of the other States, as to enable them to do it. Nevertheless, sir, if I could yield to the South what they deem to be oppressive in these laws, nothing would give me, personally, more pleasure than to make the concession. But I value the good opinion of honorable men too highly to expose myself to the contempt to which a surrender of the rights of my constituents, and the great agricultural interests of the free States, would consign me, and the condemnation that would and ought, as a consequence, to follow and be stamped upon me. It is, therefore, sir, not to name a higher motive, out of the question.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, obtained the floor, and commenced a speech against the bill, which lasted until eight o'clock. At half past five a motion was made for the committee to rise, but it was negatived: at seven another shared the same fate; yeas 35, nays 76. He was twice called to order by Mr. JENIFER, who quoted Jefferson's Manual to show that a member might not read extracts, or even his own speech, to a committee without its leave.

Mr. P. denied that he was doing either, and was permitted by the Chair to proceed.

The following is the speech of Mr. P. entire:

Mr. PEARCE said that his venerable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had intimated to the committee that when he should give his views of this bill, he would move to strike out the enacting clause, that the strength of parties might be tested in regard to it. I have, said Mr. P., the consent of that gentleman for now doing what he had informed us he would do on a future day, and therefore move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. The remarks I shall make will be in reference to the motion I have submitted—a motion which gives me the liberty, with great propriety, of stating my objections to every part, and all the provisions of the bill. I have not yet learnt, from the remarks of any one who has addressed the committee, that the bill, without essential amendments, is to be supported by any portion of those who reported it. Is it agreeable to the honorable gentleman, the chairman of the committee which reported it? Certainly not; for he has already moved one or two amendments to it, and has, as I understand, intimated a willingness to agree to or accept other amendments hereafter to be moved. Does it meet the views of his colleague, [Mr. WARR,] coming from the same great emporium? We have on our tables the proof that it does not, for he has offered sundry amendments which have been printed, and on which, at the proper time, we shall be required to express our opinions. Is it, Mr. Chairman, agreeable to the views of another honorable member from the State of New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] emphatically called the commercial representative, and I will not say incorrectly? No, sir; for in the remarks he made but a few days ago, he told his colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that he differed from him, and was opposed to the protection which the bill would give to the article of iron. A gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. YOUNG,] quoting the language of another gentleman from New York, informed the committee but two days ago that the Secretary of the Treasury would be satisfied with this bill with some important amendments. Then, sir, the head of the Treasury Department is not satisfied with it, as it was reported, nor have we any evidence of his being satisfied with it as it now is. I shall be able fully to show that it does not meet the views of the Executive, by a recurrence to his message sent to both Houses at the commencement of the session. The great difficulty is to ascertain how such a bill was ever submitted to our consideration. It may be a child of thirty fathers, but a natural child, with all its fathers unnatural, for not one of them has shown a disposition to foster or protect it. All who were of the committee which sanctioned the report of the bill, and from whom we have heard any thing since the commencement of the debate, have declined altogether its general defence; and some of them have refrained from even a notice of any of its provisions. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] addressed us in many languages, some of them living, but most of them dead; he spoke about nullification and South Carolina, but he did not say one word about any of the provisions of this bill, nor did he at all examine its provisions. Another gentleman [Mr. POLK] has condescended to read some documents from the Treasury Department, the testimony of some manufacturers in Vermont and New Hampshire, taken to show that the manufacturers could live and grow rich with no more protection than this bill would afford them. A gentleman from Vermont has informed the committee that all these swift witnesses, if not bankrupts at the time they testified, were found to be so soon afterward, perhaps before the papers to which they subscribed their names reached the Treasury Department. Looking into the debates of the other House, I found that an honorable Senator, referring to this bill, declared it a peace-offering to South Carolina; but unfortunately for us, Mr. Chairman, the dominant party in South Carolina are not satisfied with it, for it does not altogether abandon the idea of protection, and does not consequently remove their constitutional objections. Turning to another party in that State, the Union party, it will be found that they do not want this bill, for, in the language of one of its distinguished members, it will entail nullification on them forever, and make those triumphant there, who have arraigned the supremacy of the laws. I again ask, under whose auspices does this bill come before us, and where shall we look for its paternity? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, referring to the manner in which the bill had been assailed on all sides of the House, tells us gentlemen are hard to please, and, in illustration of his views, tells the story of a man who was continually finding fault with the weather—it was always either too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry. Sir, no blame should be attached to us because we find fault with the bill: the gentleman will not condescend to enlighten us; we have to grope our way in the dark. By one view of the bill it may well be said it is too hot; by another it may with equal propriety be said to be too cold. A gentleman from Connecticut has with great ability shown, and his arguments have not yet been answered, that by following out the reasoning of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in his report, if this bill should become a law, in less than eighteen months we shall have an empty treasury; that, to make out the estimate necessary to meet the actual wants of the Government, three millions, it is assumed, are to be derived from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and this too when a bill had passed the other House, and was on its way here to distribute those proceeds for a considerable time to come. A further assumption is found necessary, in setting down as money on hand the amount of two millions or more which has already been appropriated for specific purposes, and is liable to be called for at any moment, and when called for must be paid out. It has been also shown that the committee, in making their estimate of expenses, have fallen short of what will be found the real expenses for at least a few years, by nearly a million of dollars; and I refer, said Mr. P., to the sum which will be required to pay the pensions of the surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution.

The Tariff Bill.

Another gentleman, [Mr. APPLETON,] in an unanswerable argument, has taken another and a different view of the probable, if not certain operations of this bill. He has shown that, although its professed object is to reduce the revenue six millions, the data furnished by the committee lead to the inevitable conclusion that it will increase it one or more millions; that as you decrease imposts, you increase imports; and when you destroy your manufactures at home, you furnish a market for manufactures from abroad. I am indebted, said Mr. P., for a very plain illustration, in connexion with this argument, to what I read, a day or two ago, in a Rhode Island newspaper. A rope-dancer anxious to "raise the wind," and that too suddenly, put his tickets at a dollar each; his visitors were consequently few. He was afterwards advised to fix his price of admittance at fifty cents, and his profits were found to be more than twice as large as before; and when his doors were thrown open to all who could pay him twenty-five cents, he himself was astonished at his profits. Sir, who is prepared to say that if our imposts are reduced three-fourths, our revenue will not be increased? I will then say to the committee that this bill which satisfies no one, is advocated by no one, meets the views of no one, and promotes not one of the interests of the country, is urged upon our consideration under very singular and peculiar circumstances. In the whole history of our legislation, has there been hitherto any thing like it? We have been required to vote before we could hear from our constituents. We are called upon to adopt this bill at this short session, when at the last we spent six months in adjusting the tariff in a way, as I at the time thought, satisfactory to all the interests of the country except the manufacturers themselves. We are called upon for action when we have not received a single petition or memorial from those we represent, to repeal an act which has not yet gone into operation, and will not until the 3d of March next, and this under circumstances which entirely preclude the possibility of any light from home. Sir, when the people called, I have always been led to believe it would be time enough for us to act, and not until then. I appeal to those who were members in 1826-'7, and in 1828-'9, and who were here at the last session, to refer to those times, to show the difference in our situations, to legislate correctly then and now. We had then not only all the light and all the information which could reach us in the form of memorials and petitions from men and conventions, composed of the most enlightened and practical men in the country, but witnesses on the stand and before the committees of the House; both interests were represented, and the information was not confined to one side of the question. Sir, how do we now stand? If there be any information, if there have been any calls from the quarter mentioned, if it has not reached us; it may be locked up in the room of the committee who reported this bill—it may have reached them.

I promised, said Mr. P., to show, by a reference to the annual message of the President of the United States, that this bill would not have received his sanction. There is but little which that able State paper contains on the subject of the tariff, but what must meet with a hearty response from every patriotic American. Perhaps some thorough-going bigoted tariff men may file their exceptions to most of what the President says on this subject. I do not know any such in the State from which I come; if there be any, they will not find in me a faithful representative of what they may call their interest. Our national debt, as we have been repeatedly told, is paid, and the revenue must be brought down, as all reasonable men will concede, to the pressing and necessary wants of the Government. As to what those wants are, and what our expenditures should be, honest men may fairly differ, but few, if any, I think, can have the hardihood to question the correctness of the abstract proposition. The President, I contend, recommends no course calculated to destroy the institutions of our country; to violate the faith of the nation to individuals; to bankrupt thousands, if not millions of the people of this country. If the revenue is more than the wants of the Government require, it must be reduced; but, sir, does he recommend the destruction of discriminating duties, or intimate a wish to withhold incidental protection? Far from it.

"The final removal of this great burden (public debt) from our resources, affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defence, which the constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for them. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that, after the present year, such a reduction may be made to a considerable extent; and the subject is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in the hope that the combined wisdom of the representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall unequally upon any, and as may promote all the great interests of the community.

"Long and patient reflection has strengthened the opinions I have heretofore expressed to Congress on this subject; and I deem it my duty, on the present occasion, again to urge them on the attention of the Legislature. The soundest maxims of public policy, and the principles upon which our republican institutions are founded, recommend a proper adaptation of the revenue to the expenditure, and they also require that the expenditures shall be limited to what, by an economical administration, shall be consistent with the simplicity of the Government, and necessary to an efficient public service. In effecting this adjustment, it is due, in justice, to the interests of the different States, and even to the preservation of the Union itself, that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war. If, upon investigation, it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to any particular interest is greater than is indispensably requisite for these objects, I recommend that it be gradually diminished, and that, as far as may be consistent with these objects, the whole scheme of duties be reduced to the revenue standard as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will admit.

"That manufactures adequate to the supply of our domestic consumption would, in the abstract, be beneficial to our country, there is no reason to doubt; and to effect their establishment, there is, perhaps, no American citizen who would not, for a while, be willing to pay a higher price for them. But, for this purpose, it is presumed that a tariff of high duties, designed for perpetual protection, has entered into the minds of but few of our statesmen. The most they have anticipated is a temporary, and, generally, incidental protection, which they maintain has the effect to reduce the price by domestic competition below that of the foreign article. Experience, however, our best guide on this as on other subjects, makes it doubtful whether the advantages of this system are not counterbalanced by many evils, and whether it does not tend to beget, in the minds of a large portion of our countrymen, a spirit of discontent and jealousy dangerous to the stability of the Union.

"What then shall be done? Large interests have grown up under the implied pledge of our national legislation, which it would seem a violation of public faith suddenly to abandon. Nothing could justify it but the public safety, which is the supreme law. But those who have vested their capital in manufacturing establishments cannot expect that the people will continue permanently to pay high taxes for their benefit, when the money is not required for any legitimate purpose in the administration of the Government. Is it not enough that the high duties have been paid as long as the money arising from them could be applied to the common benefit in the extinguishment of the public debt?"

We have here, Mr. Chairman, all the President thought proper to recommend to us at the commencement of the session. High and unreasonable tariff men may not be disposed to subscribe to all he has said, but in my opinion he has said but a little which is not, at this crisis in the affairs of our country, substantially correct. He manifests no disposition to destroy existing institutions, or withdraw from them all necessary protection; no disposition to see violated the plighted faith of the Government; no determination to be instrumental to the destruction of discriminating duties or incidental protection. He has not, I would add, lent his aid to the introduction of this bill. What man who knows the hero of New Orleans can for a moment entertain the belief that he would, by any action on his part, entail misery upon millions, bankrupt thousands, turn a sound and industrious portion of our population beggars upon the world, and thus change the laurels which now decorate his brow for "the ivy which delights to flourish upon the ruins it has made."

I have once referred to one of the most important bearings of this bill, the necessary result of frequent legislation, and legislating twice upon the same subject within a very few months—its effect upon contracts made by individuals, as well as investments made by them. On the 14th of July last, after many months' discussion, and after having the subject before us the whole of last session, one of the longest sessions for many years, we passed an act altering the duties on imports. That act did not receive my approbation, or the vote of my colleague. We did not think it such an act as would foster and protect the great interests we represented: we were outvoted. The bill was carried not by New England, but by Southern and Western votes. Our constituents were bound to submit to its operations, and have prepared themselves accordingly, hoping, by industry and economy, to be able to live under it. What, sir, was the import and language of this bill, when it was passed into a law, to every citizen of the United States? That the policy of the Government was for a period settled; that no further agitation of the tariff would take place during the present Congress, more especially as the act did not go into operation until the expiration of the Congress itself. This was inferable also as well from the length of time spent in acting upon the provisions of that act, as from the satisfaction which the act seemed to give to an interest in the country which has lately manifested a decided hostility to all protecting duties. Sir, with these views in relation to this act, what was the natural supposition as to the course which would be pursued by manufacturers and others, whose interests would be affected by its operations? They would trim their sheets to the approaching gale, (go on they must;) to scud under bare poles, to borrow a phrase as well as an idea from seamanship, to lay to, would be as bad as sinking, and would inevitably lead to it. Sir, they have gone on; they have made their contracts and investments, and all their arrangements, under the law of last session, and under the faith of the Government. Pass this bill, sir, and what will be the effect upon these contracts and investments? Ruin; yes, sir, utter ruin; brought upon them by a breach of faith on the part of their Government. Hereafter they must not only insure against fire and flood, assailing thieves and robbers, but against the capricious legislation of their country, and the mutability of an American Congress. Take, for illustration, one of the interests of the State from which I come, and, if I may be excused for a little Latin, "ab uno disce omnes." The citizens of Rhode Island have invested in cottons ten millions of capital. To use it advantageously, they are compelled to make contracts daily and every day in the year, many of them not consummated in a year after they are made. All these contracts were made in reference to the law of last session, but by the passage of this bill they will be directed and governed by a new law affecting and bringing ruin on this interest to the amount of millions. Who would say that, for all losses occasioned by this frequent legislation, every man who suffered would not have an equitable claim upon the Government for indemnity? And no Government disposed to do justice to the governed, would withhold the indemnity. No one which would thus violate its faith to its citizens could long command their affections, or preserve their attachments; and let me add, that none ought to, in my humble judgment. Where property is held by such a brittle tenure, love of country cannot exist there. The whole history of the legislation of the country shows that Congress has hitherto sedulously watched and carefully provided against any violation of contracts or hostility to investments made under the faith of the Government.

The act of 1789, approved July 4, went into operation on the 1st of August following.

Hemp and cotton imported previous to December 1, 1790, were exempted from the operations of that act.

The act of 1790, approved August 10, went into operation on the 1st of January following. The 6th section provides that all duties accruing under the act of 1789, "between the time specified in the said act for the commencement of the said duties, and the respective times when the collectors entered upon the duties of their respective offices in the several districts, be, and they are hereby, remitted and discharged, and that in any case in which they have been paid to the United States, restitution thereof be made."

The act of 1797, approved March 3, went into operation on the 1st of July following.

The act of 1804, approved March 27, went into operation on the 1st of July following.

The act of 1816, approved April 27, went into operation on the 1st of July following. In it there is a proviso exempting from the operations of the act cotton piece goods imported in the vessels of the United States which sailed thence before the passage of this act, and arrived between June 30, 1816, and June 1, 1817.

The act of 1824, approved May 22, went into operation on the 1st of July following. It contains a proviso, that the provisions of the act should not apply to importations of goods from ports or places eastward of the Cape of Good Hope, or beyond Cape Horn, before the 1st day of January ensuing.

The woollens bill, which passed this House in the winter of 1826-'7, and was lost in the Senate by the casting vote of the Vice President, was made prospective in its operation. The bill of the last session was not to go into immediate operation. By the act of 1828, it was intended to provide against its operation upon voyages which had been commenced and could not be countermanded; and, because, in the hurry of legislation, that bill had not this provision in it, all those who were affected by it in their contracts and voyages, made or planned under the faith of the Government, have petitioned for relief; and last session a bill in their favor passed the Senate with but a few dissenting voices. We have now a bill for their relief upon our tables, which I hope to see pass before we adjourn. Sir, when that bill was under discussion the other day, a gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] said he would give to the manufacturers the same relief for losses sustained by the operation of our laws passed in this way, that he would give to merchants; and with him, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that the claims of the one ought to be as favorably received as the claims of the other.

As far as we have been able to hear from those we represent, there has reached us but one voice on this subject of frequent legislation and consequent injury to individuals. The Legislature of my own State, in their resolutions, unanimously adopted, and which have been sent here,

Resolved, That the effect of frequent alterations of the tariff laws is to distract and paralyze the enterprise of the merchant, to destroy the stability of the markets for the agriculturist, and bring ruin upon the manufacturer.

That all branches of our national industry have been arranged, contracts made, voyages projected, and business commenced, under the belief and expectation that the tariff of the last session of Congress was framed and solemnly enacted after mature deliberation, and that reliance could be placed upon the stability of these measures of the Government.

That, without a countervailing policy in the regulation of trade with foreign nations, all branches of our industry will be paralyzed, as was the case before the adoption of the constitution of the United States.

We have a similar voice, but one, perhaps, much louder, from the city of Albany. I have, said Mr. P., the proceedings of a meeting held at the city hall in Albany, the 24th of this month, relative to the tariff bill introduced into this House by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VERPLANCK.] It is said to have been the greatest meeting ever held in that city. The Chief Justice of the State was the presiding officer, and Mr. Knower the near connexion of Governor Marcy, whose name was brought into debate by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE], somewhat, as I thought, uncourteously, for the purpose of saying that he had not written a letter which it had been alleged he had written, and for no other purpose whatever. I can say to the gentleman from Georgia, that it is my good fortune to be also acquainted with Governor Marcy, and that I know him too well, and have known him too long, to believe that he will disavow any letter he has written, or that he ever wrote one from considerations of his connexion's interest. This meeting in Albany, speaking of the act of last session, and the bill now before us, in their preamble and resolutions, use this language:

"Whereas a bill is now pending before the Congress of the United States, having for its object a further reduction of the tariff than was effected by the law of the 14th July last; which law was matured and passed at the close of a protracted session, and after seven months' debate and deliberation. And whereas a majority of the representatives of the people of the non-manufacturing States gave their assent to that law, as will appear by a reference to the national journals. And whereas the said law was adopted as the compromise of a great national question, and was designed, by its supporters, in the spirit of mutual concession, to heal the animosities of local interests. And whereas business transactions to a vast amount have been entered into in good faith under the implied pledge of the Government, that a law, involving such a wide extent and complication of interests, would not be abandoned until its practical effects should be ascertained.

"And whereas the unanticipated and premature abandonment of the existing law, by the same Congress that enacted it, and the unforeseen passage of the pending bill, will be a surprise upon all the manufacturing States, will throw their business and contracts into derangement and ruin, and will thereby produce incalculable mischief to all classes of citizens.

"And whereas the passage of the pending bill by the present Congress, to go into immediate and not prospective operation, will justly be attributed to the menacing and hostile attitude of South Carolina, rather than to a conviction produced by a dispassionate re-examination of the subject, and justice requires that no sudden and unexpected change should take place in the policy of a Government affecting the great interests of the community, and such we believe has been uniformly the provident legislation of Congress in regard to tariff laws heretofore passed: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the representatives of this State, in both branches of the National Legislature, be earnestly requested to shield their constituents, if possible, from such an act of injustice and instability."

I must now, said Mr. P., dismiss this part of my argument, perhaps, in the opinion of many, too long, but let it be understood it presents one of the strongest objections to the passage of the bill at this time.

I have but one request to make of gentlemen: If the Government is to indemnify all those who may suffer by this improper interference with their contracts, let them calculate the expense to the country. If indemnity is denied, let them reflect for a moment on the ruin to individuals.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, examine this bill, for the purpose of showing its unequal bearing and operation upon the various interests of the country. It appears to me, that if the committee had labored night and day three or four weeks, for the purpose of presenting a bill whose passage would prove destructive to all the interests of Rhode Island, they could not have been more successful than they are found to have been in the bill they reported. How this should have happened, I know not; but true it is, without charging them with any hostile views in regard to the State I represent, the bill, if passed, may destroy all its interests, and inevitably must the most prominent ones. The protection given to cottons by the act of last session is reduced from seven cents a square yard, or, what is equivalent to it, to one and a quarter or one and two mills. What interest can live with such a protection, or survive such a change? Not this, as I expect to show. The duty on cordage, tarred twine, and cables is reduced from four to three cents per pound; untarred twine, from five to three cents; olive oil, from twenty to ten cents per gallon; on spirits from grain, which now pay a duty from first to above fifth proof, fifty-seven to ninety cents a gallon, the duty is reduced to twenty and to forty cents a gallon. On spirits from other materials, which now pay a duty of fifty-three and eighty-five cents a gallon, the duty is reduced to eighteen and thirty-six cents a gallon. The duty on wool is fixed at fifteen per cent., on middling and fine cloths at twenty per cent., on the coarse cloths at five per cent. The duty on worsted yarn is reduced from twenty to fifteen per cent., and the duty on manufactures of woollen yarn, from fifty per cent. ad valorem, and five cents per pound, to fifteen per cent. But this is not all; exposed as these interests are by this reduction, and destroyed as many of them must be, some consolation might be derived from the reflection, if facts would warrant, that some benefit was to be derived from other parts of the bill. But this is not so: Iron, which we do not manufacture, and is of very general use, is protected by a duty of from twenty to forty-three, and, I might add, one hundred per cent. Sugar is protected by a duty of at least seventy-five per cent.; molasses by as high a duty. Coffee by the bill is to pay a duty of one cent per pound, and tea from three to ten cents per pound. Hemp a duty of thirty dollars per ton, and sail cloth what it was charged with by the act of the last session; so that on every thing we lose, and gain in nothing.

Why these inequalities? If, Mr. Chairman, the Committee of Ways and Means, the majority of whom are free trade men, had nothing in view but the destruction of the whole protective system, the course they have pursued, and the policy they have adopted, are unquestionably correct. Not having at present the adequate strength to effect their object, they must distract and divide those who are now opposed to their plans, that the conquest may hereafter be more readily made. Hence the necessity of conciliating the interest of Pennsylvania, by the heavy duties on iron and coal; Louisiana and a considerable part of the Southern and Western States, which in that State find a ready market for slaves and other live stock, and many of the products of agriculture. But let Pennsylvania recollect, that if she is misled by the temptations which are now thrown in her way, her evil day will come, and the siren which now allures, will be found to be a Cyclops ready to devour. Sir, can that State expect that the Eastern States, cut off from all their existing resources, deprived of most of their wonted pursuits, affected, materially injured, in all their great interests, will, in their struggles for life, submit to pay the heavy duty which the bill proposes on iron, 20,000 tons of which, from Sweden and Russia, are annually manufactured into nails, hoops, and plates, the cost of which, at the place whence imported, is only about 50 dollars per ton? Sir, has not only the manufacturer, but the shipowner, a direct interest in lowering the duty on this article? Let the representatives of that State also recollect that our manufacturing establishments require large quantities of English iron, (rolled,) which is imported in various forms, and which costs in Great Britain 35 dollars per ton, and with a revenue duty of 15 to 20 per cent., might be sold in this country for $50, whereas our manufacturers and others now pay 75 and 80 dollars per ton for it.

The motives which influenced the committee to charge hemp with a duty of 30 dollars per ton, I am unable to discover. Certainly they did not intend with one blow to injure at the same time two interests, and perhaps destroy them. I refer to the shipping interest, and the interest of those engaged in the manufacture of cordage. This course, on the part of the committee, is more to be regretted, as this heavy duty promotes no interest in the country. Kentucky has not required it. The great champion of American industry, the father, if you please, of the American system, last session declared, both in his seat and out of it, what past experience has proved to be true, that the hemp of Kentucky could not come in competition with that which was imported; that the mode of curing here was so different from that abroad, that the one could not take the place of the other; and he at the last session was in favor of a greater reduction than that which was made by the act of the 14th July. If, sir, hemp could be imported free of duty, as is actually the case in Great Britain, our ropewalks, now in a manner idle, might be profitably used in the manufacture of cordage for exportation, as well as for own vessels. But, under the operation of this bill, vessels will, as they have heretofore done, be destined from this country for Europe, take as little cordage as they can be safely navigated with, and make up their deficiency on their arrival out, thus transferring American capital to a foreign land, and employing foreign labor instead of that of our own citizens. If this article could be imported duty free, or was subject to only a small impost, our own labor might supply the West Indies and South America with cordage; at any rate, we could divide the trade in this article with the English, give employment to the mechanics of our own country, and give a stimulus to the navigation interest, and all the branches of national industry connected with or dependent upon it. But pass this bill, and they have nothing to hope for or expect. One would suppose that the committee had in view the destruction of another of our interests. The duty on rum is to be so far reduced, as I have already shown, I think, as to enable the foreign to supply the place of the domestic in all our markets, and consequently prostrate the whole of our distilleries. West India rum, I am told, will be brought for twenty-eight cents a gallon, third proof, hogsheads and all, in this country for exportation, giving the vender the drawback. Such rum is 10 per cent. above first proof, which being deducted to ascertain the price of first proof, leaves it at only 25.20 cents per gallon, then deduct four cents for the value of the hogshead, brings the rum at twenty-one cents and eight mills, which is all the rum nets the seller in this country, reckoned first proof. The price of New England rum is now, without the hogshead, at the distillery, thirty-three cents, and can hardly be afforded for that; nor will it probably be much lower if the duty on molasses should continue at four or five cents. Then, sir, admit the importer receives twenty-two cents for first proof, and pays eighteen cents duty, it will only raise it to forty cents per gallon, seven cents above the price of domestic rum. There can be no doubt but the foreign rum would have a general preference in the market at twenty cents difference of price. Pass this bill, and domestic distilling must cease; the importation of molasses would be lessened; our navigation feel the effects of it; and with this decrease of importation, there would be a decrease of the exportation of many of those agricultural products as well as those things which are drawn from the ocean, given in exchange for this article. Sir, I lay out of the account the effect which the destruction of this one interest would have upon the mechanics and laborers to whom it directly and indirectly gives employment.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the consideration of another article: that of molasses is as much, if not more, entitled to a reduction of duty than any other. Its present duty is frequently equal to its cost in the island of Cuba, if we except the price of the hogshead; and the duty proposed by this bill, of four cents a gallon, will be equal to an ad valorem duty of 75 or 80 per cent. If we view this article as a material for manufacturing, the reduction goes in aid of American industry, in which may also be included the employ of our vessels and seamen. If it is considered as an article of domestic consumption, it is one of the cheapest, and most nutritious, and best adapted to the use of the poor and laboring classes of any of the foreign productions.

[Here Mr. ROANE, of Virginia, in an under tone, observed to Mr. P. that Yankees use it in more ways than one.]

Yes, said Mr. P., if our hasty puddings were not sometimes made to swim in this as well as milk, the bard of Connecticut could not have sung with such apparent inspiration the praises of such a common article of food in New England.

A reduction of the duty on molasses, or the introduction of it duty free, would not injure any one of the protected articles of the country. Such is the protection given to sugar in this bill, that the sugar interest of Louisiana would not suffer by such an introduction, and most of the molasses of that State does, and for a long time will, find a ready market in the West, and cannot be injured by any successful competition. Why, then, should the duty be retained?

Of all the interests in this country, which will feel the direct and immediate effects of this bill, that of wool and woollens is the most extensive. How far and to what extent they may be injured, others are more competent than I am, said Mr. P., to judge. No man is better acquainted with their interests than the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BATES,] who has just taken his seat. Neither, in his estimation, can live under the operations of this bill. Will gentlemen pause for a moment, and, before they proceed in the work of destruction, reflect upon the extent of these two interests?

The capital in wool and woollens is, at this time, $167,000,000. Annual produce, $40,000,000. Three-fourths the produce of agriculture.

The sheep, at this time, are valued at $40,000,000, and the number might be quadrupled in three years. Are gentlemen prepared, at one blow, to deprive us of this great produce by the destruction of this immense capital? I hope not. There is no pursuit which one would suppose from the course of our legislation was less regarded than agriculture: yet it has engaged in it more than five times the number of all the others combined. It is seldom the farmer calls your attention to his wants. He seldom makes any demands or prefers any claims; and, sir, what employment is there more honorable or as useful? By honest industry, by hard labor, by the sweat of his brow, he is able to sustain himself, and supply the wants of his country. Without this labor, where would be the comforts or necessities of life?

Mr. Chairman, the soil which he cultivates with his labor is pledged for all the requirements of the Government. His fields are as lasting as the eternal hills, and when the tax gatherer calls, he is sure to find him. He cannot change his employment for any other. As his lot is cast, so it remains. His gains may be sure, but they are always small. Sir, what is at this time his great dependence? I speak, sir, of those in that part of the country with which I am best acquainted, my own home: it is wool. If he be the proprietor of the land he cultivates, he looks to this for his gains; if but the tenant, to this he looks to enable him to pay his rent, and for the maintenance of his family. Let it not be understood, because we have in Rhode Island a large manufacturing interest, we have not a great agricultural interest also. Sir, if we have but a little soil, we endeavor to supply the want of extensive fields by high cultivation, and placing upon the lands we have all the stock they can possibly sustain. To this interest I pray gentlemen to turn their attention before they vote for this bill in its present form. Think of our flocks, and you will have at least some misgivings before you strike the blow, some compunctious visitings. I am animated with hope, and cannot but take courage from what I have seen in the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROOR.] Anti-tariff as he may be supposed to be, he has offered us one prayer for the sheep upon the banks of the Delaware.

The Tariff Bill.

In regard to the agricultural interest, said Mr. P., I might have said more, but could not have contented myself with saying less. Early associations, an acquaintance with it in all its parts better than with any other interest, as it always has, so it always will engage me to stand by and sustain it. The laborer is worthy of his hire. Continue to the farmer the little pittance which he now receives. Let him not suffer by the direct, as he certainly will, to what extent I know not, by the indirect operations of this bill, if it should pass with the provisions it now contains. If the Hessian fly has destroyed his grain, let not our legislation blast his remaining prospect. A remark or two more generally in regard to the navigation of the country to be affected by the bill, and to give all the credit to the committee they are entitled to. In looking over a comparison of the duties of the act of last session with those proposed by this bill, I find that on chain cables the duty is to be reduced from 59 to 20 per cent. ad valorem, and, without stopping to inquire whether this reduction will be conducive to the interest of the rope-makers, the navigation of the country will give them credit for it. And as this interest was not entirely overlooked, and was recognised as an existing interest, and knowing as they did that it had to compete with the navigation of the world; that it has heretofore been sustained by the superior skill, industry, and enterprise of our navigators and seamen, without which it could not have been sustained at all; that shipbuilding is as much a manufacture as any other; that the mechanics of our country have also their rights, and are entitled to the protection of their country; that this navigation has been taxed with charges upon ship registers, Mediterranean passes, and, until lately, with tonnage duties, not to mention others, it is to be regretted that the heavy charges on iron, hemp, and duck, should have been altogether apparently unobserved by them. Sir, the chairman of the committee at the last session fought manfully to reduce the duty on sail duck. I was proud to fight with him, and am now willing to say that to his great exertions is the navigation of the country mainly indebted for the reduction of the duty on that article last session to 15 per cent. ad valorem. That gentleman will allow me to say, I have no doubt, that the reduction at that time effected was not so great as he wished or desired. His recorded votes show that it was not. Why then has this article been overlooked by him in his bill reported for the express purpose of reducing the revenue six millions of dollars? Do not the same causes now exist which existed six months ago for its reduction? Have any new manufactures of it sprung up since the last session, requiring the aid or protection of the Government? We have had no petitions in favor of further protection from the manufacturers in this country. The committee may be able to solve what to me is a mystery. They have not yet done it.

At the last session, Mr. Chairman, I presented memorials and remonstrances against the reduction of the duty on olive oil. I received them from that portion of my constituents who are engaged in the whale fishery. I presume, sir, that if it had been generally known what this bill proposed in relation to olive oil, we should have heard at this session from those whose interests may be materially affected by the reduction upon it. The law of 1832 reduced the duty to twenty cents per gallon, and the bill of this session proposes a further reduction of ten cents. I did not have the pleasure, said Mr. P., to hear my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. REXN.] when he addressed the committee a few days ago; but knowing the great interest his constituents have in the whale fishery, and his watchfulness in regard to all measures which can affect their interests, I doubt not he at that time called the attention of the committee to the operations of that part of the bill which I am now considering. I know not the interests which have called for this reduction, but I have heard it somewhere said, not here, that the woollen manufacturers require it. Sir, they have not, to my knowledge, asked for it. Pass this bill, and my word for it, something more than olive oil will be found necessary to keep their wheels in motion. This proposed reduction will be but a poor compensation for the losses they will sustain by the operation of the bill generally. Let me then call the attention of the committee to the extent and advantages to the country of a pursuit which this reduction may severely affect and eventually destroy. The statement which I read shows the number of ships in 1831, and men engaged in this business, the quantity of provisions consumed, the amount of foreign articles used, and the quantity of sperm oil obtained from 1815 to 1831. For the last two years the number of ships has greatly increased, and the number of men now employed is more than seven thousand.

THE WHALE TRADE.--It is estimated that the number of whale ships in the United States, in 1831, was 300; the number of men employed in them was about 6,500, who consumed annually 36,000 barrels flour, 30,000 barrels beef and pork, 18,000 bolts of duck, 6,000,000 staves, 2,000 tons of cordage, and 700,000 pounds of copper and copper nails. The quantity of sperm oil obtained from 1815 to 1831 is stated to be as follows:

1816	7,539	1822	42,900	1828	73,077
1817	32,760	1823	87,230	1829	79,840
1818	18,625	1824	92,380	1830	106,829
1819	21,323	1825	62,240	1831	110,000
1820	34,708	1826	32,840

The whale oil brought in 1830 was 118,000 barrels, and in 1831, 188,000 barrels; 100 barrels sperm oil will produce 27,000 pounds spermaceti. The common whale ships average about 1,000 barrels of oil.

Sir, let us view the origin, progress, and fluctuations of this business as far as we have the means of examination. It had its beginning in 1701: at the commencement of the revolutionary war it brought into the province of Massachusetts, through the island of Nantucket alone, 167,000 pounds sterling annually. It then employed 150 sail of vessels, with about 2,000 men, but at the opening of the peace this number was reduced to nineteen sail only. Our late war suspended this business altogether. The statement I have submitted shows that, since the conclusion of the war, the success of this business has increased almost in a geometrical ratio, and this, too, by the mere force of American genius, skill, and enterprise, unaided by bounties or any direct encouragement on the part of the Government of the United States whatsoever, and against all the encouragement, direct and indirect, given by other countries, England, France, and Holland, to this species of fishery.

Edmund Burke might have been an enthusiast—he was surely a prophet, although even more has been realized than his ardent imagination led him to predict when he pronounced the following eulogium upon the enterprise of the New England colonists:

“As to the wealth, Mr. Speaker, which the colonies have drawn from the sea by their fisheries, you had all that matter fully opened at your bar. You surely thought those acquisitions of value, for they seemed even to excite your envy; and yet, the spirit by which that enterprising employment has been exercised, ought rather, in my opinion, to have raised your esteem and admiration. And pray, sir, what in the world is equal to it? Pass by the other parts, and look at the manner in which the people of New England have of late carried on the whale fishery.

“Whilst we follow them among the tumbling mountains of ice, and behold them penetrating into the deepest frozen recesses of Hudson's Bay and Davis's Straits; whilst we are looking for them beneath the arctic circle, we hear that they have pierced into the opposite region of polar cold, that they are at the antipodes, and engaged under the frozen serpent of the south; Falkland island, which seemed too remote and romantic an object for the grasp of national ambition, is but a stage and resting place in the progress of their victorious industry.

"Nor is the equinoctial heat more discouraging to them than the accumulated winter of both the poles. We know that whilst some of them draw the line and strike the harpoon on the coast of Africa, others run the longitude, and pursue their gigantic game along the coast of Brazil. No sea but what is vexed by their fisheries. No climate that is not witness to their toils. Neither the perseverance of Holland, nor the activity of France, nor the dexterous and firm sagacity of the English enterprise, ever carried this most perilous mode of hardy industry to the extent to which it has been pushed by this recent people; a people who are still, as it were, but in the gristle, and not yet hardened into the bone of manhood.

"When I contemplate these things; when I know that the colonies in general owe little or nothing to any one of ours, and that they are not squeezed into this happy form by the constraints of a watchful and suspicious Government, but that, through a wise and salutary neglect, a generous nature has been suffered to take her own way to perfection; when I reflect upon these effects, when I see how profitable they have been to us, I feel all the pride of power sink, and all presumption in the wisdom of human contrivances melt and die away within me. My rigor relents. I pardon something to the spirit of liberty."

A single port in one of the Eastern States sends annually into the Pacific Ocean more tonnage than at the commencement of the revolutionary war was owned in the whole thirteen colonies. The port to which I allude (New Bedford) employs almost exclusively in this fishery, which is increasing every year, and I might almost say every month, 50,000 tons of shipping.

This business, Mr. Chairman, will be seriously injured, perhaps destroyed, by this bill in two ways. A duty of ten cents a gallon on olive oil will cause that article to take the place, to a very great extent, of whale oil in our own markets, and a reduction of duty on cottons from seven cents a square yard to one and a quarter cents, destroying that interest, as I shall soon attempt to show, will take from it the great and extensive demand which the cotton manufacturers have for it. And where, sir, can a market be found for it? Not in England, who knows her own interest and the importance of this business too well to suffer it to enter her ports. Pass this bill, and your whale fishery must be abandoned.

A moment's reflection upon the consequences of its abandonment, not to the labor, wealth, and commerce of the country, but to the national arm, and I quit the subject. In the event of a war, seven thousand seamen will be withdrawn from this pursuit for the national defence; men who have periled life and defied danger in contending with the leviathan of the deep; men who will court danger in fighting upon the ocean the battles of their country. Sir, a recurrence to the events of the late war fully shows, that, without the nursery for seamen created by our fisheries, this country would not have been, as it is now acknowledged to be, the bravest and most successful in naval warfare of any on the face of the globe. When the Guerriere struck her proud flag to the constitution, from what nursery were seamen of the latter drawn? From our fisheries. A great proportion of her crew were from Marblehead, Nantucket, and New Bedford. Turn to all the naval battles in which we were successful, and it will be found that the valiant sons of the ocean who mainly contributed to our victories were nurtured, reared in the American fisheries. But not in our national ships alone was the enemy made to feel the force, discipline, and education of these men. Our private armed vessels, manned with these men, scoured the ocean, and caused it to blaze with the fires they set to the vessels of the enemy, entered his harbors, and, in some instances, laid his cities under contribution. Sir, our enemy was made more sensibly to feel the effects of the war by the dauntless bravery and matchless skill of these men, thus reared, than by all our other means of annoyance combined. Ought we, by any act of legislation, to be cut off from this source of national defence, or deprived of the means of successful and vigorous naval warfare? Paralyze this arm of our national power, and in the event of another war you will not find a sufficient number of American seamen to man the ships of the line which now constitute in part the navy of the United States.

To a consideration of the cottons of the country, and the undoubted effect of this bill upon them, I must now call the attention of the committee. I regret, said Mr. P., that upon other topics so much of your time has been consumed by me. There are in Rhode Island more cotton manufactories than in any other State, and perhaps as much capital invested in the cotton manufacture as in any one in the Union. The value, extent, and importance of this business, the effect of this bill upon it, and a history of its rise and progress in the United States, must claim our attention. In 1789, the first cotton mill was erected and put into operation by an enterprising and industrious foreigner, in one of the then small villages in Rhode Island. For a long period of time the business was pursued rather as an experiment than otherwise. I lived more than half my days, said Mr. P., within a short distance of cotton manufactories, without ever having seen one. They were visited by most of our citizens from motives of curiosity until within the last fifteen or twenty years. I am authorized to say, by a gentleman who may now be within these walls, that, until 1806-'7, the whole number of spindles in Rhode Island (and there were but few, if any, at that time in any other State) would not exceed 10,000, owned by citizens residing in and about the town of Providence. If, sir, the number has so far increased as to require for manufacture 250,000 bales of cotton, and the increase has been the result of the protection given by the Government to our manufactories, can that protection in good faith be withdrawn, if, by withdrawing it, the manufacturing establishments will be destroyed? Will they be destroyed if this bill becomes a law? I think they will. No institutions reared or sustained by a protection of six and a half and seven cents per square yard, when the same is suddenly reduced to one and a quarter and one cent two mills a square yard, can possibly stand. Sir, the mere apprehension of the passage of this bill has led one individual with whom I have of late conversed, to say that he would to-day sell all his interest in one of the manufactories of Rhode Island at a discount of fifty per cent. upon its costs, and that factory one of the best conducted, and most profitable concerns of the kind in that State.

Mr. Chairman, indulge me while I call your attention to the history of our legislation, and its operation upon the cottons of this country, the inevitable effect of this bill upon them, and the consequences which would follow the destruction of this branch of national industry.

The tariff of 1816 laying a duty of 25 per cent., with a minimum of 25 cents per square yard, or, properly speaking, a specific duty of six and a quarter cents per square yard, was levelled expressly at the India cottons, which cost in India nine cents per yard on the average, and was designed, as it proved to be, prohibitory. Cotton yarns were also valued at 60 cents per pound, and paid 25 per cent. duty. Our manufacturers now make an article two or three times as valuable, and sell it at 25 per cent. less than the cost of those cottons in India. They also, very early after 1816, commenced manufacturing other descriptions of cotton goods, with which we had heretofore been supplied from England, and thus commenced the competition with her, which has continued ever since, and been gradually extended to finer and more valuable kinds of goods, in which they have been aided by the act of 1818, repealing the clause in the act of 1816, which reduced the duty to 20 per cent., to commence in 1819; by the act of 1824, raising the minimum to 30 cents on plain cottons, and 35 cents on colored and prints, and to 75 cents per pound on colored yarn; and by that of 1828, which added five cents more to each minimum on cloth; that of 1832 takes off the addition made in 1828. These duties are prohibitory on all goods of the description of those formerly imported from India, and on some more valuable descriptions, and, of course, a less duty would answer for the manufacture of these, and still be prohibitory. There is such a very great variety of cotton manufactures, differing in appearance and value by such slight shades, it would not be possible to levy different rates of duties on each, without leading to gross frauds, and thus defeating the protection intended to be given. Besides, the great fluctuations in the market, the alternate gluts and scarcities, are such as to require the duties to be much higher than would otherwise be required. Should the specific duty be abandoned, and give place to that provided in the bill, the manufacturers would at once lose their market for all but the coarsest descriptions of cotton goods, and in these would meet with foreign competition to a considerable extent. A coarse and cheap article would be made of Surat and Bengal cotton, which costs but half as much in Liverpool as the Carolina and Georgia cotton, of which our manufacturers make such goods, and our market would be filled with them, as it is well known such goods are made in England of India cotton. Besides, those of our manufacturers who are now making the finer description of goods would have to stop entirely, (of this there is no question,) or turn upon the coarse article, and it is easy to see that a business which, at this moment, does not pay but a limited profit, as I will soon fully show, (and it is believed, I have certainly been so told, many mills have run the past year without making six per cent. on their capital,) would at once be ruined by such accessions to the supply both at home and from abroad; consequently, the whole cotton manufacture of the country would be absolutely ruined by the proposed bill, and the 50 to 60,000,000 dollars invested in it be sunk, and a large proportion of the owners of this capital would become bankrupts. It would fall particularly heavy on many enterprising men of the laboring and mechanical classes, who have invested all the hard earnings of their whole lives in the fixtures necessary to carry on the business; next would come the laboring classes who still work in the cotton mills for the owners. Thus would 125,000 persons, and as many more connected with, and dependent upon them, be turned out of employment; next in the series of victims would be the farmers in the vicinity of the mills, who would lose their market for their productions. The mechanics, tradesmen, merchants, clerks, &c. &c. would follow in the train; in fact, all who are interested in the trade, and all connected with them, and almost all classes in the manufacturing States, thus connected, would be ruined.

The duty under the bill cannot be considered otherwise than twenty per cent. ad valorem; consequently, the range of duties would be, instead of seven and a half cents per square yard, as under the law of 1832, from three-fourths of one cent to two cents per yard. We manufacture but few goods, the like of which would be imported at over two cents duty. The average, as far as there would be any average, would be from one to two cents, which is no protection at all. This is the solemn conviction of the vast majority of cotton manufacturers. Machinery itself is built twenty-five to fifty per cent. cheaper in England than in this country, owing to the price of iron, coal, and labor. Besides, the labor on many kinds of cotton goods is much greater than on woollens, and the price of labor cannot be reduced so low in this country as to enable us to compete with England in this manufacture, except of the very coarsest kinds, without more decided commercial regulations than are contained in this bill.

Another important feature in this bill, and to our manufacturers a very odious one, is, the reduction of the duty on cotton yarn from fifteen cents per pound on unbleached or uncolored, and eighteen and three-fourths cents on colored or bleached, to ten per cent. ad valorem. This reduction would, if possible, more emphatically ruin this business than any other. A pound of No. 20 cotton yarn, I am told, would pay about one and a half cents duty. This would make three and a half yards of cloth, and the duty would be less than half a cent per yard. Under such a duty yarns would be imported on the beam, ready prepared for weaving by power looms, if, indeed, the owner of the looms should be able to weave it, against his Manchester competitor. An intelligent constituent, after reading this bill, in his indignation exclaimed—"the devil was behind the curtain when this bill was draughted, and the manufacturers of Manchester must have been present when it was done, or the duty on yarn would never have been reduced to ten per cent. ad valorem." Many of the cotton mills which manufacture yarn exclusively, are owned by men of small property, mostly mechanics and farmers, who have a small stream of water on their farms, and who have thus been induced to invest all their money in these mills, and to give their principal attention to them. Many of these mills are located in the Middle States, and many more in New England. But at Paterson, in New Jersey, most of the large and valuable mills are employed in making yarns, but all, wherever situated, will shut down their gates on the day this bill passes, and the owners of many, very many, of these become bankrupts; suffering and starvation soon overtake the men, women, and children, employed in them.

I will now say a few words in reply to the allegations frequently made here, that the profits of cotton manufactories are such as would well warrant the Government in withdrawing the protection which has been, ever since 1816, extended to them. I fortunately, said Mr. P., have documents in my hands emanating from the Treasury Department, by which these allegations are disproved; documents for which I am at this time indebted to the courtesy of the public printer. As they have not yet been published and laid upon our desks, before I call the attention of the committee to this testimony, permit me to state a fact furnished by a friend now in this city, the truth of which is susceptible of the clearest proof—that, since the year 1816, the proprietors of twenty-eight of the thirty-six cotton mills on one of the streams of water in Rhode Island have become bankrupts, and the owners of the residue have realized less than five per cent. per annum upon their investments. With this fact before us, who can say that this pursuit has been so profitable as to warrant us in adopting that part of this bill which will withdraw from it the protection it now has, and with which it has too often been found a losing concern? I will now send to the Chair, to be read by the Clerk of the House, the answer of an intelligent and practical man, himself a manufacturer, and well acquainted with all that pertains to the business, and whose statements will be respected wherever, and by all to whom he is known.

Answer of John Whipple, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, to the interrogatories propounded by Mr. Samuel Slater, for the Treasury Department, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, of the 19th of January, 1833.

JAN. 30, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

To the five first questions, I answer, that Ephraim Talbot and myself are the present owners of the Hope mill, in Scituate, in the county of Providence. The fabric manufactured is cotton cloths, and the power is water. It was built in 1806, by a joint stock company, and during the years 1806, '7, and '8, 2,000 spindles were put into operation, and $85,000, in cash, expended. No dividends, or receipts of any kind, were realized until 1821, when the establishment was sold to Mr. Talbot and myself for $21,000; and the outstanding debts of the company being paid, there remained $8,000 to be divided. Simple interest upon the $85,000 will amount to over $70,000. Deduct the $8,000 received, and the balance of loss is $144,000.

Since our ownership, over 50,000 dollars has been expended, and 3,400 spindles set in motion; and if it is admitted that since 1821 there has been a profit of five per cent. as stated by Mr. Talbot, still the question propounded being "the annual rate of profits on the capital invested since the establishment of the manufactory," it will be seen that there has been an almost entire loss of one capital of $85,000, and fourteen years' interest; and what loss or what gain the present owners may realize, depends upon the present value of the establishment, which value is itself, in a great measure, dependent upon the future measures of Government.

Upon this subject of profits, prejudices of an extremely injurious character prevail, to a limited extent, in the Northern and Middle, and, very generally, in the Southern States. The cotton and woollen manufacturers are represented as greedy monopolists, who are not satisfied with fortunes already accumulated, under favor of the Government, and at the expense of other interests, but are still urging additional protection. These representations, made by persons hostile to the American system, are founded partly on vague and general rumor, and partly on the injudicious, and, as I conceive, extravagant statements of some of the manufacturers themselves. In the spring of 1829, a manufacturer of cotton cloths had convinced himself, and endeavored to convince me, that 25 per cent. annual profit had been, and would continue to be, the usual result of that employment. He is a judicious and intelligent man, and of considerable experience in the business; and yet in the succeeding summer he failed, and paid but forty or fifty cents on the dollar. Larger stories even than this had come up to us from Boston, for several years previous to 1829. Actual dividends, it was said, of from 20 to 30 per cent. had been made from year to year, and capital flowed into the cotton business, excited by these and similar statements, to an unprecedented amount. In the summer and fall of 1829, however, it was ascertained, as I am informed and believe, that an actual loss of at least nine millions of dollars was sustained by the city of Boston alone. The experience of past years is wholly disregarded, and again we hear of new millions advanced, and the old stories of 20 per cent. profit sounded larger than ever, and even by some of the manufacturers themselves. I am even told that something like this has been stated by a worthy and intelligent manufacturer, on the floor of Congress.

While such statements proceed from such sources, we ought not to be surprised that some, even of the friends of the tariff, should propose a reduction of duties; nor ought we to complain, should it be ascertained that the twenty-ninth query proposed to the Rhode Island manufacturers embodied the real opinions of some of the advocates of the American system. That query contemplates a reduction of the duties to 12½ per cent. ad valorem, and asks us "if we should be obliged to abandon our business, or should we continue to manufacture at reduced prices?" It presupposes very large profits at present rates, and our ability to live under a very great reduction of them. That and other similar queries probably arose, directly or indirectly, from what I deem the mere vaporings of injudicious and inexperienced men.

Inasmuch, however, as such opinions do prevail to a considerable extent, no counter opinion, unless confirmed by proof of its correctness, can be expected to be listened to. I will therefore first state my opinion of past, and the probable future profits, and the facts on which I rely for its confirmation; and as all such opinions, and even statements of facts, are liable to material errors, I shall make them public previous to forwarding them to the proper department, in order that my misstatements (if any) may be corrected by those in this section of the country who are opposed to us as to the expediency of protective laws, and who, living here, have equal or better means of information.

If by profit is meant the nett gain to the capitalists, all expenses, including interest of money, being deducted, I have no hesitation in saying that, in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, the residence of the owners of more than half the number of the cotton spindles in the country, there has been no profit, but a loss. I feel well assured that four per cent. per annum upon all the capital invested in those two States, added to the original investments, would much exceed all the profits added to the present value of the establishments. I also feel a great confidence in the opinion that the manufacture of cotton is not a business upon which any average rate of interest or profit can be predicated; that the capital invested in it can with no propriety be termed "stock," but that a mill and its appendages approach nearer to a set of tools, their productiveness depending on the skill with which they are used, more than on any thing inherent in the tools themselves.

The Hope mill, in this State, and the Pomfret mill, in Connecticut, (owned in this State,) were erected in the year 1806. The former with a capital of $85,000, and 2,000 spindles; the latter with a capital of $60,000, and 1,000 spindles. They have both been in operation for twenty-six years, manufacturing similar fabrics, and encountering the same markets. The former during most of the time was unskillfully managed, and the latter with as much prudence and forecast as ever mingled in any business. Nearly $150,000 has been lost by the one, and about $300,000 made by the other. This latter mill, as I was assured by an active owner a few days since, has realized an actual profit of ten per cent. per annum, from 1806 down to the present time. It is the general opinion here, that the success of this mill is as much above the other mills in the State, as that of the Hope is below it. I feel very confident that there is no mill in Rhode Island or Massachusetts, the profits of which, for a series of years, will bear any comparison to it. These are extreme cases; but there are a great number of others, in which the variations in the results are so great as to justify the opinion that tools, and not stock, is the appropriate term for a cotton mill; and that we can calculate with the same propriety upon the average rate of interest upon the capital of a grocer or a tailor, without a knowledge of the men, as upon a cotton spinner. The general result of six and twenty years' business justifies this view of the subject. Prudent, cautious, and vigorous men, who have been their own agents, and paid interest for but a small part of their capital, have succeeded; and, to my knowledge, no others have. Even this class of men have in their operations mingled the character of the merchant so largely with that of the manufacturer, that it would be difficult to separate the results.

I believe that all those who thought they were making considerable profits, and who operated upon borrowed capitals, have failed; and that the number of those who, since 1806, have either wholly failed, or retired from the business, with heavy losses, is nearly if not quite equal to those who have succeeded.

The difficulty, then, of predicating any rate of interest upon a business depending for its success so much on personal qualifications, will at once be seen.

If the present owners of cotton mills in Rhode Island would be at the pains of ascertaining from their books the immense losses which the previous owners of many of their establishments have sustained, it is possible that something like an average profit might be arrived at. But this will not be done; and I shall, therefore, submit a test which may give us a more general, and, I think, a fairer view of the business.

By the report of the committee of the recent New York Convention, it appears that the whole number of spindles in the United States is 1,246,000. The number in Rhode Island is 235,000, owned wholly by inhabitants of Rhode Island. The number in Massachusetts is 339,000, but 100,000 of that number is owned by citizens of Rhode Island. In Connecticut, over 50,000 more belong to this State. The whole number, therefore, owned in Rhode Island, is 400,000; nearly one-third of the aggregate number in the United States.

The business commenced in this State in 1790. From 1790 up to 1806, the increase of spindles was but 5,000. From 1806 up to October, 1815, the number increased to 132,000; and in 1827, there were within thirty miles of the town of Providence, owned almost entirely by inhabitants of this State, 317,538. Seven-eighths of the owners of one-third of all the cotton spindles in the United States live within fifteen miles of this town. With most of them I am personally acquainted. With very few exceptions, they personally superintend their mills, and the various business connected with them; and if twenty and thirty years' experience, united with uncommon vigilance and industry, give promise of success, the Rhode Island mill owners have had ample grounds at least to hope for it.

The result of the experiment here, from 1806 down to 1832, ought to be admitted as a fair test of the productiveness of cotton spinning. What is the fact known to every business man in the community? It is this: that at the period immediately succeeding the termination of the war in 1815, one-half of the manufacturers failed. I have before me papers containing the names of the mills, of their owners, and the number of spindles, in 1806, 1815, 1820, and 1827. Having been in the practice of the law from 1804 to the present time, and somewhat conversant with business men, some means of information have been afforded me; and I fully believe that the number who have failed, or retired with heavy losses, equals those who have survived. My papers and other means of information are open to examination, if it is thought the estimate is too large.

But the survivors are here, and, among them, who has grown rich by the manufacture of cotton fabrics? Three gentlemen who commenced in 1790, partly by commercial speculations, but principally by cotton mills, have made their fortunes. One other, who, I believe, began as early as 1804 or '5, and who would thrive in whatever business and whatever portion of time or space you place him, is also rich.

Here, then, are four men, and only four, who have enriched themselves by this employment. If other fortunes have been made, they have also been concealed. They have been kept from my knowledge, and the knowledge of those who mingle with them in the daily business of life. Let this business be compared with any other in which equal capital has been expended, and I am much mistaken if, during the same period, much larger results have not been produced. Or let any one be at the pains of calculating four per cent. interest annually upon all capital expended in Rhode Island, from 1806 down to the present time, and I am equally mistaken if the original sums would not exceed the value of all the mills, with profits added, now owned in the State of Rhode Island.

In Massachusetts, it is well known that millions of dollars have been sunk. No one with whom I have conversed, has ever pretended that our neighbors are as well off as ourselves. These two States, it will be remembered, contain the owners of more than one-half of all the spindles in the country; and without pretending to know the result of the operations in other States, I think I may safely affirm that all the mills owned in both States, sold at what similar mills may now be built for, and profits added, would not produce a sum equal to the original expenditures.

The causes of this result are numerous. For several of the first years, machinery was excessively dear and excessively poor. The early adventurers added their profits to the extension of their establishments, and the great fall in the prices of machinery in 1816, '17, and '18, added to the wear and tear, almost equalled, up to that period, a total loss of the first cost and intervening profits. The hope of large incomes attracted unskillful men into the business, and the current opinion, as prevalent then as now, that 20 per cent. income was one of the ordinary results of a cotton mill, led to a total disregard of economy. New inventions required large expenditures for new machines; and the gradual decline of prices of the fabric itself aided the downward pressure upon the manufacturer.

The most active among all the causes which have hitherto frustrated the hopes of the manufacturer, has been the gradual decline of the prices of machinery. It was this which caused most of the failures in 1829, and it is this which will produce future embarrassments, not now anticipated, by men who are lavishly advancing princely fortunes in this precarious business. It appears to me that one moment's reflection would check the ardor and zeal with which these investments are making. Machinery is of itself an article of manufacture, and the prices now paid are, upon a moderate computation, fifty per cent. higher than English prices for similar machines.

Recent importations have been made of English machinery under a charge of 55 per cent. on the original cost, and still the English article, so imported, costs 30 per cent. less than the American. There has been less domestic competition in that than in cotton cloths, but the price has been declining, and will continue to decline, until it approaches as near the original cost in England, as coarse American cotton cloths have approached similar English fabrics.

Suppose this period to be five or ten years distant. One hundred thousand dollars is expended in eighteen hundred and thirty-two, upon machinery for a cotton mill; that five years hence the same machinery will be built for 50 per cent. less, and the ordinary wear to be 25 per cent. more. Here then is a loss of 75 per cent. of the capital in five years. If the period of decline is protracted for ten years, the deterioration by wear is increased, but the chance of balancing the evil by increased profits is doubled. The period at which this minimum price must be encountered, is uncertain; but if all experience is not deceptive, it must be met at some period or other, and, until it does arrive, the capitalist will have to contend with it. From 1806 down to the present time, the history of this branch of American industry fully evinces the activity and power of this counter current, and the sore disappointments it has never failed to lay at the door of the sanguine and credulous capitalists. The manufacturer who begins with small investments, transacts his own business, pays no salaries and no interest for money, may calculate upon returns adequate to the active agencies constantly at work against him. But the period is fast approaching when capitalists will become convinced that gentlemen manufacturers, like gentlemen farmers, may expect every thing else except six per cent. from their investments.

According to my views of the protective system, one of its original objects was to lessen the profits of this branch of industry, and thereby drive the capitalist out of the business. Its great and leading object was to aid the farmer by sustaining the prices of his product, and to furnish materials for commerce. The encouragement of manufactures was no part of the object of the tariff laws, but a mere means by which the prices of agriculture might be kept up, and the prices of manufactured articles brought down. In a legislative view, neither the number nor wealth of the manufacturers was sufficiently large to deserve attention. Compared to the great interests of agriculture, they were, in 1816, as a drop in the ocean. Congress were then convinced that the great interests of agriculture stood in need of a market at home; and the only means which human ingenuity has yet discovered, are to lessen the producers and increase the consumers. The less profit the capitalists realize the better, provided the business goes on. One of the most beneficial effects of the protective system is that it is constantly diminishing the necessity and the profit of large capitals, by bringing in competition with it the ingenuity, skill, and enterprise of men of slender means. Such men, aided by a few years more of protection, will take the business as exclusively into their own hands as are other branches of the mechanic arts.

According to my view of the subject, the great question which is involved in the hypothetical reduction of duties to 12½ per cent. ad valorem, is, what will become of the farmer, the artisan, the ingenious man, a whole generation of whom have grown up since the adoption of the system in 1816, and, under the faith of the continuance of that system, moulded themselves to these employments? Cotton to the amount of about 2,000,000 dollars is annually imported into Providence, and manufactured into cloth, which sells for about 7,000,000 dollars. Although, as I have attempted to show, the capitalists receive but a mere pittance of the latter sum, yet the people of Rhode Island, the farmer, the artisan, the mechanic, the laborer, &c. divide among them the 5,000,000 dollars. From them it goes to the producer of flour, corn, lumber, coal, iron, and all the variety of products of the Middle and Eastern States. This equal diffusion of wealth among all classes of society, and over the whole country, is the distinguishing characteristic of manufacturing industry. Lower the present rate of duty, and expose us to the irruption of English fabrics, and our mills must stop, unless our artisans will work at half their present wages. In that event they will consume less of the productions of the Middle and other States. Should the business continue at all, the capitalist will fare as well as he now does. The whole pressure would fall upon the laborer and the producer. A gradual and progressive reduction of duty would tend to a gradual reduction of wages and consumption.

A sudden reduction would stop wages, and stop all consumption of the products of other States, leaving our mechanics and artisans the alternative of emigrating to, and cultivating the cheap and rich soils of the Western States, or of forcing a scanty subsistence from the hard and unyielding hills of New England. Many laborious and worthy men, by years of industry, have become part owners of some of the various branches of the manufacturing business. Their principal capital is their industry. Such could not survive the shock, for no one can doubt that a sudden reduction would suspend all operations for a few years at least; what little property they possess would sink so low that they never could revive again. The capitalist, on the contrary, after necessity had forced down the price of wages to the English standard, might renew his efforts under still more auspicious prospects than now exist, for the only obstacle now in his path, the high rate of wages, would be removed, and society would then become what it is now in England, composed of the few immensely rich, and the many immensely poor. A gradual or a sudden reduction of the duties, therefore, would ultimate either in a permanent overthrow of the business itself, or in such diminution of wages as would enable us to manufacture at English prices. Put the question in whatever shape we can, it must result in a diminution of wages, and of the prices of the product of the farmer.

It may be asked, if the American fabric, in case of the reduction of the duties, cannot be afforded at English prices, unless we pinch the laboring classes, by lowering wages, how can they be afforded at those prices if the duty remains, without the same diminution of wages? How can the fabric be made cheaper than it now is, unless the cost of production is lessened, and, in order to lessen the cost of production, must we not lessen the profit of the manufacturer, or the wages which we pay to the various persons employed by him? and it may also be asked, what has the tariff to do with the cost of production?

I answer, that the great object of the tariff is to lessen the price of the manufactured article, without diminishing the rate of wages; that to a considerable extent it has already been accomplished, and that time and permanent and steady legislation are alone wanting to complete it. If the price of wages is forced down to a bare subsistence, there will be no difficulties in the way. The whole system may then be safely abandoned, for the poorer classes must work or starve. But, in a legislative view, the working classes of society ought to be prominent objects of attention. It is important that prices should be low, but it is quite as important that the laborer should be so well paid that he may command an equal share of the comforts of life.

The tariff laws were made in order that all working men, the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and the various other persons who depend on their industry for support, might enjoy their full and equal share of the comforts of life. The great object was to keep up the product of the farmer, and the wages of all the other classes. The profits of the capitalist no one regarded, unless so far as connected with other interests. There is no danger but that moneyed men will take care of themselves. Nearly all the capitalists in New England were opposed to the protective system, and the operation and effect of that system will be to drive the capitalist out of the business. At present the wealth of Boston is opening its veins, and running freely into cotton mills. This is as it should be. Capitalists are building them, and at a future day their agents and overseers will own them, and this latter class are the only men who will thrive. The business of manufacturing cotton is already assuming that shape in Rhode Island. The capitalist is becoming the owner of the privilege, buildings, and other fixtures, in order to rent them to the operator. This latter hires his machinery, or makes it himself; and although he pays the same wages that are paid at mills owned and operated by men who do not work in them themselves, yet he can afford his cloth from ten to fifteen per cent. cheaper. The object, then, and the direct tendency of the tariff is to keep up the price of wages, thereby encouraging the operator, so that eventually he may be the sole manager of the business. When that period arrives, which is at hand, our other advantages over England are such, that, without any reduction of wages, we can produce the fabric quite as cheap as the Manchester prices. When gentlemen who ride in coaches shed their character of cotton spinners, the victory of the tariff will be completed, and not until then.

The Tariff Bill.

My clear and decided opinion, then, is, that not a line or a letter of the tariff laws ought to be touched; that every yard of English goods brought into the country, which we possess the means of manufacturing, is, pro tanto, a tax upon the farmer, and the entire class of the working men of the nation; and that their interest ought not ever to be brought into danger by the threats of disunion; which, for the purpose of intimidation, Southern politicians are daily heaping upon us. If the planters of South Carolina, who reap the fruits of this fructifying system more abundantly than the abused capitalist of the North, will blindly persevere in attributing to the tariff consequences which flow directly from their climate, population, exhausted lands, and, more than all the rest, their aversion to labor; if a small minority of this great family, who will not work, are upon this subject to dictate terms to those who do, they will expect to dictate upon all other subjects and all other occasions; and however painful even the thought of a separation may be, I for one had rather submit to it than to the humiliating spectacle of the whole farming and laboring classes of this extended empire ground down to a beggared poverty by English and Scotch speculators in foreign goods.

Respectfully, &c.

JOHN WHIPPLE.

PROVIDENCE, 16th March, 1832.

[While the Clerk was reading the foregoing paper, Mr. Root, of New York, rose to a question of order, whether it was competent for a member to read, or cause to be read, a written or printed speech; for certainly what the Clerk was reading must be taken as a part of the gentleman's speech.]

The CHAIR decided that it was the undoubted right of the gentleman from Rhode Island to send to the Clerk any statement or testimony which he might be anxious to have read.

Mr. Root replied, that in the English House of Lords the members could vote by proxy, but he never knew before that it was in order for a member here to make a speech by proxy.]

Mr. P. resumed. I have no disposition to break a lance with the gentleman from New York. I have hitherto had a great share of respect for him. I shall endeavor to continue that respect, but he ought to be the last man in this House to blame me for doing what has uniformly been done by every member who has addressed the committee. I hope I shall not be so unfortunate with my speech as that gentleman was with his a few days ago—one day he made a speech in favor of nullification and secession, and spent the whole of the next in explaining it away and taking it back. Not content with this course, he afterwards had recourse to one of the newspapers of the city, to publish an addendum to his work of two days. One day, Mr. Chairman, he planted his ruta baga, which he found very necessary the next day to dig up. At the end of his first day's labor, one of the most distinguished nullifiers in the House pronounced his speech to be "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," but in reply, it was quaintly said "that it was such a voice as ought to be confined to the wilderness, and ought not to be heeded by man in a state of civilization." But a truce with the gentleman from New York.

I have further testimony, Mr. Chairman, from a source not less respectable, to show that these establishments have not been so profitable as they have been represented.

[Here Mr. P. read and commented on the following answers to queries from the Treasury Department, made by the agent and one of the proprietors of the Crompton mills factory, in Warwick, Rhode Island.]

"There is no such distinction between capital borrowed and not borrowed, as contemplated by the question. The original owners invested a capital of 80,000 dollars, made some dividends while they continued the business, but the concern was closed at their failure, with a loss of about 40,000 dollars. The rent received during the next seven years was little more than nominal. The present owners have realized an average of seven and three-fourths per cent. for interest of money, insurance, and all hazards. This is the rate of profit upon the capital employed from year to year. This capital consists of the amount paid in 1823, and since, together with the annual profits since, which have been added to the fixed and floating capital. Were the interest cast on the money actually paid in, aside from these profits and new investments, at the above rate of seven and three-fourths per cent. (though this is too low to cover the hazard of the business,) and then the establishment sold for cash, which is perhaps the proper mode, there might or might not be a surplus to divide, after reimbursing the capital. This would depend upon the circumstances under which the sale was made. Were the season a prosperous one, and were there a measurable certainty that the legislation of Government would not set every thing afloat, and effect a sudden and entire change in the value of the property, the result might be favorable. Were these two leading circumstances reversed, and the sale made in such a season as 1829, when our most judicious and experienced men deemed 'there was no intrinsic value in a cotton mill,' or should the proposed reduction be made in the duties on imports, the establishment would not sell for any considerable proportion of the money actually invested. It is believed that many manufacturers, in calculating their profits and losses, do not pursue the above mode, which appears the only correct or safe one. There are many causes, aside from the revolutions in trade, and the great uncertainty as to what legislative measures may be adopted upon the subject, and the latter have a very powerful and injurious influence, which are constantly operating to lessen the value of a cotton manufactory from the moment it is erected. The depreciation by wear and tear, and that caused by a decline in the prices of machinery, are both very great; but the improvements, or alterations at least, constantly making in machinery, which cause vast sums to be expended for new machines in place of old ones, which are thrown aside, are a still more powerful cause. It is notorious that different machines and operators, of equal advantages and skill, are very apt to differ in opinion about different machines and their utility; in short, there is nothing fixed or certain in the business, except the fact that money invested in a cotton mill can seldom or never be reclaimed. And to render the business profitable and safe, or as much so as many other branches of business, I have sometimes thought it ought to be, though it is far from being, like a West India plantation, and produce as much in a few successful years as the estimated value of the establishment, to guard against the many disastrous seasons, the many uncertainties that attend the trade.

"The alternate gluts and scarcities, already alluded to, have so much influence upon the markets as to render it difficult to answer this question. Were the importers and foreign manufacturers required to guaranty that they would not sell any goods in our market at a loss, we would readily assent to a material reduction in the duties; but the present mode of pouring upon us such excessive quantities of surplus goods of refuse stocks, in short, of goods which must be sold, at whatever loss, (which is, probably, in many instances, made up by the profits of their regular trade at home, and in other channels, in which it would be ruinous to put down the prices, as they do frequently in this country,) requires the duties to be much higher, in order for the American manufacturer to carry on his business with any degree of safety. Were the tariff repealed, and our market regained by the British, as it would be in that event, they would, in all probability, be more cautious how they glut it; they would regulate it as they do other markets under their control, and it cannot be doubted but they would be able to advance prices very materially, and very soon. The destruction of the home competition would but add greatly to the evil. As to the question of 'moderate protection,' upon the expediency of which the commissioner's views are solicited by the Government, in order to decide it, it seems only necessary to inquire, what is the object of the protective system? It may readily be answered: to give employment and remuneration to home industry. But is there not another object closely connected with this, viz. furnishing the consumers, the whole people of the United States, with manufactures as cheap, or cheaper, taking into consideration the increased ability which it imparts to purchase, as those imported from abroad? How is this double object to be attained? Is it by providing that half way, 'moderate' protection, which does not absolutely destroy our manufactures, but merely suffers them to live a sickly, lingering existence, inviting, at the same time, foreign manufacturers to send their wares here, so that both may struggle for the mastery in our markets, and each alternately prevail, perhaps, as extrinsic circumstances favor one or the other? Or is it to be obtained by affording, at once, a full and adequate protection, such as will at once establish manufactures at home on an extensive scale? I appeal to past experience to decide which of these systems is best fitted to attain the avowed objects of both, confident that it will be found that each article of our manufacture that has been completely protected, and been established a reasonable time, has fully realized the objects in view, and declined in price much more than those articles which have only been moderately protected."

"Ask the farmer what he would do with his land were he denied the privilege of cultivating it; or, what is the same thing, were he deprived of a market for the sale of his produce. Ask the shipowner what he would do with his ship were there no merchandise to transport from port to port. In the event supposed, I should have no capital to employ in any other business. Capital invested in manufactures cannot be transferred into any other business, in the supposed case, because it cannot be transmuted into gold and silver again. A cotton mill is of no more use, except to manufacture cotton cloth, than land to lie unimproved, or a ship to rot at the wharf. If I could not carry on my establishment, no one could; no one, therefore, would buy it, and it would sink into ruin."

"Were the duties thus reduced, it is probable the manufacture of the very coarsest cotton goods might be carried on, notwithstanding the competition which would probably take place with an imported article of similar appearance, but made of inferior stock, and much less durable. I do not think that any other fabric could withstand the foreign competition; and it is well known, that by far the heaviest capital, and most expensive machinery, and greatest skill, are now employed in the finer manufactures. It is difficult to say what employments would remain to be successfully followed after such a deplorable change in the affairs of the country. As a single individual, having been a lawyer by profession, I could could doubtless find employment in such a state of things. My partner, too, being an extensive merchant, might continue to follow his present pursuit. But it is easy to foresee what would be the result of so many rushing into commerce as would do so. But what would become of the four hundred women and children employed by us, and the numerous families dependent upon them? They could obtain no other employment; many would be driven back to the cities and towns whence they came, and there pine in poverty and want, as they did before they removed to the factories, and be exposed to all the temptations of vice and crime. Others would go back to their native sandy capes of New England, and live on fish, but deprived of the many comforts they now enjoy, and especially of the schools we have established for their use. Some, indeed, being children of farmers in the immediate neighborhood, might return to their parents and friends, and share with them those means which might remain after the loss of the great and excellent market for their produce, thus doubling the evil to them.

"In order to judge, in fact, of the propriety of the proposed reduction, (which I consider tantamount to a repeal of the tariff,) it is only necessary to look at the direct and immediate consequences which must ensue, particularly in this section of the country, viz. nearly the total destruction of the immense capital employed in the manufacture of cotton and wool, and the bankruptcy of most of the numerous proprietors of these works; the very great number of laborers and artisans employed in them would either be left without employment, and destitute, or thrown upon agriculture, which, losing its home and only market by the same blow, could not sustain the shock, but must be ruined also; the coasting trade, now so unprecedentedly flourishing by means of the prosperous state of domestic industry, would be very nearly destroyed; internal trade, in all its thousand ramifications, would languish; and foreign navigation, so much of which is now employed in carrying abroad our manufactures, and bringing home various materials used in them, would be confined to exporting that portion of our agricultural products which are admitted by the high tariffs of the rest of the world, and to importing what foreign articles we could pay for, and not be benefited by the change.

"The population of the Eastern States would be obliged to emigrate to the West, which is already in want of a market for many of her valuable productions, and these greatly aggravate the evils of over production; the agricultural products of the Middle, Western, and Southern States, of which we now consume such quantities, would be greatly diminished in value; the country would be inundated with foreign manufactures, and exhausted of all its specie to pay for them in a very short time. Thus should we become bankrupt, both as a nation and as individuals, and reduced to the greatest poverty and distress."

"Suppose the article a common 4-4 brown sheeting, it would be worth about 8½ cents, or the amount of the present duty; an equivalent ad valorem duty would be then 100 per cent.; were the article a cambric print, worth 35 cents the square yard, the duty should be 25 per cent. It is obvious that no rate of ad valorem duty could be "equivalent to the present with the minimum," because that is a per centage on the value, and the present is tantamount to a specific duty; the per centage, but not the amount of duty, varying with the value of the article. The present duty is prohibitory of the first article above mentioned, and might with propriety be reduced in relation to it, were it not for the frauds which would be practised the moment a distinction were attempted between different kinds of goods, whether by a valuation, a division into coarse and fine, or in any other mode; and, therefore, it seems most advisable to retain the high duty upon the low priced article, especially as it does no harm more than one would of half the amount; it is never paid, and is merely nominal. This point was considered by the manufacturers in 1828, when an addition was desired (which was made by Congress) to the minimum, in order to reach the finer and more valuable description of goods. Instead of attempting any definition of such goods, it was unanimously agreed that raising the minimum would be the preferable mode, and that this would have no effect upon the coarse descriptions, which were already prohibited.

"I consider the minimum valuation the best part of the system, and that alone which has almost wholly prevented

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

frauds in articles of cotton manufacture, such as have been so extensively practised in woollens. It is unfortunately sometimes misunderstood, as intended to indicate the actual value of the article embraced in it. It has been stated, even on the floor of Congress, that when the minimum of 25 cents per square yard was established by the tariff of 1816, that was the actual value of the article referred to; whereas, by a reference to the proceedings of Congress at the time, it will appear that the tariff was established almost exclusively with reference to India cottons, the average value of which was 9 cents per yard. The duty being 25 per cent. on 25 cents, or 6½ cents, was consequently 70 per cent.

"It has been the object of subsequent tariffs to embrace other goods from 9 to 35 cents; as they can have none but a prohibitory effect, except upon articles say from 15 to 35 cents, if we suppose the average value of cottons imported is between these sums, say 25 cents, the really effective per centage of duty paid is considerably less now than it was in 1816, upon the articles intended to be embraced by the tariff of that year. It is, in fact, but 35 instead of 70 per cent.

"Such have been the frauds practised in woollens, by attempting to regulate the duties by the cost of them in the country whence imported, it is presumed it is not contemplated to apply this mode to cotton manufactures. But the mode suggested by the question is believed to be liable to as great or greater objections. In the first place, it would be extremely difficult to find suitable appraisers; in order to ensure the requisite skill and information, they must be selected from those merchants engaged in the trade of importing, or, at least, in that of buying and selling here; and if so, however skilful and experienced, as well as respectable they may be, they would be too much interested in the subject to make, in all cases, a correct appraisal. In fact, they would have it in their power to set the tone to the whole market; and however honest and well-intentioned men may be, human nature cannot bear such temptations.

"But a still more important objection is the fluctuations in prices, which are well known to be much greater in our own markets than those from which we import manufactured goods; because the high and prohibitory tariffs of those nations exclude foreign fabrics, while our system, as much as it is complained of, still allows our markets to be the receptacle of manufactured goods from all countries, and to be frequently glutted with them. Hence, the duties would be subject to perpetual and very material variations; and, what is of yet greater importance, they would be lowest, and the protection to our manufactures the least, when they need it the most, because their own goods are selling at the lowest rates, thus doubling to them the evil of reduced prices; while the foreign manufacturer would find the same evil lessened to him instead of increased, because the lower the value of his goods, the less duties he would have to pay; thus giving to foreign an advantage over domestic industry, instead of the reverse, which sound policy, or at least the principle of the protective system, dictates. Were this mode of levying the duties in operation at the present time, when it is well known all kinds of manufactured goods have greatly declined from last year's prices, and many domestic as well as foreign fabrics are selling at great sacrifices, how could we withstand such a discrimination in favor of the foreign manufacturer? Many would be ruined by it, and all would suffer irretrievably. There are many other objections to the ad valorem system, but it is believed the foregoing are sufficient to show that the adoption of it would be ruinous to our manufactures, and little better than a total repeal of the tariff."

nufactures need no further protection than this bill gives, because cotton goods are exported already. This is true, but not to much extent, and none but the heaviest and coarsest goods are exported on which more stock and less labor are bestowed, and such as have not been made in England to a very great extent. The business of exporting cotton goods is rather a chance business, ventured upon occasionally by our merchants who are the most enterprising in the world, who drive their commerce into every port that is open to them, and who export cotton goods as a remittance or an adventure, sometimes making a profit and as often losing. The exportation of these goods is by no means a regular business. Those merchants who have tried it the longest have lost by it and given it up. What business, Mr. Chairman, is so desperate as not to be sometimes hazarded by some?

I have already stated the probable amount invested in cotton manufactories in Rhode Island, and now have the returns of the number of the cotton and other manufactories in Rhode Island, from the Treasury Department. Gentlemen need not be alarmed, for I shall not read the paper which I have now in my hand, but will only call the attention of the committee to an abstract of these returns, from which will be learnt that there are in Rhode Island 119 cotton mills, 238,877 spindles, number of men employed 1,744, women 3,301, children 3,550, whose aggregate wages amount to $1,214,515. Shall these men, women, and children, be thrown out of their employment, and turned beggars upon the world, by our legislation? They will then be fit for treason, stratagems, and spoil; yes, sir, and nullification too. Will they, sir, submit to such a state of things as the passage of this bill will produce? We do not deal in menaces or gasconade, to the extent indulged in by some portions of this Union. We are slow to anger. A vertical sun has not to the same degree warmed our blood, or caused it to course so quickly through our veins; but, sir, the same causes will produce the same effects here they have produced in other countries. The cries of the poor and laboring classes for bread will be heard, and must be heeded; the fires of Nottingham, Bristol, and Manchester, may be transferred to this now happy land.

It will be seen, from the abstract I have exhibited, that about 7,000 women and children are usefully and profitably employed in these institutions. And let it not be understood, as I have heard it insinuated on this floor, that they are the white slaves of those who employ them. Sir, the reverse is nearer the truth. I have seen a female, who, before she was twenty years of age, by her edict, stopped every mill in one of the most flourishing manufacturing villages in Rhode Island. She was called the Hancock of Pawtucket, because she was as annoying to the mill-owners in that village, because they were as much in dread of her influence and power, as the British Government ever was of the influence of John Hancock, or Samuel Adams. Like them, too, she was not included in the general amnesty promulgated for the benefit of her followers, but was finally hired to leave those who seemed to be controlled by her influence. Sir, rather than submit to the evils of this bill, she would head an army of her own sex to nullify obnoxious laws, or meet those who are opposed to wholesome regulations. The operations of the American system are altogether in favor of the poor and laboring classes of our community. Every tariff we have passed might with great propriety be denominated the poor man's protection.

Mr. P. proceeded to a comparison of the great and leading interests of the nation. From papers before me, said he, I am authorized to state that the tonnage of the United States, registered and enrolled, is about 2,000,000 tons; which, estimated at 30 dollars per ton, would be $60,000,000. This is supposed to employ no less than 80,000 seamen, which, at 10 dollars wages per month, is $9,600,000 per annum. The cotton manufacture, including the manufacture of machinery, bleacheries, and print works, was, in 1831, ascertained to be $44,914,934, (since considerably augmented,) and at that time gave employment to labor within their own works and factories, equal to $12,155,723 per annum. From this, it appears that the wages in the manufacture of cotton and machinery, bleacheries and printing, exceed the whole amount of wages for manning our whole commercial marine in the foreign and domestic trade. The Government has, with the most politic and liberal care, protected this branch of our industry, and given to our own citizens the entire monopoly of the coasting trade.

[Here Mr. P. was called to order by Mr. JEFFERSON, of Maryland, on the ground that a member had not a right to read his own speech, or the speech of another.]

Mr. P. replied that he was doing neither, but was referring only to his own notes.

The CHAIR decided Mr. P. was in order.

Mr. JEFFERSON then read from Jefferson's Manual to prove the correctness of his positions.]

Mr. P. was permitted to proceed. I regret, said he, that the gentleman from Maryland has gone off half cocked. I regret these interruptions, as they will necessarily tend to protract my remarks.

The cry of "question" becoming now loud, Mr. P. said, When, in the cry of "question," I hear the knell of my country's ruin, as was once said by a celebrated English statesman, I will not yield the floor; as the very few minutes more which I intend to speak, may, for that time, at least, keep off the ruin with which we are threatened. Now, Mr. Chairman, why and wherefore are we required to pass this bill? To appease, as I am led to believe, the State of South Carolina, entail ruin on all those States which have ever been obedient, to quiet one that for a long time has been refractory, and liberal in threats of nullification, secession, disunion, and civil war. Sir, is this the way to conciliate and secure the affections of that portion of the country from which I come? Punish them, because South Carolina, who well deserves punishment, requires it! Let gentlemen beware, lest, in avoiding the rock, we are swallowed up in the whirlpool, which ought as sedulously to be avoided. Yes, sir; New England, which complies with all your requisitions, violates no law, seldom exercises the privilege of complaining, is to be turned over to the beggarly elements, while South Carolina is to be invited to the richest feast which the nation can provide for her! This, I suppose, is substantial justice, retributive justice, commutative justice. Sir, our evils and sufferings will be greatly aggravated by the reflection that South Carolina mainly contributed to fasten upon us that very system of which she now so loudly complains. It was resisted by the people whom I represent, until resistance was found to be altogether useless. They had, at the time of the commencement of the restrictive measures which led to the creation of our prevailing policy, other pursuits and more profitable ones than those which they now have.

Sir, I am old enough to recollect the effect of the sudden change in our policy. I knew men whose property at that time was principally in navigation, who had a right to believe themselves rich and independent, who have gone down to the grave poor and penniless. Some there are who are still living, and now lingering out an existence by no means desirable, in poverty and want. Sir, are we always to be thus the sport of the measures and legislation of the Government? Let it not be left to them to say, our Government is as treacherous as the sea, and as unstable as the waves of the ocean.

I have much more to say, said Mr. P.; but having already occupied too much of the valuable time of this committee, I must now yield the floor, thanking gentlemen for their very patient attention.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, the committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

MASSACHUSETTS RESOLUTION.

The motion of Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, to reconsider the vote of the House by which a memorial from the Legislature of Massachusetts, on the subject of the bill to alter the tariff, had been referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed, so far as related to a report therein contained from a committee of that Legislature was concerned, coming up for consideration;

Mr. WILDE rose, and read from the document in question an extract from the preamble to the resolutions; which part of the preamble, he said, imputed to the Committee of Ways and Means that their real object in reporting this bill was different from their professed and ostensible one. Mr. W. said he would not be understood as expressing or feeling either mortification or surprise at this formal impeachment of the motives of his associates and himself. The language of the preamble was not certainly such as legislative bodies, in their solemn public acts, had been accustomed to use or hear. Perhaps it was altogether such as deliberative assemblies had heretofore considered worthy of their dignity and gravity. Every public body, however, said Mr. W., must be presumed to know the tone which it best becomes them to adopt, and in that most delicate task of nicely adapting the shades of language to the tints of character: far be it from me to question any judgment which the liberal and enlightened Legislature of the State of Massachusetts may think proper to pronounce upon itself. With that I do not meddle. My business is with the judgment which it has pleased the Legislature to pass upon myself and my associates. In the justice of this judgment, it is hardly to be expected that I should acquiesce. I will examine neither its courtesy nor candor. It may be all true, and it may be the pleasure of this House to confirm by its votes the high authority of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts. With all this, said Mr. W., I have nothing to do. Whether the majority of this House will or will not unite with the Legislature of Massachusetts in pronouncing the conduct of their committee disreputable and deceitful, it becomes me not to conjecture. I cannot admit the fact to be so, and I ask of the courtesy of gentlemen permission to record my vote against it. I hope the question may not be discussed. I have no disposition to be thought improperly sensitive or fastidious; none to get at new causes of angry controversy, new occasions for heats and jealousies. This House can surely proceed, without debate, to do an act of simple justice. I ask that the vote referring this preamble, and ordering it to be printed, may be reconsidered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said he wished to offer a word or two in reply to what had fallen from the gentleman from Georgia. The Legislature of Massachusetts, feeling that the question of a reduction of protecting duties involved matter of great importance to the people of that State, had referred that subject with other matters to a joint committee of members of both Houses: that committee had made a report in part, so far as related to the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to this House: that report had been acted on by the Legislature, certain resolves had been passed in consequence, and the whole had been forwarded to each of the representatives of the State of Massachusetts on this floor. One of his colleagues [Mr. ADAMS] had felt it his duty to present a copy of these papers to the House, and had moved that they be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and printed: that motion had prevailed. But now, a motion was made by the gentleman from Georgia to reconsider that vote, so far as the frauds in articles of cotton manufacture, such as have been so extensively practised in woollens. It is unfortunately sometimes misunderstood, as intended to indicate the actual value of the article embraced in it. It has been stated, even on the floor of Congress, that when the minimum of 25 cents per square yard was established by the tariff of 1816, that was the actual value of the article referred to; whereas, by a reference to the proceedings of Congress at the time, it will appear that the tariff was established almost exclusively with reference to India cottons, the average value of which was 9 cents per yard. The duty being 25 per cent. on 25 cents, or 64 cents, was consequently 70 per cent.

"It has been the object of subsequent tariffs to embrace other goods from 9 to 35 cents; as they can have none but a prohibitory effect, except upon articles say from 15 to 35 cents, if we suppose the average value of cottons imported is between these sums, say 25 cents, the really effective per centage of duty paid is considerably less now than it was in 1816, upon the articles intended to be embraced by the tariff of that year. It is, in fact, but 35 instead of 70 per cent.

"Such have been the frauds practised in woollens, by attempting to regulate the duties by the cost of them in the country whence imported, it is presumed it is not contemplated to apply this mode to cotton manufactures. But the mode suggested by the question is believed to be liable to as great or greater objections. In the first place, it would be extremely difficult to find suitable appraisers; in order to ensure the requisite skill and information, they must be selected from those merchants engaged in the trade of importing, or, at least, in that of buying and selling here; and if so, however skillful and experienced, as well as respectable they may be, they would be too much interested in the subject to make, in all cases, a correct appraisal. In fact, they would have it in their power to set the tone to the whole market; and however honest and well-intentioned men may be, human nature cannot bear such temptations.

"But a still more important objection is the fluctuations in prices, which are well known to be much greater in our own markets than those from which we import manufactured goods; because the high and prohibitory tariffs of those nations exclude foreign fabrics, while our system, as much as it is complained of, still allows our markets to be the receptacle of manufactured goods from all countries, and to be frequently glutted with them. Hence, the duties would be subject to perpetual and very material variations; and, what is of yet greater importance, they would be lowest, and the protection to our manufactures the least, when they need it the most, because their own goods are selling at the lowest rates, thus doubling to them the evil of reduced prices; while the foreign manufacturer would find the same evil lessened to him instead of increased, because the lower the value of his goods, the less duties he would have to pay; thus giving to foreign an advantage over domestic industry, instead of the reverse, which sound policy, or at least the principle of the protective system, dictates. Were this mode of levying the duties in operation at the present time, when it is well known all kinds of manufactured goods have greatly declined from last year's prices, and many domestic as well as foreign fabrics are selling at great sacrifices, how could we withstand such a discrimination in favor of the foreign manufacturer? Many would be ruined by it, and all would suffer irremediably. There are many other objections to the ad valorem system, but it is believed the foregoing are sufficient to show that the adoption of it would be ruinous to our manufactures, and little better than a total repeal of the tariff."

nufactures need no further protection than this bill gives, because cotton goods are exported already. This is true, but not to much extent, and none but the heaviest and coarsest goods are exported on which more stock and less labor are bestowed, and such as have not been made in England to a very great extent. The business of exporting cotton goods is rather a chance business, ventured upon occasionally by our merchants who are the most enterprising in the world, who drive their commerce into every port that is open to them, and who export cotton goods as a remittance or an adventure, sometimes making a profit and as often losing. The exportation of these goods is by no means a regular business. Those merchants who have tried it the longest have lost by it and given it up. What business, Mr. Chairman, is so desperate as not to be sometimes hazarded by some?

I have already stated the probable amount invested in cotton manufactures in Rhode Island, and now have the returns of the number of the cotton and other manufactures in Rhode Island, from the Treasury Department. Gentlemen need not be alarmed, for I shall not read the paper which I have now in my hand, but will only call the attention of the committee to an abstract of these returns, from which will be learnt that there are in Rhode Island 119 cotton mills, 238,877 spindles, number of men employed 1,744, women 3,301, children 3,550, whose aggregate wages amount to $1,214,515. Shall these men, women, and children, be thrown out of their employment, and turned beggars upon the world, by our legislation? They will then be fit for treason, stratagems, and spoil; yes, sir, and nullification too. Will they, sir, submit to such a state of things as the passage of this bill will produce? We do not deal in menaces or gasconade, to the extent indulged in by some portions of this Union. We are slow to anger. A vertical sun has not to the same degree warmed our blood, or caused it to course so quickly through our veins; but, sir, the same causes will produce the same effects here they have produced in other countries. The cries of the poor and laboring classes for bread will be heard, and must be heeded; the fires of Nottingham, Bristol, and Manchester, may be transferred to this now happy land.

It will be seen, from the abstract I have exhibited, that about 7,000 women and children are usefully and profitably employed in these institutions. And let it not be understood, as I have heard it insinuated on this floor, that they are the white slaves of those who employ them. Sir, the reverse is nearer the truth. I have seen a female, who, before she was twenty years of age, by her edict, stopped every mill in one of the most flourishing manufacturing villages in Rhode Island. She was called the Hancock of Pawtucket, because she was as annoying to the mill-owners in that village, because they were as much in dread of her influence and power, as the British Government ever was of the influence of John Hancock, or Samuel Adams. Like them, too, she was not included in the general amnesty promulgated for the benefit of her followers, but was finally hired to leave those who seemed to be controlled by her influence. This House can surely proceed, without debate, to do an act of simple justice. I ask that the vote referring this preamble, and ordering it to be printed, may be reconsidered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said he wished to offer a word or two in reply to what had fallen from the gentleman from Georgia. The Legislature of Massachusetts, feeling that the question of a reduction of protecting duties involved matter of great importance to the people of that State, had referred that subject with other matters to a joint committee of members of both Houses: that committee had made a report in part, so far as related to the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to this House: that report had been acted on by the Legislature, certain resolves had been passed in consequence, and the whole had been forwarded to each of the representatives of the State of Massachusetts on this floor. But now, a motion was made by the gentleman from Georgia to reconsider that vote, so far as the report of the legislative committee was concerned: and this motion was made on the express ground that that report contained language offensive to one of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means. Now he did not know whether the Legislature of Massachusetts cared one farthing whether the resolutions passed by them were submitted to this House or not. There was nothing on the face of the resolutions which indicated any desire that they should be laid before Congress. Those resolutions were in the form of instruction to their Senators, and request to their Representatives.

They contained a clear expression of the opinion of the character of the bill before this House, and that opinion was, unquestionably, very different from the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means: but the expression of it implied no intention to give offence to that committee. Such votes of opinion were, he believed, usual in all legislative bodies. Certainly such resolutions had been passed in the Legislatures of more States than one in this Union since the bill had been reported: and he had never known any exception taken to any such legislative expressions of opinion, however they might differ from the opinions entertained by particular individuals, or even by a mere majority of this House. Nothing disrespectful to this body was implied in the passage of such legislative acts: nor had the Legislature of Massachusetts, in the present case, done any thing which ought to be so considered.

It had been the custom of the members of the House, when such papers were put forth by the Legislatures of the States from which they came, more especially where they contained instructions to them, to lay copies of the resolutions before the House. Such was the well known and established usage, and it was as much the usage of the House always to refer such papers, and order the printing of them.

The gentleman from Georgia, however, took an exception, not to the general usage, but to the printing of certain portions of the report of the Massachusetts committee. The language of these passages impugned, in the opinion of the gentleman, the motives of the Committee of Ways and Means: but the language contained nothing disrespectful to the committee or to the House. What was the amount of it? Merely this: that, in reviewing the measures proposed by the committee, the committee of Massachusetts were of opinion that other considerations, besides a mere reduction of the revenue, have induced the committee to report the bill which they had brought into the House.

Now Mr. D. put it to the honorable gentleman from Georgia, upon his honor, to say if other considerations had not had at least as strong an operation on the committee as the mere desire to reduce the revenue. Mr. D. knew not the sentiments which might be in the breast of his friend from Georgia, or in the hearts of other members of the Committee of Ways and Means; but had the committee said, would they now say, themselves, that they had no other object in view but merely and purely to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government? There was not a man upon this floor who did not know that other considerations had been entertained here. Every one knew that the great end and object of the bill was to get rid of the tariff, to reduce the duties, not to diminish the revenue. Every body knew that the whole South had been laboring, for years and years, to destroy the protective system. Mr. D. did not complain of this. Those gentlemen had a right to bring forward their views, and to press them with all the force of argument. But Mr. D. did assert (whether the language should be considered respectful or not) that other motives had entered into the consideration of the members here, and that the reduction of the revenue was merely an argument employed in reference to an ulterior object—an object which many gentlemen had long had in constant view. The argument had been pressed, he admitted, with great force. Mr. D. did not know, indeed, that the language employed by the legislative committee of Massachusetts had been the happiest and most proper that might have been employed; but sure he was that no hostility had been expressed or felt toward the gentleman from Georgia, or any of his colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means. No ill blood, no purpose of offence, he was very certain, had been entertained by those who drew up the report. Without any such feeling, and without the least want of respect for the committee, Mr. D. himself believed that other considerations had actuated the committee; nor did he suppose that any one would question it for a moment. The committee had put forth in this report but one reason, viz. the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government; but he did not think they would themselves deny that no other motive had had place in their minds. Mr. D. should be very sorry if, after the House had sent these resolutions to a Committee of the Whole, and had placed them on the files of the House, resolutions which committed no man, the printing of which sanctioned nothing contained in them, should be withdrawn from the files by so uncourteous a vote as was now proposed.

Mr. WILDE said that he did not complain of any thing contained in the papers of Massachusetts, as pressing at all on the dignity of any member of the House: for himself, he claimed nothing more than belonged to him in common with every other member of the House. Nor would he, by any argument ad hominem, or argument of any other kind, be induced to enter at large into a discussion on this topic. All he asked was, that he might be permitted to record his vote in such a manner as to avoid the conclusion that he assented to the accusation contained in the Massachusetts report.

Mr. E. EVERETT said he felt himself called upon, by what had fallen from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE,] to say a few words. The gentleman from Georgia asks a reconsideration of the vote passed yesterday, to commit and print the report and resolutions from Massachusetts, because those papers charge him and his colleagues with "disreputable and deceitful conduct," and because he wishes not to stand in the ridiculous position of sanctioning such a charge upon himself, as he should do if the order to commit and print these papers were recorded without his dissenting voice. Sir, I would not have voted myself for the commitment of these papers, had I supposed that, in so doing, I brought such a charge against the gentleman and his colleagues. I respect him and them. I do not wish to have their feelings wounded, and I would not co-operate in wounding them. I resist the gentleman's motion of reconsideration, because it imputes, in substance, to the Legislature of Massachusetts, an intention to give that gentleman and his colleagues personal offence. Now, sir, I wholly deny that any such thing was intended; and, also, that the House of Representatives, in respectfully disposing, in the usual manner, of the reports and resolutions of a "sovereign State," (I use the fashionable phrase, although I do not think it the best mode of characterizing any one of these United States,) binds itself, at any time, to any of the doctrines which may be contained in such papers. A contrary principle would pledge this House to some pretty strange doctrines. I have sat here, year after year, and witnessed the presentation and commitment of many documents, from different quarters, expressing themselves, on the subject of our legislation here, in terms, contrasted with which the language of these resolutions is mild and gentle. I never have known the regular and respectful disposal of such papers resisted on the grounds taken by the gentleman from Georgia; and I take leave to say that the State of Georgia has contributed her full share of papers of this character to the files of the House. I have no especial commission to interpret the purposes of the commonwealth of Massachusetts in adopting this report and resolutions; but I feel quite safe in saying that it was no part of that purpose to give personal offence to the gentleman and his colleagues. Such a supposition is excluded by the character of all the parties, by the character of the committee, by the character of the body supposed to have made the charge, by the reason and nature of the case.

I shall not enter into a verbal criticism of the document, nor endeavor to say over again what has been said by my colleague. I hold with him, that it is the evident and express intention of the report to say this: that the object of the pending bill is not the fiscal operation of reducing a redundant revenue, but a political measure, to the state of affairs in the South. Now, sir, is there any offensive imputation of motives in this? On the contrary, is it not matter of notoriety and universal admission? I have heard a great part of what has been said on this floor, for and against the pending bill; I have conversed with members on both sides, all round the House, and have been not an inattentive reader of the public journals on this great subject; and if my memory does not deceive me, I have not heard nor read an opinion from a single individual, in the House or out of it, which did not take it for granted, as a thing neither needing to be affirmed, nor capable of being denied, that the great prevailing object of bringing forward this bill at this time is, not to adopt a fiscal measure, beginning and ending in revenue, but to pursue a course of policy, in reference to protecting duties, which will meet the requisitions of South Carolina. Did not the gentleman from Georgia put this to us in the strongest and simplest form? Did he not tell us, the other evening, that the question on the bill was reduced to this alternative, either to lay a duty on tea and coffee, or go to war with South Carolina? And after that avowal, can the gentleman take offence at its being said that the reduction of duties is not his only object? I do not think it necessary to quote precedents to justify the language of the Legislature of Massachusetts. If I did, they are numerous and ample. When the bill of 1828 passed, a gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DUNTON] moved to amend the bill so that it should read, a bill to increase the duties on certain imports, for the purpose of increasing the profits of certain manufacturers. Did the gentleman from South Carolina conceive himself as making an imputation personally offensive to the majority of the House who had just passed the bill?

But I have a precedent a little more close to the point. In 1829, the Legislature of Georgia sent her protest to the Senate of the United States against the law of 1828, and used the following language, in speaking not of a report of a committee, but of an act which had received the sanction of all the branches of the Government, and was the supreme law of the land. I read a passage from the journal of the Senate: "In her sovereign character the State of Georgia protests against the act of the last session of Congress entitled 'An act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports,' as deceptive in its title, fraudulent in its pretexes, oppressive in its exactions, partial and unjust in its operations, unconstitutional in its well known objects, ruinous to commerce and agriculture, to secure a hateful monopoly to a combination of importunate manufacturers." Pretty strong language, to be sure, sir; but did Georgia, in using it, really mean to charge with disreputable conduct the members of Congress who passed the bill, among whom are persons whom she delighted, and I presume still delights to honor, the late Secretary of War, [Mr. Eaton,] the present Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. McLane,] the gentleman from Kentucky over the way, [Mr. R. M. JOHNSON,] and the Vice President elect of the United States, [Mr. Van Buren,] all of whom recorded their names in favor of this bill, "thus deceptive in its title, and fraudulent in its pretexes?"

Does not the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] see that the course he pursues, if successful, would place the Senate, and his friends there, in a very disagreeable position? If he should succeed in throwing the resolution of Massachusetts out of this House, on the grounds taken by him, will the members of Congress rest contented, while the journal of the Senate contains a protest from Georgia, going much further in charging those who voted for the bill of 1828 with being parties to a deceitful and fraudulent act? If the resolutions of Massachusetts are to be thrown out of this House, will it not be equal justice to expunge the protest of Georgia from the journals of the other? If the gentleman from Georgia should succeed in affixing this stigma on the Legislature of Massachusetts, will there be found no Senator to mete back the same measure to Georgia? And where is a warfare of this kind to end?

Sir, I end as I began; nothing personally offensive is intended. The Legislature of Massachusetts has expressed its opinions freely on a subject of great public concernment, and is entitled to that respectful reception from the House, which was accorded to it yesterday, and I trust will not be revoked to-day. I hope the gentleman will not press his motion.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he should vote against the reconsideration, not because he did or did not consider the language referred to as offensive, but because (though not disposed to carry the doctrine of State rights to extremes) he thought every State had a right to speak to this House in its own language. For his part, he liked to see every State speak to the General Government in plain language; and he believed it to be the duty of the House to record its language. He did not consider the report as containing language imputing any censure to the motives of the Committee of Ways and Means. He was free to acknowledge that the committee and this House had far higher objects in view in passing this bill than a mere reduction of the revenue; it looked to the quieting of the country; not to the pacifying of South Carolina alone, but to the peace of every portion of the Union.

Mr. W. concluded by moving to lay the motion of Mr. WILDE upon the table. He, however, withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. POLK, who said that he was very indifferent whether the motion prevailed or not. The papers from Massachusetts were not addressed to Congress, and therefore the remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, that a State had a right to speak to the General Government in its own language, did not apply. Mr. P. did not dispute the right; but these were resolutions addressed by Massachusetts to her own representatives, one of whom had presented them to the House, and caused them, in part, to be read. Mr. P. had heard them imperfectly; but, on looking at the papers, he found their language to be very violent in its character, charging those who pressed the bill now under consideration, as intending to exercise "a wanton act of power." [Here Mr. P. quoted the resolutions.] Here all who desired a reduction of the revenue, all who wished to see the rates of protection lowered, were denounced in a paper coming from the Legislature of Massachusetts, and which had been presented by one of the members from that State, and might therefore be presumed to express that gentleman's own opinions. The imputation was not restricted to the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, but was made against every friend of reduction in the House. As an humble member of the committee, Mr. P. did not care a straw for this language; the violence of the Massachusetts Legislature should not affect him. But the language of the report was not justified by fact: these papers affirmed that the House was about to abandon the whole protective policy; was that true?

Mr. P. would notice some other paragraphs; and he noticed, only to repel them. [After quoting several passages from the resolutions, and commenting on them, Mr. P. continued.] He would say, that those who were capable of thus imputing to others motives which were evil, were themselves capable of being influenced by motives such as they would not avow. If such motives were imputed to him and to his colleagues, he hurled them back from whence they came. The committee had honestly endeavored to do their duty, as they understood it, and they could do no less than repel such imputations. They were wholly unauthorized; many assumptions in the report were wholly untrue; and the whole paper seemed not to have been duly considered before it was adopted and put forth to the world. Mr. P. concluded by repeating that he cared not what became of the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. He had chosen to express his opinions in the language contained in the paper referred to.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that nothing the gentleman had read was half as violent as the language employed by gentlemen of the House in their speeches on that floor, and for which they had not been called to order. Mr. W. was very sure that if he thought the bill proposed a "wanton act of power," he would not hesitate to say so. He renewed his motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. WILDE said that as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had thought proper to conclude a speech with a motion to lay on the table, and thereby cut off all opportunity of reply, he should do all that remained to him, by asking the yeas and nays.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that if the gentleman was very anxious to reply, he would once more withdraw his motion; and he withdrew it accordingly.

Mr. WILDE said he should not avail himself of the opportunity.

Mr. ADAMS said that he hoped the yeas and nays would be taken on this question. He considered the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia as an insult to the State of Massachusetts. The proposition was to turn out of doors a solemn, deliberate, public act of her Legislature, after it had been received by the House, and by its authority placed upon its files. Mr. A. repeated, that such a motion was an insult on Massachusetts; and, therefore, he desired the vote upon it should be recorded. As to the exception which was taken to language used by the committee of the Massachusetts Legislature, and adopted and sanctioned by both Houses of that Legislature, on the ground that it contained an injurious imputation on the motives of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, if gentlemen were so exceedingly sensitive themselves, it might be well for them to consider before they cast imputations upon the motives of others. A gentleman from Tennessee, who sat behind him, [Mr. POLK,] had taken quite as great liberties with the motives of the Legislature of Massachusetts, as that Legislature had done with his motives, or those of his colleagues.

[Mr. POLK here said that was what he intended.]

He now heard the gentleman say that "he had intended to do so;" but if so, then the gentleman had no right to object to an imputation on his own motives. The gentleman should content himself with exercising the privilege of retaliatory warfare, without calling upon this House to add the weight of their sanction to his resentments, by dishonoring the resolutions of a State of this Union. The motion was as unexampled as it was outrageous. Mr. A. said he was not one of those who affixed the idea of unbounded power to the word "sovereignty;" nor was he one who held that the States of this Union were "sovereign States," in the sense which some others applied to that phrase. It was probably the belief of some of the members of this House, that, in his system of political opinions, he was disposed to curtail too much the sovereign powers of the States; but he was of opinion, that, when one of the States, sovereign or not, spoke through its Legislature, and the public act of the Legislature had been regularly received by the House of Representatives, it was entitled to be treated with profound respect, and not with insult.

Mr. A. said that his colleague [Mr. EVERETT] had read some papers heretofore received by both Houses of Congress from the Legislature of the State of Georgia, which were couched in language fuller by far, and much stronger, than that which had been objected to in the paper from Massachusetts, and which contained imputations on the motives, not of particular individuals, or of a particular committee, but of the whole Congress in a body. Mr. A. would take the liberty to call the attention of the House to certain passages of another paper, received at this very session, and only a few days since, as one of the documents accompanying the recent message of the Executive to Congress; a paper which was said to speak the sentiments of South Carolina; it was an address from the South Carolina convention; addressed, not as its title in the printed document purports, to the people of the United States, for the convention acknowledged no people of the United States; according to them there exists no such people; but addressed to the people of twenty-three distinct communities in this country, and what did they say? Here is the address, sir; and it is to the people of Massachusetts, Virginia, New York, and so on, naming in succession each of the States of the Union, twenty-three in number.

And what says this address?

"Every representative in Congress should be responsible, not only to his own immediate constituents, but through them and their common participation in the burdens imposed, to the constituents of every other representative. If, in the enactment of a protecting tariff, the majority in Congress imposed upon their own constituents the same burdens which they impose upon the people of South Carolina, that majority would act under all the restraints of political responsibility, and we should have the best security which human wisdom has yet devised against oppressive legislation. But the fact is precisely the reverse of this. The majority in Congress, in imposing protecting duties, which are utterly destructive of the interests of South Carolina, not only impose no burdens, but actually confer enriching bounties upon their constituents, proportioned to the burdens they impose upon us. Under these circumstances, the principle of representative responsibility is perverted into a principle of absolute despotism."

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. A., here is a direct charge upon the majority in Congress, of making themselves, by a gross perversion of the principle of representative responsibility, the instruments of absolute despotism. Is this no imputation? Is this not enough? What further?

"It is this very tie, binding the majority of Congress to execute the will of their constituents, which makes them our inexorable oppressors. They dare not open their hearts to the sentiments of human justice, or to the feelings of human sympathy."

Now, sir, this paper, from which I have read these passages, was received by the House, referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and 2,500 copies of it ordered to be printed, to be circulated among our constituents. Yet it tells a majority of this body that they "dare not open their hearts to the sentiments of justice and humanity." Yet the gentleman from Georgia is much affected because it may by possibility be supposed that his motives are reflected on in a paper from Massachusetts. This certainly shows that the gentleman must suppose that the Legislature of Massachusetts stands in this House on a very different ground from that on which other Legislatures stand; that there are in this Union two classes of States, from one of which the majority of Congress must tamely submit to any and every insulting imputation, while the other class must not dare to breathe a suspicion upon the unsullied purity even of a committee of this House, but at the peril of being kicked with indignity out of your doors.

With regard to the imputation itself which appears to have so deeply wounded the feelings of the gentleman from Georgia—

[Here Mr. Boox, of Indiana, interrupted Mr. A., and demanded the orders of the day.]

The motion prevailed, 98 to 79, and the House went again into committee on

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. BANKS, of Pennsylvania, being entitled to the floor, rose, and said that, as the people whom he represented on that floor were principally engaged in agricultural, manufacturing, and mechanical pursuits, he had felt it his duty to examine the bill now under consideration, and ascertain, if possible, what will most probably be its effect upon those interests if it should become a law. The duty, said Mr. B., I have performed with care, attention, and even anxiety; and I now ask the indulgence of the committee while I submit the views which I have taken, and the conclusions to which my mind has come, on this most important and much distracting subject.

I occupy my place here as an avowed friend of domestic and American industry. I am prepared to go, in legislation, every just and reasonable length to protect the labor of our own citizens against the labor of foreigners, and the influence of foreign Governments. In doing this I would not go further than may be found necessary to accomplish this object. I would proceed with caution; yes, sir, even with guarded steps, lest, while protecting one species of labor and one species of interest, injury might be done to other labor and other interests, of no less importance to the country; and thus the cause which I profess to advocate, might be arrested in its advancement.

Pennsylvania, the State from which I come, and which I have the honor to represent, in part, on this floor, has at all times been the firm and steady friend of this protective policy. That State looks upon this policy as being essential to her prosperity and welfare. It is to that policy that she is mainly indebted for her present highly improved condition. That policy has contributed largely to bestow upon the people of that State the many blessings and rich advantages which they now so eminently enjoy. That policy is well suited to the industrious and virtuous habits of the people of that State. Her local advantages are great; her agricultural resources are inexhaustible; her mineral wealth is not inferior to that of any State in this Union. That policy brings into requisition all the energies of her industrious people. It draws largely upon all her advantages and resources; inasmuch that they cannot fail to impart to the people comforts, wealth, and independence, in a very high degree.

Pennsylvania has always viewed this policy as of great national importance; as a great national measure. She does not look upon it as beneficial to herself alone, but equally so to every portion of this wide extended country. When she asks that her interests and the labor of her citizens should be protected, she is willing that the same degree of protection should be granted to all the interests and labor of the citizens of every other State in this Union. Her principles on this subject have never been other than the most liberal. It is only by giving this general protection to all interests in this country, that the great benefits of this policy can ever be fully realized. It is this extension that gives to it a national character and national importance. It is this extension that enables one portion of the country to supply the rest with those articles which the people require, and which they cannot produce; and thus each part becomes a benefactor to the remainder of the community; and internal commerce is created, which is necessary for all, beneficial to all, and profitable to all.

I deem it of the first importance that this Government should adopt a policy which would enable us to provide by our own labor, our own means, and our own resources, all those things which are necessary for our wants, our comforts, and our independence, in time of peace; and for our safety and defence in time of war. It cannot, with truth, be said that we are either free or independent while we are compelled to look to foreign Governments for a constant supply of those things which we daily need for the subsistence and comfort of ourselves and our families. This state of dependence will always have an injurious effect upon our freedom; it is utterly inconsistent with our form of Government, and the habits and patriotism of our people. Much less can it be said that we are free or independent, when we are constrained to look to our enemies for our means of defence, our munitions of war. No, sir, I repeat it, emphatically repeat it, we are neither free nor independent, as long as we are fed, and clothed, and armed, at the will of our enemy. It is time that we should shake off this worse than colonial dependence. Let us provide for ourselves those articles which are so essential at all times; we have the means: all that is wanting is wise legislation on our part. The people will not fail to do their part in this great work. Until this is accomplished, we will be dependent upon the legislation of foreign Governments, upon the mere will of foreign Powers. Our supplies will be ever subject to interruptions, liable to be entirely cut off at the caprice of a foreign despot. Who would be willing to hold all the comforts of civilized life by so uncertain and precarious a tenure? Our citizens, while this state of things endures, will be subject to constant losses from fluctuations of trade, and from convulsions abroad. Let us then place the labor and industry of our own country beyond the reach, above the control of foreign influence and foreign legislation. Then, and not until then, will we be, in reality, what we profess to be, a free and independent people.

That I have thus spoken the opinion of my constituents, and of the people of the State of Pennsylvania, I cannot entertain a doubt. That this is their opinion, will be amply confirmed by recurrence to the messages of our State Executive, the resolves of our Legislature, of our State conventions, of our city, town, village, and county meetings. It is the opinion of the people as spoken through the press. I say, from all those sources but one opinion can be formed, and that is, that Pennsylvania cannot consent to abandon the protective policy. Whatever may have been the difference of opinion of the people of that State as to men or measures, all those differences were lost in their devotion to this policy: on it, sir, all united. I cannot but embrace the opinion that this policy is essential to the prosperity and welfare of my constituents, and of the State from which I come, and that it is equally so to every portion of the people of this country.

But we are told that this policy imposes unjust, unequal, and oppressive burdens upon a certain portion of the people of this country. If this be true, it ought to be changed. Much as my constituents value this policy, they would not persist in it if this was its effect. They do not wish to profit by the oppression of others. This is not their morality, nor their system of political economy. But, sir, permit me to examine this charge before assent is given to it. It is often more easy to prefer a charge, than it is to support it. I have been present here during two discussions of this subject. I have carefully examined all documents which have been furnished us. I have also listened to the discussions with attention; and

I now say, that no evidence has been furnished me, which has the slightest tendency to establish this charge; nor have I heard any argument advanced, from which its truth could rationally be inferred: but, on the contrary, the evidence proves, in the most clear, definite, and distinct manner, that the charge is wholly unfounded. The charge has been often made, and as often refuted. This policy not only does not impose those burdens, but, sir, confers blessings and advantages even upon this much complaining portion of our fellow-citizens, as I think can be most clearly shown. I will select the article of cotton for illustration. I believe those who are engaged in the culture of this article are most loud and clamorous in their complaints against this policy. How does it operate on the cotton planter? Does it lessen the demand for this article? Does it diminish the use or consumption of cotton? No, sir: I answer that it does not. The demand for cotton is increased, the consumption of it is increased. This policy has created an extensive and rich market for cotton in our own country. Nor does this market for it at home injure its sale abroad. While the market at home has been rapidly increasing, the sales of it abroad have been as rapidly increasing. This is a fact which is undeniable. So far as this policy has a tendency to increase the demand for this article, and the consumption of it, the cotton planter must be benefited. This is a conclusion which is irresistible, and that it has this direct tendency, has been most clearly proved; in fact, it is a conceded point. Nor is this the only way in which this policy operates beneficially to the cotton planter; while it increases the demand for the article, it returns to the planter the cotton fabric at a reduced price, and of a much superior quality, and of every variety suited to all his wants; and this has a strong tendency to increase the demand for the raw material. If I am correct in my premises, that this policy increases the demand for cotton, and returns the fabric at a reduced price, of superior quality, and of every possible variety, it must, in the nature of things, benefit the cotton planter. That it does so operate, I do not entertain a doubt; it appears to me to be so perfectly obvious as not to require comment.

That the imposition of duty upon articles imported does, in some instances, increase the price, is doubtless true. I think it will be found to be so as to tea and coffee. On those articles it will be, in strictness, a tax on the consumer. Those articles are not the growth of this country; our labor is not in any degree connected with them. Our supply is altogether from abroad. We have no competition, as to them, at home. The duty laid upon them is a burden upon the people; and, sir, I am opposed to this bill for that reason. These articles are used in every family in my district, by the rich and poor alike. Go into the country, and you will find tea or coffee once, if not twice a day, on the tables of the poor, as well as on those of the rich. Why, then, I ask, impose this duty on those articles? It is a tax on the poor, without conferring a benefit on any portion of our people. No duty should be laid on these articles. Let the poor have them as well as the rich. The duty will tend to keep the best quality from our market. I want the best quality imported and placed within the means of the poor who labor, as well as the rich, who do not.

When the raw material is raised to advantage in our country; when our soil and climate are congenial to the growth and production of the raw material; and when we can manufacture this raw material to advantage, then I contend the imposition of a duty does not necessarily increase the price to the consumer, and this for the most obvious reasons. By the imposition of duty, protection is afforded, which invites to the employment of capital and skill, which devises means to improve machinery, and save labor; genius is employed in the cause of excited competition; and thus the article is manufactured at the least possible expense; the supply of the market is greatly increased; this always operates on the price; the result is, that the article being produced at the least possible expense, and the increased supply of the market, compels both the domestic and foreign manufacturer to sell at the least possible profit, and the price is certainly less to the consumer. This, sir, is the operation of this system. Under the acts of 1824 and 1828, the prices were not increased, but, on the contrary, were diminished: of the truth of this, we have the most clear and convincing proof. In the cases put, it does not follow that loss falls upon any one; but it is most clear that it does not fall upon the consumer. If loss is sustained, it must necessarily be borne by the domestic or foreign manufacturer, and most likely is borne in part by each. I therefore think it is perfectly clear, and well settled, that this protecting policy does not impose unjust, unequal, or oppressive burdens upon any portion of the people. That it does, is a proposition which I utterly deny; it is a doctrine against which I enter my most solemn protest. I, therefore, cannot consent to abandon this policy, at the bidding, much less at the threat, of any portion of my countrymen.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have objections to any legislation on this subject at this time, which, with the indulgence of the committee, I will proceed to submit. Sir, at the last session of Congress, this subject was submitted to us for our consideration, and then received our action. It was then fully examined by two committees of this House, and elaborate reports were made. The people sent on their memorials from every part of the country. All the various interests of the country were then fully and patiently heard. The wants and wishes of the people were then made known to us, in the most ample and decided manner. Every congressional district in the Union was heard from. Probably on no occasion, since the organization of the Government, was the will of the people so fully made known to their representatives here, as on that occasion. We had all the light then that we have now. The subject was then discussed fully, and at great length. The claims of our Southern brethren were then presented in the most imposing form; our action was then demanded as a matter of concession and compromise. It was asked of us as brethren of the same community. Permit me to say that this had great weight in our deliberations. In the absence of this spirit of harmony and compromise, which was thus invoked, that bill could never have found its way through this House with the vote it then obtained. It was most unequivocally a bill of compromise and concession. It was asked as such, urged upon us as such, passed as such, and was acquiesced in by the people as such. This feeling was not exhausted in our House; it accompanied the bill until its consummation. Follow this bill in its progress before the committee of conference, and you will find, sir, that this same spirit found entrance and utterance there. Yes, sir, it was the all-controlling spirit there. What interest yielded there? Was it that of the South? It was not. It was the agricultural and manufacturing interest. The woollen interest, which is of the first importance to the people of this country, whether in peace or in war, was there yielded up as an offering to quiet the murmurs and discontents of the South. We were then promised harmony. We were then told that permanency would be given to the system of protection, and that the public should have some repose.

The law then passed provides for large reduction in the revenues. It gives that quality of the clothing used by slaves almost entirely free from duty. That article was put in the bill upon their own terms, for the benefit of our Southern friends. Southern staples by that law have a decided advantage in consumption over that of the State from which I come; and how has this law been received by them? Have the pledges given been redeemed in good faith? Has the promised harmony been restored? Have we been permitted to enjoy that peace, repose, and permanency, which we had a right to expect? No, sir, far, very far from it. This boon, thus tendered by us in the best spirit of our nature, has been indignantly rejected. They have viewed what was given in friendship and compromise, as a victory, from which they have taken encouragement; their energies are redoubled, and they now press upon us with increased violence, and even threatened force, for a total abandonment of the protective policy.

The Tariff Bill.

This law was passed on their solicitation. It was intended for their benefit. It provides for large reductions. According to their own theory, it must necessarily remove, in no inconsiderable degree, their fancied oppressions. Why, then, not let this law go into operation? It might be found, on trial, that their conceived burdens would be totally removed. If there is any truth in their theory, they would be partially removed at least. If the law is permitted to go into operation, we will then be enabled to judge of its effects. We will then see and know what degree of relief it gives, if any; and will be the better enabled to form an opinion as to whether any more is required or needed. If the law, on trial, fail of its designed effects, that deficiency can then be pointed out. The defects can then be clearly and definitely shown; and the same spirit which framed the law will not fail to amend it, so as fully to attain its ultimate objects.

As this law is as yet untried, what its effects may be upon the revenue of the country are wholly unknown. It may turn out, on trial, that we have already proceeded in the work of reduction below the revenue standard. The national debt is not yet actually paid off, though provision is made finally to discharge it. There are many large claims against the Government which are unliquidated; we should take care lest we so reduce our available means as to be unable to meet those demands. We do not know what may be the operation of that law upon the labor of the country, or the manufacturing interests of the country, which have grown up under that system of policy from which it is proposed by this bill to depart. These are matters well worthy of our most serious consideration. We may already have gone as far as they can bear. To go further may totally destroy them. I want the light of experience on these points. In that guide there is certainty. It never leads statesmen astray. It would be dangerous in the extreme to proceed at random. Prudence counsels us to stop. To proceed further now would be rash and inconsiderate, and might prove ruinous to the best interests of the country. I am, therefore, decidedly opposed to any further legislation on this subject, until the virtues of the law of last session have been first tested.

Why repeal that law before the period fixed for it to go into operation? It is not known that it will be injurious in its effects. It has not been so said by any one. The South admits that it will remove their burdens in part. What was our excuse with the people for the protracted period of the last session? This question was often and anxiously put by them. Our reply was, that we were engaged in adjusting the tariff. This was our only excuse. It was deemed a sufficient justification. A large portion of our last session was spent on this subject, and in passing the law which it is now proposed we should repeal. How will we appear if we now repeal that law without any other light than we then had? It will be a direct admission that that time was uselessly, and worse than uselessly wasted. It appears to me that we would very justly be liable to the imputation that we had legislated last session purely for the purpose of creating a necessity to legislate this session; and that it took us all this session to undo what it took us half of the last session to do. And this, sir, in the absence of any good or plausible reasons being either shown or alleged.

This part of the subject may be presented in another view, which is of no little importance. The law of last session has been received by all whose interests were affected by it, as the rule to which their interests were to be conformed. Their arrangements have been made so as to meet its provisions. Their contracts were made in reliance upon its terms. It would be unjust to them now, without notice, to change that law. To do so would lead to inevitable loss. It would counteract all their arrangements, which have been made with prudence and in good faith. It would produce embarrassment, and even bankruptcy, with thousands who were faultless, except in placing confidence in our legislation. If this law is now, thus suddenly and unexpectedly, departed from, it will destroy all faith or confidence in our legislation. No prudent man would in future invest money in reliance upon our laws. Our citizens could have no love, affection, or attachment to a Government that would be thus unstable and treacherous in legislation. Every honest feeling of the human heart revolts at such a course of conduct on the part of this Government. We would not only lose the confidence of our people at home, but also our character abroad, by the passage of this bill. If it is important to an individual to sustain a character for punctuality with those with whom he transacts business, it is equally important that a great and powerful nation should sustain a character for wisdom, stability, and good faith in legislation, with all the world.

In the absence of all other pleas for the passage of this bill, it is urged upon us that South Carolina has proceeded to nullify our tariff laws; and that, to save the Union, it is necessary that this bill should be enacted into a law speedily. This is, in my opinion, the sole reason why this bill is now urged upon us. In the absence of this fact, I feel assured—we should not have been troubled with this bill at this session. This, sir, is delicate ground. We should approach it with caution. To repeal a law, not because it is unjust, inexpedient, or unconstitutional, but because a certain portion of the people of this country have threatened to resist it, would be setting a very dangerous precedent. It is a precedent which I am not prepared to establish. And whenever this Government shall set this precedent, that moment this Union will be virtually destroyed. What else is it, sir, than giving a bounty to the most palpable and dangerous infractions of the constitution? Inviting and rewarding resistance to the laws and institutions of the country? This would be at once to surrender up the constitution, which we are sworn to support, to its most open and lawless violators. This, sir, is the last mode which I shall adopt to preserve our constitution and this Union. This disquieted people tell us they have planted themselves upon their sovereignty and their reserved rights. They have thus taken their position. I will, under these circumstances, plant myself upon the interests of the people, and the laws and constitution of the country. This, sir, is my position; it is one in which I feel strong, and from which I cannot be easily driven. This is the time that we should be firm, and act like statesmen, in legislating according to the dictates of our sober judgments, so as to promote the good of the people, and support the supremacy of the laws and constitution of the country.

In passing this bill, we will not only reward resistance to the laws, but we will punish fidelity to them. It ought to be remembered, that in South Carolina there is a large portion of the people who are opposed to this resistance, and who are found in obedience to the laws. These men are now proscribed by the laws of that State. It is declared by a law of that State that they shall hold no office—that they shall not even sit as jurors, unless they will take an oath to observe the laws of nullification. Then, I say, pass this bill, and you give the nullifiers the entire ascendancy. They will claim the victory as theirs. They will proclaim themselves as the liberators of the South from their oppression; and thus those men, who, from principles of patriotism, from love of country, and fidelity to the laws, have refrained from resistance, will be altogether subjected to those friendly to nullification. Justice to those worthy citizens, in my judgment, most peremptorily forbids our action at this time.

As to nullification, I had not intended to say any thing, nor will I now say much. But I cannot forbear saying that I view nullification as a remedy, for I do not call it a right, which is unknown to the constitution—a remedy which does not flow from the constitution, but is at variance with all the provisions of that instrument, and against both its letter and spirit. It is a remedy, sir, which is not only against, but above the constitution. It is a remedy which never can be applied until the constitution is uprooted and entirely overthrown. This remedy, sir, whenever applied, will lay low the liberties of our country. I have thus given, very briefly, my reasons for believing that we should not legislate at all on this subject at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I have objections to the bill itself, which I will present in a few words. The bill, as I understand its provisions, and the principles upon which it is based, is for revenue merely, and not for protection. Although in form it retains protective features, yet in substance it is but a mockery of that system. I am no advocate for extravagant expenditures of the public money in the administration of this Government, nor would I be disposed to raise a greater amount of revenue than is necessary to answer and meet the various wants of the Government. Let us only agree as to what constitutes these wants, and I will be perfectly satisfied that the revenues of the country should be limited to that point. I, no doubt, differ widely in opinion with many gentlemen on this floor, as to what are legitimately the wants of the Government. I would embrace all objects of internal improvement, such as are purely of a national character, of national importance, and promising national benefits and advantages. These objects should be provided for and constructed at the national expense, and out of the national treasury.

I also think that a proper protection to the industry and labor of our own citizens, and to the various interests which have grown up under the tariff laws, is among the most urgent wants of the Government. These, sir, should be provided for. Whatever duties are laid, and revenue collected, so impose the duties as to afford the greatest possible degree of protection that the sum raised will afford. This bill is not framed with a view to this object. It does not appear to have entered into the contemplation of the committee when framing the bill. Why increase the duty on tea and coffee? It could not be for protection. It could only be to withdraw the sum thus raised from the protection of our own interests. It could be laid with no other view. It can be accounted for on no other principle. I repeat, then, whatever sum is raised, let it be so laid as to protect our own industry, our agriculture, and manufactures. To those branches which are of the greatest importance to the country, and stand most in need of our aid, grant the greatest degree of protection. To those branches which are not so important, or which are more able to sustain themselves against foreign competition, grant a less degree of protection. I desire to see a bill framed on this principle. The Committee of Ways and Means made no effort of this kind. I feel confident that a bill can be framed on this principle, which will afford all the protection to our interests which we want, which will not raise a larger amount of revenue than is necessary for the legitimate purposes of the Government, and which will not operate with undue severity upon any portion of the people of this country. And, further, that it can be made so clear and obvious that all those purposes are answered, that no one will dispute it. This is certainly desirable. It is at least worth a trial. This would quiet discontents in all quarters, and give permanency to our legislation and national policy. These are objects of great importance, and devoutly to be wished for by every lover of his country. I do not despair of accomplishing these ends. I entertain no fears on this point. Let us be prudent and patient. I have full confidence in the intelligence and justice of the people. This perplexing question will be settled—wisely and beneficially settled. But let us now abstain from rashly passing a law which must and will destroy all hope of its future adjustment.

This bill proposes a total change of the long and well established policy of the country—a policy which has often been decided on by the nation, and most happily acquiesced in by the people. This policy has been lenient in its operations. The people have never complained of it as a burden. They do not know, or feel, in their business, that they pay any part of the duties. So great are the countervailing benefits, that it inflicts not injury, but confers benefits. It builds up the interests of all; its salutary influence reaches all classes of society, but more especially the laboring class. Their incomes are increased by it, their reward is more ample and adequate, and a demand for their labor is created. It confers blessings upon all, and imposes burdens upon none.

We should not suddenly, and without deliberation, change a policy which is so well established, and has been so long practised under; particularly a policy which has contributed so largely to our individual and national prosperity. It gives labor and sustenance to the poor, and augments the means of all. The Committee of Ways and Means urge but one reason for this departure at this time; and that reason is, that the national debt is now paid off. This, as the committee very justly observe, will be a "happy and memorable event" in the history of our country. It will be a period to which every patriot will look with pride and satisfaction. This event will inspire a confidence in the excellence of our institutions, both at home and abroad. It is calculated to awaken our most ardent hopes that our Union may long endure, and our people still continue to prosper. Those wise statesmen who devised the means which have proved effectual to produce this happy result, will secure a rich reward in the gratitude of the people. They will have lasting claims upon their thanks, for having done much for their good, and for their country's honor. But, while we view this result with the noblest feelings of our nature, and award a just degree of gratitude to those who have contributed to produce this "happy and memorable event," let us not forget the means by which we are enabled to present to the world "this great moral spectacle" of a great nation entirely free from debt. While we rejoice, I say, let us inquire what it is, that has enabled us to extinguish our national debt. It is admitted that the protective system has furnished us the means. It is to that now much despised, and still more abused system that we are indebted for our ability to pay the debts of the nation. In the absence of this system, our debt would not now be paid off. It would have been much increased, and still increasing; and would, at this moment, have been pressing with a millstone's weight upon the people and prosperity of this country. In the absence of this policy, sir, recourse must necessarily have been had to direct taxation on the part of the Government. Then, sir, the people would have been oppressed in reality, and not, as they are now, disturbed and distracted with their too great prosperity.

The great excellence of this system has been, that while it raised funds to enable us to pay the debts of the nation, no man could say that his means were limited in the smallest degree by its operation. The profits of the laborer were not diminished, nor did his labor yield less. This system, then, not only furnished us the funds to pay our debts, but, in the very operation of raising these funds, enriched the people. This had been its greatest virtue. That this is so, I appeal directly to the people; I appeal to my immediate constituents, and I put to them this question, what were the years of your greatest prosperity? To this question but one answer can be given; and that will be, the years in which the highest duties were laid, and the largest amount of revenue collected. Go, sir, to every farmer, every mechanic, every manufacturer, and to every day laborer, and put this question to him, and you will receive this answer. Look, sir, over the face of this wide extended country. The enlarged improvements, the farm houses, villages, towns, and cities, which have sprung up as if by enchantment, within the period of these years, which catch the eye at every point, stand as living and lasting monuments of the truth of this position. When, in the history of this country, has there been, in the same space of time, any thing like an equal increase in improvements and prosperity? Look into the history of other nations, and no example can be found of equal advance in the march of civilization and general prosperity. I then ask, shall we be precipitate in changing a system which has done so much for us? One to which we are so largely indebted? One which has made us rich and happy as individuals, and prosperous and independent as a nation? Above all, shall we exchange this system for that miserable one which sunk this country into that state of poverty and bankruptcy from which it is just now emerging? I ask gentlemen to pause—I entreat them to reflect before they proceed to this work of destruction; for, sure I am that they who do the deed will be held responsible by an injured people, and an offended community.

If this bill passes, it will affect the labor and industry of thousands of our citizens. It will reduce them to want and poverty. They will be left destitute of employment, and thrown into a state of idleness, one of the worst conditions of man. These people are now happy and prosperous. By their labor, from day to day, which is their only capital, they are earning, by the strength of their arms, and skill of their hands, a comfortable subsistence. They are educating their children, and thus preparing them to be useful and honorable members of society, to take their places when they are removed from this scene of industry and action. Blot from existence all the manufacturing establishments of the country; scatter abroad the many millions of capital now employed in them; compel that capital to seek other channels of employment; throw the many thousands of people now employed in manufacturing business upon the world, destitute alike of means and employment, and I ask, how great will be the shock? Why, sir, no just estimate can be formed—no branch of business will be beyond its reach. No business so high, perfect, and secure, as not to be affected by it; and none so low as not still to be pressed lower. Change of employment, both of capital and labor, is always attended with greater or less loss. In this case all employments, even including that of the farmer, will be so paralyzed that neither capital nor labor will find profitable employment. It will sacrifice millions of money, and blast the hopes and mar the prospects of thousands of our people. The manufacturers will no longer want the wheat, the flour, beef, bacon, and other products of the farmer. He will no longer want buildings erected, foundations dug, or materials which give much employment, and furnish a valuable market; all of which are now paid for at high prices. The farmer and laborer will no longer be enabled to get those things which he needs for himself and his family, in exchange for his commodities and labor. The only market the farmer now has will be destroyed. No man can for a moment doubt that the prosperity of the country must rapidly decrease, under this depression of these great and vital interests. The truth of this representation appears to me as clear and indubitable as the existence of matter itself. Much has been said about monopolies. Pass this bill, sir, and then we will have monopolies which are to be feared, which confer no benefits, give no employments, but are enriched solely by the distresses of the poor; granting them no relief, but by taking their property for less than one-tenth of its cost. I mean, sir, the men of capital, who never buy but from him who is forced to sell.

The manufacturers are not now before us asking for further protection: they only desire that they may be permitted to enjoy the benefits of the existing laws; of laws which brought their business into existence; of laws, in the faith of which their money was invested and labor employed. I have already said that their calculations have been made so as to conform to these laws. The nation stands pledged that they shall enjoy the promised protection. It would be unjust now to withdraw it: changes in legislation are always injurious; in this instance they would be ruinous. It is time that we should have arrived at something like stability in our actions.

Much has been said on the subject of free trade. We now import many millions more than we export. This is a constant drain upon us. It takes our specie out of the country. Our importations, under all the duties which have been imposed, are much too great. We now admit foreign goods into our ports, under moderate duties, while great Britain, prohibits most of the valuable productions of our country from entering into her ports. Many foreign Governments now impose heavier duties upon our productions than we do upon theirs; and we are urged to reduce our duties still lower. To do this, would be injudicious and unwise on our part, while other Governments retain their rigid rules of prohibition against us. This has not the semblance of free trade in its character. It is free on our part, and prohibition on theirs. There is no reciprocity or equality in it. Great Britain never has adopted, towards us, the policy which we are now urged to adopt in regard to the whole world. She very wisely makes her laws for herself, and for her people, and not for us or our people. She does not now, and never has bought from us, because we bought from her. She never has, and, I hazard the assertion, she never will adopt that principle as the rule of her action towards us. She takes our products when she can profit by it, or when compelled by the necessities of her people. She ceases to take them as soon as she can do better, or when the necessity ceases. With what reason can it now be urged upon us to open our ports to foreign importations under these circumstances? Our legislation should be such as to meet the wants of our people. We should guard and protect the rights of the people and interests of the nation against the influence and effects of foreign legislation. This I deem to be one of our highest and most important duties. When other Governments open their ports to our products, it will then be time for us to open ours to theirs.

The free trade policy is designed and well calculated to mislead the people. It is addressed to a desire that is very prevalent in man—the desire of obtaining the largest portion of goods he can in exchange for what he has to give. The friends of free trade say, let us buy where we please, and where we can buy cheapest; and this is called free trade. Mr. Chairman, indulge me a short time, while I briefly examine this doctrine. I have already shown that to destroy the manufacturing interests of the country, is to destroy the only market which our farmers now have. This being done, let us adopt the free trade system. Let the farmer take a cargo of his agricultural products to a foreign market, and go to the foreign merchant and offer him his best wheat, whitest flour, best beef and bacon, in exchange for his goods, he will be told that he cannot obtain the exchange, much less sell them for money; and, in some instances, he would not be permitted to enter with his products into a British port, under penalty of confiscation. This, sir, is the right, and also the benefit of free trade; and what right does it give to the farmer? It, to be sure, gives him the right to buy where he pleases; but, in giving him this right, it totally destroys his ability to buy. It gives him a right, without any corresponding benefit. I feel well assured that no farmer who once tries this experiment will be much pleased with free trade.

For argument sake, let us suppose that this free trade system could secure the foreign market; how would it operate on the farmer, mechanic, and laborer? When the farmer sells his produce, he has always to deduct the cost of transportation to market from the price. The merchant who gives him for it, in exchange, articles of foreign manufacture, always adds the cost of their transportation to the price which he charges for them; so that the farmer has to pay for carrying the produce of his farm to the foreign market, and also for bringing the foreign article to his own door. Every farmer, in his own experience, knows this to be so. It is always so. We may add to this the profit which each one must have, through whose hands the foreign goods pass. All this expense and charge is borne by the farmer who consumes the foreign article or fabric. I then submit to intelligent men to say whether these costs and charges would not operate more heavily upon them than any duties which have ever been laid by this Government. I do insist, sir, that they would be the heaviest tax ever paid by the people of this country. It would operate severely upon all, but particularly so upon those who live in the interior of the country, far from market, and this distance altogether land transportation. Many agricultural products are so bulky as not to admit of transportation to a distant market. Destroy the home market, and the farmer would find no sale for these articles. And, what is strange, these free trade gentlemen all oppose every measure calculated to facilitate or cheapen transportation by means of roads or canals. How are the evils which I have stated to be avoided or removed? Adopt a policy which will erect in every neighborhood a manufacturing establishment. This will furnish the farmer with a market. He can take his produce there, and get, in exchange for it, those articles which he needs. He then saves all cost of transportation, which, when paid, is a clear loss to him. In saving this, he will save more than any duty ever laid by any of our laws would amount to on the articles he consumes.

The contest is really one between the labor of our citizens and that of foreigners, particularly of Great Britain. The question which is presented is this: Shall we protect the labor of our own citizens, or shall we support that of the people of Great Britain? She protects her own labor by her laws. Her people are customers to none but their own laborers. Our laborers find no market there. Shall we become customers to her labor also, or shall we be customers to our own, and protect our own? Shall we, by our legislation, force our hatters, tanners, shoemakers, tailors, cabinet makers, and the entire list of our mechanics, into a market, to compete with labor that costs but nine pence a day; I mean the pauper labor of England? This would, indeed, be a most unequal contest; a contest which would not be of long duration, or of doubtful character. It would, indeed, be most disastrous to our laboring people. It would reduce this most valuable and very numerous class of our citizens from the present high and honorable place which they now so deservedly hold in society, down upon a level with the most degraded and enslaved population upon the face of the earth.

Who are these citizens that are thus to be handed over to misery and degradation? Sir, permit me to say they are our farmers, manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers, many of whom are men of the highest moral and political worth; men of the finest intellectual attainments; men fitted for the highest stations in this Government. They may be emphatically called the "bone and sinew" of the country. They are the men who support the Government by their money in time of peace, and they are the men who stand forth as strong towers of defence to the country in time of war. These are the men who, by this bill, are to be postponed to the pauper labor of England. Those who dare to produce this effect by their votes may do so; I must be permitted to say that I cannot go with them. I would be treacherous to the trust reposed in me if I did not resist this bill. It is the farmer and mechanic that I represent here. They are my neighbors. It is with them, sir, that I have the pleasure to associate, when at home; and theirs are the interests which I shall support, advocate, and defend, while I am honored with a seat here, or have the privilege of raising my voice in this hall.

A few words more, and I have done. The prosperity of the people of this country depends almost entirely upon our agriculture. It is from that source that we draw the largest portion of those things which are necessary to sustain life, as well as those which contribute to our highest comforts and most substantial enjoyments. Let us then guard well the capital and labor that is employed in the cultivation of the soil. Let us secure to this labor and skill the most ample returns and rich rewards. Agriculture may well be said to be the foundation of all other pursuits: on this they mainly depend for support and success. It is so now, and must necessarily continue to be so. It is our duty to lay this foundation firmly: without this is done, manufactures, commerce, and the arts, never can flourish. Withdraw from agriculture that protection which is necessary for its support, and they will all languish and die; they will sink into one common grave.

This protective policy has a most auspicious influence upon the morals of the people: it stimulates to habits of industry. The practice of virtue is always in proportion to the industry of the people. An industrious people is always a healthy, peaceful, independent, and virtuous people. In proportion to the prevalence of industry, intelligence, and virtue among the people, will the community which they compose ever rise in wealth, influence, dignity, and power. The history of every nation furnishes abundant evidence of the truth of this fact. It also holds equally good to individuals as it does to communities. And wherever you find the people contract habits of idleness, you will find them dissipated, miserable, degraded, and enslaved, wholly unfit to discharge the appropriate duties of good citizens in a free Government; fit subjects alone for the prey of ambition. In this point of view, I deem it of vast importance to this nation to protect the labor of our citizens. This is one of the most valuable purposes of giving a wise encouragement to our own industry. Its direct tendency, and natural and unavoidable consequence is, to make our people intelligent, happy, virtuous, free, and independent. Let us then, by a wise, prudent, and salutary system of legislation, secure these objects to the people; and, having done this, the great end of civil Government will be attained. I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee, for the kind indulgence and attention which has been shown me, and shall trespass no longer on your patience.

MR. EVANS, of Maine, followed. He commenced by observing that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had alluded to an opinion expressed by the State which he in part represented, hostile, as the honorable gentleman seemed to consider, to the protective policy—a policy which, in my judgment, said Mr. E., the bill under consideration is eminently calculated to subvert. Another member of the committee [Mr. POLK] has adduced certain evidence, collected by the Secretary of the Treasury in the same State, tending, as he supposes, to prove that the existing rates of duty will admit of considerable reduction, and still afford sufficient protection to agricultural and manufacturing labor and capital. As these references are designed, perhaps calculated, to have a favorable influence upon the passage of this bill, I deem it my duty to examine somewhat more minutely than did either of the honorable gentlemen, both the opinion and the evidence, to see how far they can be relied upon in support of its provisions; and I shall be much mistaken if it do not turn out that both utterly fail of the end for which they have been cited. While this is my chief inducement in requesting the attention of the committee, already well nigh exhausted, I am sensible, I shall, nevertheless, avail myself of the occasion to submit a few remarks upon the general topics involved in the discussion.

I shall not say, sir, that this bill was rashly, unadvisedly, precipitately brought to the consideration of the House; because the honorable chairman has assured us that, although it was reported in eighteen days after the subject was referred to the committee, it was yet the fruits of eighteen months of labor, reflection, and preparation. I may, however, be allowed to remark, that, considered as the result of so much study and intelligence, it has met with a most ungracious reception. It seems to satisfy nobody. Recognising, as we are told by the committee it does, the principle of protection, and framed with a view to preserve it in several important particulars, it cannot of course be satisfactory to those portions of the country where the constitutionality and the expediency of the policy is so resolutely denied; and especially to those which have resolved "that a protecting tariff shall be no longer enforced" within their limits; a resolve which they declare is "fixed and unalterable." As a measure, therefore, of "concession" and peace, it falls short of the demands of those whom you desire to appease. Nor, sir, is it much more satisfactory to those who uniformly have resisted protecting duties, upon other considerations than prevail in the disaffected portions of the country. The honorable member from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] declares, very emphatically, "that the fate of the bill depends upon the amendments which it may undergo;" and his honorable colleague [Mr. WHITE] has signified his views by a series of proposed amendments, which he some days ago laid upon the table, materially changing the provisions of the bill. Various other modifications have been offered from different quarters, and many remain to be offered. Now, sir, if the intelligent committee, with all the lights which they have been able to call to their aid, after much and laborious examination, have not found it practicable to devise a scheme for the diminution of the revenue satisfactory to those who agree with them in the general object, ought we not to be admonished with what prudence, and caution, and deliberation, we should adopt measures equally affecting the interests and the prosperity of this great nation? Is it unreasonable that we should desire a longer period for the consideration of this subject than can now be devoted to it; that we should at least wait for the experience of the operations of the law of last year? Above all, that we should be permitted to look into the voluminous mass of testimony collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the House, directly bearing upon the great questions we are about to decide? Why, sir, are we called upon to proceed so hastily, and in the dark? Before I can vote to reduce the revenue still lower, I wish to know at what point it will stand under the act passed at last session, which made large reductions. Before I consent to withdraw still further duties imposed for protection, I wish to see the effect upon the labor, industry, and manufactures of the country, of the diminution already made. I wish to guide my steps by the sure lights of experience—the safest teacher in all human affairs.

The discussion, so far, I am aware, has proceeded upon the general questions connected with the policy of the country. Of this the Committee of Ways and Means seem disposed to complain, and they urge us with great earnestness to forbear this wide range, and to proceed to an examination of the details of their bill. With great respect to the honorable committee, I beg leave to say, sir, that I consider this rather an unreasonable request. I submit, sir, that to those of us who consider that no legislation whatever is at this time either necessary or expedient, nothing remains but a discussion upon general principles. We are satisfied with the law as it is, for the present, at least. We wish no change. And while we are endeavoring to maintain these positions, what have we to do with the details of the bill? We plead to your jurisdiction; we pray "to be hence dismissed," and you gravely ask us to go to trial upon the facts. While we are denying the expediency of legislating at all, you require us to limit our objections to the particular details which you propose. I think, sir, we should be permitted to deny your right to pass any act whatever at the present time.

The bill which we are now considering is avowedly a financial measure. It respects the revenue exclusively. It emanates from a committee charged with exclusive jurisdiction of whatever regards the public receipts and disbursements. As such, I am not disposed to deny that it will answer all the ends it professes to reach; that it will produce just so much, and no more, revenue than the wants of the Government require; although I think it more than probable that it will yield quite as much, if not more, than the bill of last year would produce. But as a financial scheme merely, where is the great and urgent necessity for its speedy adoption? Do we know, with any degree of certainty, what will be the amount of revenue under the existing law? Are we quite sure, sir, that it will require diminution? Is there any serious evil to be apprehended from a redundant treasury for a single year? Not at all, sir. As a financial measure simply, it may well be postponed to another Congress. It is because it is something more and something different from a mere question of finance, that it is now urged with so much zeal and earnestness. Will it be denied that the chief, almost the exclusive interest which is felt in the fate of the bill, grows out of the consideration that it is aimed more at the destruction of the policy of protection than at any other object? Sir, we know that this is the end to be obtained by it, and the country knows it also; and it is precisely for this reason that I am opposed to its passage now, or hereafter. I am not prepared to abandon this policy; nor do I believe the country either demands it at our hands, or would sanction it, if we should be so rash as to make the experiment.

The bill has been defended by the honorable committee from which it proceeded, upon three grounds. The chairman [Mr. VERPLANCK] contented himself with proving, or attempting to prove, that the revenue of the country should not exceed the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, and that this bill, with the other sources of income, would yield that amount. I am not aware that the honorable gentleman placed the bill upon any other ground whatever. Another member of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE], advocates the passage of the bill upon the ground of your inability to enforce the existing revenue law without a resort to force, and, as he supposes, a consequent severance of the Union. The honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] also one of the committee, sustains the bill upon the assumption that it affords a sufficient protection to existing establishments, and would be as really beneficial to the manufacturing and agricultural interests, as higher rates of duty upon foreign importations would be. This opinion he endeavored to maintain by reference to testimony collected by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. E. said he had a few remarks only to submit upon these various positions. As to the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, I believe, sir, all concur in the expediency of such a measure. But there is a wide difference of opinion as to what the wants of Government are, and a wider still as to the manner in which the reduction shall be made, assuming that it is necessary to make further reduction at this time. If fifteen millions are sufficient for the support of Government, are we certain that the bill of last year will yield more than that amount? I lay out of view the proceeds of the public lands, which I hope will no longer contribute to the public treasury. If your purpose—your great purpose—be really to diminish the revenue, let us first strike off the three millions derived from this source, agreeably to the bill now upon the table, which I trust will be matured into a law at the present session. Having done this, give us one year's experience under the act passed last year, and if it be then found that the revenue is still excessive, undoubtedly measures can be devised, will be devised, further to diminish it. Not, however, by increasing duties upon tea, coffee, silks, &c., but by such an arrangement of duties upon imports, as shall attain the object without impairing essentially the protection afforded by existing laws. I object to the bill under consideration, therefore, as a financial measure, because it proposes to raise a revenue upon the basis that the public lands are still to be relied upon to contribute to the common treasury of the country; because it proposes to diminish the rate of duties when we have no satisfactory evidence that the existing tariff will yield more than the wants of the Government will require. Sir, give us experience; give us that light and information which can be derived from this source alone, for I am sure, without regarding other and extrinsic considerations, and considering this simply as a measure of finance, no alarming evil can happen, no great danger exist, even if your treasury should be redundant for one year. I do not, therefore, perceive the exigency of the crisis, upon the grounds which the honorable chairman has taken in defence of the bill.

But, sir, the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] has urged the passage of this bill, upon the ground that the existing revenue laws of the country will not be submitted to in one of these States, and can only be enforced by an appeal to physical strength and the power of arms. I shall not repeat a sentiment already advanced in this debate, "that the committee have taken counsel of their fears," because they repudiate it with some degree of warmth; but I must, nevertheless, sir, be allowed to say that they address themselves to us, as if our fears are to be excited, and we are to be intimidated into the passage of the bill. What, sir, repeal the laws of the land, enacted upon great deliberation, in pursuance of a long established policy, satisfactory to a great majority of the country, because, indeed, a portion, the larger portion at present, I admit, of one of the States threaten to resist their execution! If the laws are unjust, unwise, and oppressive, modify them by all means, because they are thus unwise and ill-founded, but for no other reason. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] pursued this appeal to our fears, and he says "if we refuse to pass this bill, consequences will ensue, in contributing to which he is not ambitious to participate." To be sure, sir, he also says, "that he would do now what would be right under any other condition of the country than at present exists," and he inquires what answer we shall give to our constituents when they demand of us, "wherefore did you not pass the bill? why did you not relieve our burdens?" If these interrogatories should be put to me, sir, I will inform the honorable member of the answer I should give. I should reply that the bill was designed to reduce the revenue of the country to the wants of the Government. This was its avowed object: that having passed a law last year after much time and careful deliberation for this same purpose, of the effect of which we were wholly ignorant, we did not know that the revenue would admit further reduction at present; that the act alluded to was then highly satisfactory to the country generally, and no evidence had been afforded of a change of sentiment; that in the opinion of well informed persons, the present bill would yield as much revenue to the treasury, or nearly so, as the existing laws would yield, and thus the great purpose of it would be defeated. I should reply further, that the bill contemplated a reliance upon the public lands as a source of revenue, in preference to a distribution of their proceeds among the States for important objects; and, above all, that the enactments of the bill would be utterly subversive of the policy of protecting American industry, and expose the manufacturing and agricultural interests to inevitable loss and distress, and in some particulars to total ruin. For these reasons, I should tell them the law did not have my approval, and I misjudge my constituents exceedingly, if these reasons failed to be satisfactory. If I should be further interrogated in the language of the gentleman "Why did you not relieve our burdens?" I should say, I was not aware that you labored under any "burdens." I heard no complaints. No petitions were forwarded setting forth your grievances. On the contrary, I thought I perceived every where evident marks of prosperity and success, growing out of the operations of the protecting policy. The results of it have been, in my judgment, beneficial and not burdensome, and the change recommended would be to impose burdens rather than to relieve them. These, sir, would be my answers, very briefly expressed, if I should be interrogated "Wherefore did you not pass the bill?" But let us suppose that the bill should be enacted, and I should be inquired of, "Wherefore did you pass it?" What reply should I make? In the first place, I should deny (all the gentlemen say so) that we are at all influenced by our "fears." No, we are not intimidated, we are only doing now "what we would do under any other condition of the country." Well: then I proceed to say that we found the revenue excessive, and it became necessary to reduce it; that we regarded the present a proper measure for that purpose; that it does not impair essentially protection to our industry, or manufactures, or agriculture; and, on the whole, that it is a wise and prudent measure. So far, sir, I might proceed pretty well; but a new set of questions would then arise. If these things be so, they would say, when did you first discover them? Had you any new light? any information which you did not have at the last session? Not any. Did you not know as well then as you do now, the amount of revenue which the law then passed would yield? We did. Did you not know then as well as you do now, the amount necessary for the wants of the Government? We did. Did you not know then as certainly as you do now, the rate of duty requisite to afford reasonable and proper protection? We did. Did you not refuse at the last session to pass a bill like the present, or in any degree approaching it? We did. They will naturally inquire, why did you not enact the law then which you approve now? Why did you not then settle this vexed and agitating question? If it be wise and just now, was it less so then? Why do you so incessantly disturb the whole business of the country by your vacillating policy, your unstable, fluctuating legislation? Sir, what reply should I make to these interrogatories? Suppose I should be questioned still further: Did you see the constitution, the laws, the sovereignty of the Union, which you were sworn to defend, openly derided and threatened? and did you therefore abandon the convictions of your own judgment, and consent to a measure which you had before resisted? Did the termination of the recent presidential election produce any change in the posture of this subject? To be sure, I should answer, something was said openly and in debate, as to the necessity of appeasing South Carolina, and submitting to her ordinance; something also about "a debt of gratitude" due from New York to the State of Georgia, for the support given by that State to a distinguished citizen of the former; some mysterious hints also as to the interest which New York might have in conciliating the South to the future advancement of the gentleman alluded to; and a significant warning, that if he did not step in now "while the waters were troubled," some other person would: but notwithstanding all this, I should answer (should I not, sir?) that we have "done only what we would have done in any other condition of the country." No unworthy consideration, no improper influences, were allowed to operate. I confess, sir, I should hesitate to practise so far upon the credulity of any man, as to assign any other reason for my support of this measure, if I were to support it, than such as are indicated in these questions. Other gentlemen must answer for themselves.

Sir, as to the late movements in South Carolina, to which reference has been made by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE], no one can regret them more than I do. It may be, as he assures us, that the Union is in danger. It may be that the character and strength of our Government is about to be put to the test. But what then? Shall we meet the crisis firmly, calmly, fearlessly? Or, shall we abandon the support of the constitution and the laws, and engraft into our system of government the absurd, dangerous, fatal doctrines put forth by South Carolina? It is the lot of all human Governments, and all human institutions, to be tried. We cannot hope to be exempt, more than others, from the universal law. Our Government has been tried, in various ways, before: it is tried now, it will be tried hereafter, or all the lessons of history are read to us in vain. Let us prepare it for these conflicts. Let us build up and strengthen its fortifications. Let us not expose it and ourselves to the derision of the world. The honorable gentleman has said that the bill now pending in the other branch of the Legislature, if enacted into a law, "is not consistent with the continuance of the Union," and his argument seemed mainly directed against that measure. I shall not now discuss it. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." But, sir, as to the sentiment which the gentleman advances, that if this policy be persisted in, one of the glorious stars of our constellation will be obliterated, and sink to night and darkness, and become "the lost pleiad" of the sisterhood, I have to say that I hope not, I believe not. Of that South Carolina will judge, and determine for herself. But if it must be so, sir—if it must be so—it must; and what then? Does not that beautiful constellation still traverse its pathway in the heavens as high, and shed its beams as beneficent, and as bright to our eyes, as it did 4,000 years ago, to those early astronomers who "watched their clocks by night" on the hills of Judea? "Canst thou bind the sweet influence of the plexides?" If South Carolina choose to become "the lost pleiad," it may be, sir, that some centuries hence, perhaps not many, it will rest only in poetic imagining or uncertain tradition, that she was ever clustered within this sisterhood of stars. Her light, "dimmed and gone," may be beyond the reach of any telescope which history can furnish, to bring to those days the transactions of the times in which we live. South Carolina, sir, will judge for herself whether she will continue in her sphere, mingling her rays with ours, or sink into darkness and oblivion, become "lost"—lost indeed—lost to the future, lost to the past, lost now, lost forever.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman from Georgia, quitting the region of the stars, has drawn a parallel between the oppressions inflicted by Great Britain prior to the American revolution, upon these then colonies, which led to the independence of this nation, and the sufferings endured by the southern portions of this Union, under our own paternal Government. The learned gentleman has discovered a very exact similitude, and he admonishes us, from the lessons of history drawn from that conflict, to beware how we imitate the fatal policy of the mother country. Sir, I do not myself perceive the resemblance. Against what did the colonies remonstrate? What was the great cardinal principle they maintained? That taxation and representation should go together. They denied the right of the Legislature of Great Britain to levy taxes upon them, because they were not represented in that Legislature. Is it so with the South, sir? Let us suppose that the colonies had been represented in both Houses of the British Parliament, in proportion to their population: nay, sir, in a greater degree than their relative numbers would justly entitle them to claim; that the executive administration of that Government had been confided to the hands of the colonists in the ratio of thirty-six years to eight years; that the places of the Norths and Hillsboroughs, and their colleagues in the ministry, had been filled by the Adamases, the Hancocks, the Henrys, of America; that the Speaker of the House of Commons and "the noble lord upon the Woolsack" had both been citizens of these "oppressed" colonies, exerting the influence of their stations upon the leading policy of the kingdom. Nay, sir, let us suppose that the very measures complained of had their inception and their origin on this side of the Atlantic, and in a measure were forced by the colonies upon a reluctant nation—what declaration of grievances, I ask, would "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind" have enabled the sages of the revolution, the founders of our republic, to promulgate to the world in justification of the necessity "which impelled them to the separation?" Far, very far different, I am sure, from that glorious instrument which they did hold up to the gaze of an admiring world; but not from such as the "oppressed South" would now promulgate, if she chooses to unfurl the banner of rebellion, and to justify it by an appeal to the sympathies of mankind, for the oppressions she has endured.

Sir, I think it extremely to be deplored that we have become accustomed to speak so familiarly of "revolution," "disunion," "secession," of the blood which may flow, shed by our hands; of the throwing off the oppressions of our Government, by force. I am not of those who can either look upon or contemplate "scenes of blood and carnage with composure;" and I do not wonder that gentlemen occasionally feel an involuntary shock at references so appalling. Yet, sir, would it not have been well if the sensibilities of gentlemen had been somewhat earlier excited? if they had perceived the revolting character of a strife of blood before my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] had so wrought upon their "involuntary" emotions? Let us see, sir, who has talked most familiarly of "blood."

In the address to the people of the United States, by the late convention of the people of South Carolina, is this sentence: "But if, notwithstanding, such a course of madness should be pursued, we here solemnly declare that this system of oppression shall never prevail in South Carolina, until none but slaves are left to submit to it. We would infinitely prefer that the territory of the State should be the cemetery of freemen, than the habitation of slaves." That is, sir, if the laws of the Union are to be maintained; if the Government of their choice is to be upheld, they would "infinitely prefer"—"infinitely prefer" that the soil of their State should be their cemetery. Why, sir, upon this floor, have we not heard the same sentiment more than once uttered, and yet gentlemen then repressed their "involuntary" emotions? A gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLARKE] last year said, that sooner than submit to a decree of the Supreme Court of the United States, "Georgia would become a howling wilderness." Why, sir, is it only when laws are to be prostrated, when Government is to be overthrown, that it becomes humane, patriotic, and praiseworthy, to brave these awful consequences? But when liberty itself is in danger, when the constitution which protects it is assailed, when the sovereignty of this Union is about to be stricken down, if in its defence these scenes may be dared, gentlemen can scarcely find language to express their abhorrence. Sir, I always regret such language, here or elsewhere. If, however, the scenes of a bloody revolution are held up to our view, sickening—sickening as is the prospect, must we not contemplate it? Sir, I will not dwell upon these considerations. I will not trace further the parallels which the honorable gentleman [Mr. WILSON] run out into the future, quite as probable, I agree, as any similitude which the past affords, but not more so. I pass to other topics. I come to an examination of some other reasons which have been assigned for the passage of this bill. It is said in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, that "the extinguishment of the debt, and the commencement of the new presidential term, make this a fit season for permanent fiscal regulations. It is vitally important, too, to all engaged in any of those numerous commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural enterprises, which are affected by changes in the rates of import, and are more exposed to suffer from uncertainty than even error in legislation, now to know the intention and policy of this Government in regard to their several interests."

The Tariff Bill.

Now, sir, what legitimate effect, "the commencement of a new presidential term," can have upon the fiscal regulations, or any other policy of the Government, I am utterly at a loss to comprehend. In other countries, the accession of a new monarch is often, if not generally, attended with a change of ministry, and of measures, both domestic and foreign. This is quite consistent with the ideas of the "right of Kings" to govern, as formerly maintained by the flatterers and advocates of despotic power. But here we have not yet, not quite yet, considered the President any other than the servant of the people—not their arbitrary ruler. He is to administer the laws, which the people, by their representatives, establish; and whenever a change of policy is to be made, it seems to me much more consonant to our conceptions of Government, that the commencement of a new legislative term would be a more "fit season." Let the people speak through their new representatives in another Congress, if they see any occasion for a change of policy, and their voice will be obeyed. "Permanent fiscal regulations," say the committee, "vitally important" "now to know." Sir, I thought it was known in 1824, I thought it was known in 1828, and, again, in 1832, what was "the intention and policy of this Government." "Permanent!" Can we give permanence to our legislation? Our predecessors thought in their day it was time "now" to settle the great policy of the Government permanently; and they did settle it. We are about to unsettle it, upon the ground of giving permanence and stability to the laws. Will those who come after us be likely to treat our "permanent" arrangements with any greater respect than we show to those of our predecessors? It is a singular idea to me, sir, giving permanence to laws by incessant vacillations and changes. I am for permanence, and, therefore, I resist this bill. It is important, I admit, "vitally important," to all classes of citizens, "to know" the intentions of Government; and I resist this bill because I wish them "to know" that protection will be preserved. The argument on the other side is, pass this bill in order that the people may know what the permanent policy is to be. I answer, reject this bill, that they may know what the policy is to be. I think, sir, they will know it, quite as certainly in the one contingency as in the other.

But, sir, "the payment of the public debt," say the committee; that glorious epoch! Well, what then? I admit that, in consequence of the extinction of the public debt, less revenue will be wanted for the maintenance of the Government; and, therefore, we provided at the last session for a diminution of it. If experience shall demonstrate that the reduction was not sufficient, a greater can be made hereafter. But what possible connexion has the payment of the public debt with the abandonment of the protective policy? The idea that it is to be abandoned for this reason, proceeds altogether on the assumption that the protecting duties were laid with a view to increase the revenue for the purpose of paying off the public debt. Does not every body know that this assumption is utterly false? Does not every man here know that the duties were laid for the express purpose of giving protection, and not for revenue? Were not the laws passed in defiance of the argument, and I may say, in anticipation of the fact that the revenue would thereby be diminished, and the public debt retarded? Has not South Carolina attempted to try the constitutionality of the laws in the judicial forum, expressly on the ground that they were not revenue measures? Does she not "nullify" them now for this reason solely? These laws were designed then, not to give revenue, not to pay the public debt, but to give protection. Will gentlemen then explain why they should be withdrawn and abandoned, because an object, for which they were not intended, has been accomplished? Is there any connexion between the policy and principle of protection, and the existence of a public debt? Does the justice and expediency of the former depend at all upon the latter? Why, sir, so far as protecting duties are taxes and burdens, as gentlemen contend they are, it would seem that the country could much better sustain them, when relieved from the pressure of a public debt, than when oppressed by it. Yet the argument is, that when the country was pressed down by the weight of its public debt, it was wise enough to impose burdens and taxes without reference to the purpose of discharging that debt; but now that it is relieved from that weight, the same burdens and taxes cannot be endured. Why, sir, if protecting duties were burdens, which I deny, I think they can be made easier borne now, than when the additional weight was upon the country. If the policy was wise then, it is wiser now, independent of the consideration that the capital, the business, the labor, the expectations of the country, have all conformed to it.

Sir, I regret to perceive, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, sentiments so different from those upon which the protecting policy alone can be sustained. Allow me to read a few extracts from it.

"And although the exercise of the power, in either case, must necessarily depend upon the cause which may call it forth, the power of taxation, imposing large and permanent burdens for the encouragement of particular classes, cannot be exercised, and by slender majorities, consistently with a proper regard to the equal rights of all; and it is not to be concealed, that a permanent system of high protecting duties directly tends to build up favored classes, ultimately prejudicial to the safety of the State."

"To perpetuate a system of encouragement growing out of a different state of things, would be to confer advantages upon the manufacturing, which are not enjoyed by any other branch of labor in the United States, and to convert the favor and bounty of the Government into permanent obligations of right, acquiring strength in proportion to their continuance."

"Such an appeal comes with force to all, but, in an especial manner, may be made to those who have so long reaped the advantages of those burdens from which their brethren throughout the Union, after having submitted to them while the public obligations and the national defence and independence require it, now ask to be relieved."

What, sir! has this power been exercised only for the encouragement of "particular classes," "favored classes?" Is it "the favor and bounty of Government," manifested toward particular interests? Are these "burdens" imposed for the benefit of a few? If this were the true character of the system, I would not sustain it a moment; I would abandon it instantly. I maintain it, because I believe it essential to the general prosperity and happiness, to the national strength and defence, to the great, wide-spread, public security and benefit. I maintain it, because, instead of being a "favor and bounty from" Government, it is a prop, and support, and pillar to the Government and to the Union. I lay all the claims of the manufacturers and of individuals out of the case. I support the policy as a national policy, important to the whole. It was founded in public necessity, and should be maintained for the public good; for no individual interests, no favored classes. "Ultimately prejudicial to the safety of the State!" What is "the State," sir? I know one of the Kings of France said, "I am the State," and until lately at least every monarch in Europe could have said the same. This idea of "favor and bounty of the Government" shown to "particular classes," becoming dangerous to the State, savors rather too much of a different form of Government from that under which we yet live. Is not this the Government of the people? Are not these classes the people? Is not "the State" the people? Are you about to build up a partition between the Government and the people? Are you about to organize a being called "the State," or "the Government," distinct from the people; capable of conferring "favors and bounties" upon the people, and to whose safety the prosperity of the people may be prejudicial? "Favored classes!" Who are they, sir? For whom is protection designed? For all your mechanics and artisans, scattered over the whole surface of the country, in every art and trade. For your agriculturists every where. For your laborers in the shops, in the forge, in the mines, on the land, in the factories, every where. I find, sir, that the Secretary recommends "to dispense with a great portion of the protection heretofore afforded to the growing of wool; in other words, to reduce very considerably the duty on wool, for the reason, among others, that the continuance of it increases the number of favored classes." I suppose, therefore, that the wool growers, the farmers of the country, are to be set down among those who have enjoyed "the favor and bounty" of the Government, and that they are, therefore, likely to become "ultimately prejudicial to the safety of the State." What, sir! the farmers, the great body of the yeomanry of the country, they who sent us here, to be told they are "the favored classes?" That they are something distinct from the State? That they may become prejudicial to its safety? Sir, if you would build up "the State," build up the farmers of the country, protect their interests, support them whose arm fights your battles, whose patriotism, virtue, and intelligence keeps this machinery of Government steady amid the designs of demagogues and the recklessness of ambitious adventurers. These are "the State," and for these is the policy we advocate designed. Away with this notion of "favored classes" living on the "favor and bounty" of Government—Government which itself lives but upon their breath. Sir, the people are the Government, and the people protect themselves, without the "favor or bounty" of any superior human power.

I have delayed too long, sir, the purpose which I had chiefly in view when I rose to address the committee. We are told by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] that this bill affords sufficient and reasonable protection; that the profits of manufacturers are much greater than of other classes of the community; and to maintain these positions, he referred to evidence collected in the State of Maine, as well as elsewhere. I purpose to examine this evidence, and to notice also a remark of the honorable chairman, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] that Maine had expressed its opinions upon the subject of the tariff. That is true, sir. But does the honorable gentleman find any thing in the opinions to which he has referred to support this bill? In 1829, the Legislature of that State adopted a report of a select committee, accompanied by resolutions, expressive of its sentiments in regard to the tariff enacted the preceding year. The grounds of complaint which prevailed in Maine against that law as set forth by the Legislature, and I may add, also, which constrained the representatives from that State in Congress to oppose its enactment, were, the increased duties upon "iron, hemp, ravens duck, and molasses." The duty upon the three former, it was supposed would essentially injure the shipbuilding and fisheries, extensively prosecuted in that State; and, upon the latter, accompanied also by withholding the drawback upon the exportation of distilled spirits from foreign molasses, would seriously injure the navigation, lumber, and distilleries. In 1830, the duty upon molasses was reduced, and the drawback restored; and so far the grounds of complaint have been removed.

By the act of the last session, the duty on iron and hemp had been considerably reduced, and upon ravens duck very greatly diminished. Has the gentleman any evidence that the State of Maine is not satisfied with that reduction? that she demands more?

In March, 1832, the Legislature passed a resolution to this effect:

"Resolved, That the reduction of the duties on imports, especially on those articles which are consumed by the laboring class of the community, would relieve the people of the United States from the burdens imposed upon them by the present unequal, unjust, and oppressive tariff system, and would tend to restore harmony to the Union."

I shall not stop to inquire how and wherefore these resolutions were passed. I take them as they are, and I admit that the then present tariff is denominated unjust, unequal, and oppressive. Well, sir, since that time we have modified it essentially. We have taken off some duties entirely, "especially upon those articles consumed by the laboring classes," tea, coffee, salt, and many others. We have listened to the complaints as to iron, hemp, duck, &c. articles essential to shipbuilding, and have also diminished those duties very considerably. Is not this enough? Can the gentleman say that we have not acceded to the wishes of Maine? The State has not said so, to my knowledge. No petitions are received here; no voice from the Legislature. So far as my information extends, the law of last year was very generally acceptable. All parties, I think, were satisfied with it. But if it be not so, and the gentleman still wishes to accommodate Maine, how does he propose to do it? By imposing duties and taxes upon "those articles especially which are consumed by the laboring classes," tea and coffee particularly, in the first place; next, by leaving almost at their present rate the duties on iron, hemp, and duck, against which almost exclusively she protested; and lastly, by striking down, at a blow, to the lowest point, the duties on wool, woollen goods, cottons, paper, and other articles, against which no voice from that State has ever yet been heard. Will this, sir, be regarded there as removing the inequality, the injustice of the system? Does it not enlarge the grounds of complaint? Is not this bill in direct hostility with the declared sentiment of Maine? Does it meet her request in any degree? Certainly, sir, it will not be pretended.

The Tariff Bill.

The views I have presented will be found in accordance with those exhibited in the evidence referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk.] From page 1 of document 308, I read these extracts of a letter from Asa Clapp, Esq. of Portland, under date April 21, 1832, to the Secretary of the Treasury. Let it be remembered, that the then existing tariff is not the now existing tariff.

"That portion of the tariff which bears most heavily upon Maine comes within the resolutions, namely, on iron, hemp, and sail cloth."

"It will be seen by the abstracts, that all other branches of manufactures are small in Maine to that of shipbuilding," &c.

"Although the people of Maine have complained less than their Southern friends, they have far greater cause for complaint, being obliged to pay about twenty per cent. for duties, not only on all materials for building, but for repairing their vessels."

"Among the many duties which have been oppressive, were reckoned salt, coffee, and tea, being all used by the poorer classes. As the Government has rendered itself popular in the reduction of the two first articles, it is hoped they will in the latter also."

"Whether a heavy duty upon spirits, and little or none upon wines, would contribute to eradicate the evils of intemperance, ought to be justly considered," &c.

"Cotton factories, at the present time, are very profitable, but it is expected, from the great number building, that much competition will ensue, and profits will be lessened."

"In the manufacture of wool we have made less advance, but it is thought a considerable reduction may take place, and the business still continue profitable."

What is there, sir, in all this to sustain the present bill? Is it in leaving the duties upon iron, hemp, and sail cloth at high rates? Is it in restoring the duties upon tea and coffee, the removal of which made your administration so popular? Is it in striking down to the lowest point the duties upon cottons, when you are told that "competition" "will lessen prices?" As to woollen manufactures, the opinion is very cautiously expressed, that they will bear reduction. "It is thought," says the letter. Undoubtedly "it is thought" so by some, and by others, many others, "it is thought" quite otherwise. But my answer to that is, that we have since then made the reduction, and "it is thought," by me at least, that we should wait a little to witness the effect of it, both upon the revenue and upon manufactures.

In relation to foreign spirits, how is it, sir? By the existing laws they are subject to a duty, according to the report of the committee, upon an average of about 145 per cent. on their cost. The bill proposes to reduce it to about 60 per cent. upon an average. The opinion expressed in the letter I have read, favors the continuance of "heavy duties," upon the ground of checking intemperance; yet I can well conceive that "heavy duties" upon foreign spirits would be very satisfactory, even to the "free trade" party in Maine, and to Mr. Clapp himself, upon other considerations. The city represented by my honorable friend and colleague [Mr. Anderson] will hardly be satisfied with this part of the bill. At present, sir, a very profitable course of business is carried on between that place and Cuba, and perhaps some other of the West India islands. The lumber of the country finds a ready market in Havana, in exchange for molasses, and the navigation is profitably employed in transporting these commodities to and from their respective places. The distillation of the molasses into rum gives employment to capital and industry, and is extensively prosecuted.

A part of this rum is reshipped to the North of Europe, takes the drawback, employs American vessels in the transportation and in the return cargo. All this is well and advantageous. Admit the British West India rum, and the distilleries must stop; the importation of molasses to supply them must stop; the exportation of lumber, to pay for the molasses, must stop; the navigation must suffer. Under your colonial arrangement "of blessed and glorious memory," British vessels will be freely admitted, bringing British rum. They will not take your lumber in return, because they can supply themselves cheaper from British colonies. They will take your money, and with that purchase the lumber of New Brunswick, or the cotton of the South, to be transported to Liverpool in their own ships. Cuba cannot buy our lumber, unless we buy her molasses. Who does not perceive, sir, how destructive to the course of trade which I have described, the reduction of duties on spirits must prove? This bill, in my judgment, is not framed with any reference to the interests of Maine, which I think will be very essentially impaired by its passage. But, sir, to the evidence which has been cited to prove that it affords sufficient protection. The gentleman from Tennessee read from the letter of James L. Child, pages 1 and 2 of the printed document, this extract:

"It is well known that Maine has not many large manufacturing establishments of any kind. In that portion of the State which I visited or examined, I found but two cotton factories, one at Winthrop, in the county of Kennebeck, and the other at Gardiner, in the same county. The agent of the former very readily answered all the inquiries put to him, within his power to answer; the result of which will be found in sheet marked No. 1, accompanying this; but the directors of the Gardiner factory declined answering any of them, although twice called upon by me, and once written to on the subject. I, however, found by inquiry that their operations are about one-third more than at Winthrop; and, owing to a favorable location, and other facilities for carrying on their business, their profits must have been, during the year ending September last, fully 25 per cent." The gentleman, in reading this, dwelt with much emphasis upon the statement that the directors of the Gardiner factory declined to answer; and he drew from this the same strong inference, as to the amount of profits, as did the writer of the letter. How the fact was, sir, I have no knowledge whatever. If, however, it were so, I have no doubt the directors had very sufficient reasons, other than an unwillingness to disclose their enormous profits, which seems to be the reason attributed to them. With those gentlemen I have the pleasure to be acquainted, and I can assure you, sir, that they are as far above any unworthy motive, as any member who is, or ever has been, upon this floor, could be. So far from being desirous to uphold the tariff system, a majority of them, I believe, are the friends of free trade. But how stands the fact? I find in this document, page 11, minute answers from the Gardiner factory to all the interrogatories proposed. "Declined to answer!" Where did these answers come from? Be that as it may, here they are, and what do they show? In the first place, they show the accuracy of the information which the agent of the agent of the treasury procured by his "inquiry." Fully 25 per cent., says he. He found the operations about one-third more than at Winthrop. Now here are both returns, and let us see how they compare.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

How does this comport with the statement? Although the operations at Winthrop are so much greater, yet the expenses of labor are less than at Gardiner. The eighty-seven persons employed in the latter are paid two hundred and ten dollars and seventy-five cents per week; while the ninety-five at the former are paid but one one hundred and ninety-eight dollars and seventy-five cents. That the factory at Winthrop may have been profitable to the present proprietors, is not improbable. They are few in number, and it is under very skilful and judicious management. It fell into their hands, reluctantly, I believe, at far less than the original cost, and may have divided considerable profits upon that sum, but not, I am quite confident, more than a moderate and reasonable rate upon the original cost. Of that at Gardiner, I can speak with more assurance; and I confess, sir, I was never more astonished in the course of my life, than to hear the flourishing condition of that establishment cited, upon this floor, to prove that cotton manufactures required no further protection.

That factory has been in operation about twenty-four years, and has been so very profitable as, in all that time, to have made one small dividend only. Shares which originally, and by subsequent assessments, have cost four or five hundred dollars, can be now bought for one hundred. I think, sir, I speak within bounds. I perceive, by a paper which I received to-day, that a meeting of the stockholders has been notified, with a view to make another assessment, for the purpose of paying the debts of the corporation. This does not look much like a highly prosperous condition. I heartily rejoice to learn that its profits, last year, have been considerable; for no institution, within my knowledge, of no greater extent, has been hitherto so losing a concern. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILMORE] read another extract from this letter of Mr. Childs, in these words: "The impression among intelligent gentlemen with whom I have conversed, is, that the duties on woollens and cottons might be advantageously reduced, and the factories still be able to carry on their business at a rate of profit considerably above what is realized in other branches."

Now, sir, will any member of this House predicate his course of action upon this great, important, vital question of protection, on evidence like this? "Impressions!" "Intelligent gentlemen!" Who are they? Let us judge of their intelligence, their means of knowledge, their interests, and the strength of their "impressions." Of all this we are ignorant, and I confess, sir, the singular misfortune of the gentleman, in collecting his facts "upon inquiry," and giving his opinions in reference to the comparative condition of the two cotton factories I have named, has very much shaken my faith in evidence of "impressions." Sir, the "impressions" of "intelligent gentlemen" of this House, and the Senate also, at the last session, was, that the reduction then made, was as great as a proper regard to the interest of the manufacturing establishments would allow; and with these "impressions" for the present, at least, I am content. As to the profits being so much greater in these branches than in other pursuits, my observation has been quite otherwise. If it were so, why is it that manufactures are not more extensively prosecuted? Capital always seeks the most profitable investments. Yet you find that the navigating interest which, it is represented, has been so much depressed in Maine, has been remarkably successful.

Mr. Clapp says, page 64, "Vessels have been in great demand during the year 1831, which has occasioned a great increase. Upwards of forty thousand tons have been built." On page 65, he says, again: "Twice the number of vessels built this year than an average." Sir, this speaks any thing but a depression of the navigating interest. The truth is, I think, that it is at this day, and has been, the most profitable business to those engaged in it, of any in the country; and it comes, I must say, with an ill grace from those who have enjoyed, are enjoying, and ought to enjoy, the benefits of protecting and discriminating duties, to complain of protection afforded to other interests. The protective policy has been the best friend to the navigation of this country which it has ever had. What has built up and sustains your immense coasting trade but this same policy? Your free trade systems, and your colonial arrangements, if carried into execution, will convince that interest where its true policy lies.

Sir, other gentleman have so fully and so ably exposed the inequalities of this bill, that I shall forbear to follow the same track; I wish, however, to show you how it is regarded elsewhere, and by those opposed to the protective system. I read from the Virginia Times, an able opponent of the policy, an extract of a letter, under date "Washington, January 13, 1833;" by whom written I do not know, but evidently by one who knows something of the proceedings of this House. It is thus:

"It is understood that there will be but three votes from Pennsylvania for the bill, although it is framed with a view to promote the particular interests of that State. A decided effort will be made to amend it, first, by taking off the duty on tea and coffee; next, to increase the duty on wool, woollens, and cottons; and if these fail, then the New England members will unite in an effort to reduce the duty on iron. If any of these propositions are carried, it is believed that the bill will be lost, and they will all be urged with a view to defeat it.

"You ask what will be the effect of the bill if it passes? So far as it relates to South Carolina, it seems to me that it will nullify her ordinance, at the same time that it will cut up the tariff by the roots. For although it fall short of a satisfactory adjustment, yet the effect will be that, next year, the New England members will unite with the South in repealing the duty on iron. This will enable Mr. Van Buren to come forward as the special advocate of the particular interests of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and oppose this; and upon Mr. Ritchie and the junto rest his hopes of binding the four great States to his car.

"Thus you will see that Mr. Van Buren is resolved to make every movement work for his benefit."

Now, sir, I do not say that it is so, but if this bill has been framed with a view to promote the particular interests of one State only, it is of necessity, unequal, unjust, abominable. No law should be framed with any such view. The interest of the whole, and not of a part, is to be regarded; but it so happens, whether designed or not, that the bill does especially regard the interests of Pennsylvania. There are some other facts here which I commend to the attention of the House. "It will cut up the tariff by the roots." Let the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] think of this, who has endeavored to demonstrate that it affords sufficient protection. "It falls short of a satisfactory adjustment." Let the gentlemen think of this who talk about a "permanent" adjustment "now," and have so much at heart a "satisfactory" conciliation. "The duty on iron" will be hereafter repealed. I commend this to the consideration of Pennsylvania; to those members, if there be such, who hope to save the interests of Pennsylvania at the expense of New England.

Mr. Van Buren is "to come forward as the special advocate of the particular interests of Pennsylvania and Ohio." I commend this to the candid consideration of those who think that this bill is in way connected with the party politics of the times, and has no reference to ulterior movements. Let gentlemen consider it. The honorable member from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] has also told us, that this bill would not settle the great question; that the policy of the Government had been all wrong for seventeen years, and could not be corrected in a day, that it would require the next year, and the following, and the third, to bring back the true policy of the Government. What a commentary is this upon "permanent legislation"—upon "satisfactory adjustments!"

I said, sir, I would not go into the details of the bill; but there is one item in which I feel some interest, and I cannot forbear to advert to it. The existing duty on paper is specific, and is equivalent to an ad valorem duty of 108 per cent., according to the estimate of the committee. It is now proposed to reduce it to 30 per cent. ad valorem, to take effect within 30 days from this time. Is this, in the opinion of the committee, a gradual reduction? I should be gratified if the honorable committee will deign to speak, to hear some reason for this reduction? Is the manufacture not worth protection? We know it has attained a high degree of perfection, and that the country is almost exclusively supplied by the domestic article. Is 30 per cent. a sufficient protection? I am assured, sir, by those who know, that if this bill take effect, every paper manufactory in the Union must be prostrated. The very cheap paper of Italy will drive our own from the market. Is this duty oppressive to the South peculiarly? I believe their population do not consume very largely of the article, in proportion to other sections of the country. The tax, if it be one, falls upon the wealthier portions of the community—upon the commercial, the professional, the literary classes; and I can conceive of no reason for the diminution of the duty, but a general hostility to the use of every fabric made at home, which by possibility can be procured abroad. The same observation applies also to "ready-made clothing." Why is it that the honorable committee, and other gentlemen on this floor, manifest such antipathy to the employment of our own labor? Do they desire to reduce the wages of our own people to a level with that of other countries? Do they desire that all our clothing shall be made in the shops of London and Paris, and our industrious citizens thrown out of business? Sir, I shall say no more upon the details of the bill, and have but a word upon other and more general considerations.

Mr. Chairman: We live in very extraordinary times. How astonishing will it be to posterity, and how astonishing it ought to be to us, that now, "in the high and palmy state" of the republic; prosperous at home in an unparalleled degree—at peace with all the world; enjoying high distinction among the nations of the earth; with an overflowing treasury; we are seriously talking about the cruel "oppressions" of government; the "unjust exactions;" the "tyrannical" despotism! To some gentlemen, all government seems an arbitrary usurpation of popular rights. If we may form any opinion, sir, of the character of human institutions by the effects they produce, and the ends they accomplish, what encomiums does not the constitution of our country deserve for the unutterable blessings it has already bestowed, and the rich promises it holds out for the future. Yet, just at such a moment, it is discovered that this admirable system of government is all wrong, arbitrary, oppressive—so defective as to require almost total remodelling. We have now on the table thirteen distinct amendments proposed by the State of Georgia, and how many from other quarters I cannot say.

Sir, if we are wise, we shall adhere to the path marked out by the wisdom of our ancestors, which has led this nation to happiness, prosperity, and greatness, their most sanguine anticipations scarcely dared to hope. We shall not venture rashly upon untried experiments. Why should we despair of the Government? We are told that the States are "sovereign," and that they have certain "reserved rights," upon which they now rely to control the power exercised by the General Government. So far as South Carolina sets up these pretensions, I beg leave to read a South Carolina answer, more conclusive and satisfactory than any thing I could urge now or at any other time. I read from a pamphlet entitled "A defence of a liberal construction of the powers of Congress," and written by "One of the people," some years ago, in South Carolina, in answer to certain writers in behalf of this "reserved right." It says,

"You assert that when any conflict shall occur between the General and State Governments, as to the extent of their respective powers, 'each party has a right to judge for itself!' I confess I am at a loss to know how such a proposition ought to be treated. No climax of political heresies can be imagined, in which this might not fairly claim a most prominent place. It resolves the Government at once into the elements of physical force, and introduces us directly into a scene of anarchy and blood. There is not a single power delegated to the General Government, which it would not be in the power of every State Government to destroy, under the authority of this licentious principle. It would be only necessary for a State Legislature to pass a law forbidding that which the Federal Legislature enjoins, or enjoining what the Federal Legislature forbids, and the work is accomplished.

"Perhaps you will require the State Judiciary to pronounce the State law constitutional. I will illustrate your principle by a few examples.

"Suppose Congress should pass a law to 'lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises,' and that a State Legislature should pass another, declaring the objects for which the revenue was intended, unconstitutional, and therefore prohibiting the officers of the General Government, by severe penalties, from collecting the 'taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.' Suppose Congress should pass a law to 'raise an army' for a national war, and a State Legislature pass another, declaring the war 'wicked, unrighteous, and unconstitutional,' and therefore prohibiting the officers of the General Government, under heavy penalties, from recruiting soldiers within the limits of the State. Suppose Congress should pass a law 'for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States,' and a State Government should pronounce it unconstitutional, and provide a heavy penalty against all officers, judicial or ministerial, who should attempt to enforce it. I need not multiply cases; for if you will duly consider these, you will find enough to satiate your keenest relish for anarchy and disorder. In all the above cases you would say, 'each party has a right to judge for itself,' and of course to enforce its judgment. You might then behold a revenue officer of the United States confined in a State dungeon for obeying the revenue laws of Congress. You might see a gallant officer of the army, covered with the glorious scars of many a hard-fought battle, bearing the scourge of a State constable at a whipping post, for attempting, under a law of Congress, to recruit soldiers to fight the battles of his country. You might even see a Federal Judge arraigned before a State tribunal for pronouncing sentence against a counterfeiter of the current coin of the United States! And all this would unavoidably result in giving the State rulers the right to resist the General Government, or in a civil war to establish its legitimate authority; consequences, either of which is incompatible with the very notion of Government. To suppose that the General Government have a constitutional right to exercise certain powers, which must operate upon the people of the States, and yet that the Government of each State has a right to fix and determine its own relative powers, and, by necessary consequence, to limit the powers of the General Government, is to suppose the existence of two contradictory and inconsistent rights. In all Governments there must be some one supreme power; in other words, every question that can arise as to the constitutional extent of the powers of different classes of functionaries, must be susceptible of a legal and peaceable determination by some tribunal of acknowledged authority, or force must be the inevitable consequence; and where force begins government ends. And it is the more astonishing that you have assumed positions involving such tremendous consequences, when we consider that they are in direct opposition to the 'strict letter' of the constitution, your favorite test of the extent of delegated powers. It is therein provided, 'that the constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.' And again, 'the judicial power [of the United States] shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.' Nothing can be more plain than that the 'strict letter' of the constitution does make the laws of Congress supreme, enjoining obedience upon the State functionaries, and making void the laws of a State, if contrary thereto. And to give this provision a sanction of a nature peculiarly impressive, 'the members of the several State Legislatures, all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the constitution of the United States.' It is not less evident that it belongs to the national judiciary to pronounce upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the laws of the National Legislature. Its jurisdiction extends to 'all cases' arising under them; and it is hard to conceive how, in any possible case, a Federal Judge can decide a case, arising under a law, without pronouncing upon the constitutionality of that law. In fact, it would be vain and idle to make the laws of Congress supreme, if the national judiciary had not the power of enforcing them. For you can hardly be ignorant that a law is a dead letter without an organ to expound, and an instrument to enforce it. I should suppose, therefore, that no professional man could hesitate in saying, that a forcible opposition to the judgment of the Federal Court, founded upon an act of Congress, by whatever State authority that opposition might be authorized, would be the very case which the convention had in view when they made provision for 'calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union.' But I sincerely hope that your licentious doctrines will never have the effect of misleading the State authorities so far as to render this terrible resort unavoidable. I trust the Farewell Address of Washington, admonishing his fellow citizens to 'frown indignantly upon those who preach up doctrines tending to disunion, is not yet forgotten."

Sir, I ardently concur in the hope herein expressed, that such "licentious doctrines" will never mislead any of "the State authorities," so far as to render it necessary "to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union," especially I hope that South Carolina, in the present juncture, will not be guilty of that "climax of political heresy," "which resolves the Government at once into the elements of physical force, and introduces us directly into a scene of anarchy and blood;" nor do I believe that she will. The latest intelligence from that quarter indicates, I think, a more favorable disposition on the part of South Carolina to abstain from revolutionary measures, for the present at least. The ordinance, it seems, has been practically postponed until the adjournment of Congress. We have hitherto been led to suppose that the ordinance was the fundamental law of the State, beyond the control even of the legislative power, and that it must of necessity be enforced. It seems, however, that the "ides of March" have been adjourned—"the eclipse is postponed." Now, if there be authority any where to postpone this "fundamental law of the land" for one month, or one day, there is authority to postpone it one year, or indefinitely; and I trust, sir, that South Carolina will yet ponder upon her condition; that she will weigh well the consequences of the step she is about to take. This day has been set apart by the authority of that State, as a day of humiliation and prayer; and even now, while I speak, South Carolina is prostrate before the Ruler of nations and men, seeking light and wisdom from the fountain of all light, to guide her footsteps. For one day, at least, we may hope she feels the loneliness of her condition; she acknowledges that the strength of human power is but weakness. For one day, at least, the pride of her strength is humbled; the vaunting of her chivalry, the waving of her pennons, is hushed. May we not hope she will rise from her suppliant attitude with subdued and chastened feelings, and return again to the sphere of her constitutional duties, and to the embraces of the Union? But, sir, if it be not so; if she madly throw away the glorious inheritance for which our fathers freely gave their blood and treasure; if the constitution and liberty of this country must be subverted in our day, we shall yet not have lived in vain; we shall have solved the great problem; we shall have taught the sad, the melancholy, and it may be, the useful, lesson to all posterity, and to the friends of rational liberty every where, that mankind are not capable of self-government, and that republican institutions are not susceptible of sufficient strength for their own preservation.

Mr. JARVIS, of Maine, said he should vote in favor of the amendment of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, reducing the rates of duties upon teas, because in his opinion they were too high in the bill as originally reported; and he should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUTTON,] which proposed to strike out the duty upon teas and coffee, because he considered it as the test question whether the revenue should be raised indiscriminately upon protected and unprotected articles, or whether an attempt should be made to raise it upon protected articles alone. I shall vote against it, said Mr. J., in this view, because I have no inclination to endeavor to achieve impossibilities. Sir, you cannot raise a revenue from protected articles, for the very idea of protection is to give the domestic manufacturer the possession of the home market. Nothing short of this is protection, and the manufacturers themselves openly avow it. A gentleman from Massachusetts, largely engaged in manufactures, [Mr. APPLETON,] has told us that we could manufacture coarse cottons as cheap as the English; nay, more, that our cotton manufactures could enter into successful competition with theirs in foreign markets, and yet he will not be satisfied with any duty less than twenty-five per cent. My colleague [Mr. EVANS] objects to the reduction of the duty on paper, which he says is one hundred and eight per cent., though he tells us in the same breath that we export more than we import! What, sir, can we export cottons and paper? Can we rival the foreign manufacturer in the foreign market, unaided by duties, and burdened with shipping charges, with freight, insurance, and commission, and can we not contend with him in our own market, where he, alone is to bear the burden of these charges, unless, forsooth, we have the additional advantage of protective duties ranging from twenty-five to one hundred and eight per cent. Sir, I place implicit confidence in the facts asserted by those gentlemen, and the only conclusion to be drawn from them is, that nothing less than the monopoly of the home market is intended or will satisfy them; foreign manufactures must be excluded. Now, sir, if gentlemen can, by any ingenuity, devise a plan by which we may be enabled to raise a revenue from articles which it is their design to exclude from our market, I will cheerfully vote for it. It would indeed be the very Utopia of taxation to make goods which never came into the country pay all the expenses of our Government! But, sir, this cannot be done; if our protective system should succeed, the revenue from protected articles would be reduced to zero; and the necessity of raising a revenue requires us to tax unprotected articles as the only certain source of it.

It is not my intention to enter into an elaborate argument in favor of the bill now under consideration, notwithstanding the complaints we hear from gentlemen on the other side, that the friends of the bill say nothing to support it. Sir, the bill speaks for itself. It is a bill, the object of which is to relieve the people from an oppressive and unnecessary load of taxes; to lay the troubled spirit of the South, and to restore that harmony to the confederacy which every well wisher to the republic must ardently desire. It may not be perfect in its details; what bill have we ever framed that is so? But I will undertake to say, that it will compare advantageously with any revenue act on the statute book, in the simplicity of its details, and in the equality of its operation. It may not suit any gentleman in every particular, and I am willing to allow that I think it might be improved in several particulars. But what then? If we are not to pass a bill until it satisfies every member of this body, our laws will be but few. Though not entirely satisfied with the bill, I will vote for it cheerfully in its present form; I will vote for it with more alacrity if any valuable amendment should be grafted on it; but I will not, at so late a period, delay its progress by offering any. Permit me rather to meet some objections to the bill, and to our legislation on the subject.

Sir, it is denied that sufficient revenue will be raised by this bill, and it is objected that the sum of one hundred millions, assumed by the Committee of Ways and Means as the amount of our imports, is excessive. Now, the composition of this committee is such as to render it more than probable, that in reporting this bill they did not act without due caution, and we have a right to presume that every facility, and all the information of the Treasury Department, were at their command. I will, therefore, at a venture, adopt the conclusions of the committee respecting the amount of revenue to be produced by the bill, conclusions upon which their reputation for sagacity as financiers is at stake, rather than adopt the assertions of those upon whom no responsibility rests, and for the correctness of which we have no guarantee. With regard to the correctness of the amount of imports assumed for the basis of this bill every gentleman must judge for himself. For my own part, I am inclined to think that it is not too large. In political economy two and two do not always make four. The reduction of duty is not necessarily attended with a corresponding reduction of revenue, for the reduction of revenue will probably be checked in some degree by increased importations. The operation of high duties in decreasing importations, and also in diminishing revenue, has been very fully exemplified in the history of our own legislation upon wines, an article not produced in our country. In 1803 the duties upon various qualities of wines and the number of gallons consumed, were as follows:

Madeira paid a duty of 50 to 58 cents, and the consumption was,	236,544 gallons.
Sherry and St. Lucar, 40	639,960
Port and Lisbon, 30	275,234
Fayal, 28	624,856

In 1828, when our population had more than doubled, when our wealth had increased in still greater proportion, and when the inroads of luxury had been in a proportion as great as the two former combined, what was the state of consumption of these wines? Had it kept pace with our growth in population, in wealth, or luxury? No sir, for the purposes of revenue we had increased the duties, and the consequence was as follows. In this year,

Madeira paid a duty of 100 cents, and the consumption was,	116,584 gallons.

Sherry and St. Lucar, 60	14,854
Port and Lisbon, 50	198,279
Fayal, 40	188,212

In 1803, under the operation of the low duties, the amount of revenue upon these wines was $645,566; in 1828, under the high duties, the amount of revenue was only $300,269.

But, sir, an examination of the importation of wines, not only shows the effects of heavy duties in checking consumption, but also the effect of light duties in increasing it. In 1803, the duty on inferior qualities of wine was twenty-three cents the gallon, and the consumption was only 80,285 gallons; in 1828, the duty on these wines had been reduced to fifteen cents, and the consumption had increased to 2,345,485 gallons; in 1831, the duty on some of these inferior wines had been again reduced to ten cents, and the consumption had increased to 2,856,472 gallons, being an increase of twenty-two per cent. in three years.

Another objection made to the bill is, that it diminishes the protection to home manufactures, to which we are told that we are pledged. Sir, I deny the pledge. The paramount duty of the Legislature is to protect the whole against any predominant portion; it has no right to enrich a portion at the expense of the whole, and we are in fact under no other obligation than an agent, who had assigned, without authority, the property of his principal. But let us examine a little further this matter of pledges. We are told that Massachusetts has been forced by our legislation, to become a manufacturing State. Sir, it is not so. The facts are, that during the wars which desolated the old world for nearly a quarter of a century, the vessels of the United States were the carriers for the whole of continental Europe. Upon the return of peace, each nation resumed its share of commerce, and we were under the necessity of seeking other sources of employment for the capital which had been created by the carrying trade, and which was now crowded out of it. Hence, our cities, from wood and brick, were turned into granite and marble; hence, the various stupendous works of internal improvement, by individual enterprise, every where visible; hence, too, the inception of manufactures of all kinds. When these have been undertaken without competent skill and information, and have been prosecuted without due regard to economy, they have proved unsuccessful. To shield themselves from the ruinous effects of their own miscalculation and improvidence, the manufacturers assailed Congress with supplications to increase the tax on foreign manufactures, thereby giving a forced and artificial value to their commodities, and every new and reluctant grant of a fresh drain upon the pockets of the people, thus extorted by their clamorous importunity, they call an additional pledge! Sir, it is the pledge you give the mendicants of alms to-morrow by the charity you extend to him to-day.

If we look into our legislation before all other considerations were absorbed in president making, we shall find that the only pledge given to manufacturers was in the year 1789, at the very beginning of our Government, by the first act imposing duties. The preamble is in the following words: "Whereas, it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Be it enacted, &c." For these combined objects, when our empty treasury was to be filled, and the redemption of a debt which, even in our present prosperity, would be considered heavy, was to be provided for, the greatest ad valorem duty imposed was one of fifteen per cent.; while on ready made clothing, hats, castings of iron, paper, paper-hangings, gloves, saddles, and cabinet wares, all of which were then growing manufactures in this country, the duty was only seven and a half per cent. Yes, sir, incredible as it may seem, ready made clothing, which in the plethora of our treasury at the present day, we are required to protect with fifty per cent. ad valorem, and paper, which we are told must be protected with upwards of one hundred per cent. duty, in the early days of our republic, when more revenue was required than it was deemed expedient to raise by imposts alone, were charged with a duty of only seven and a half per cent. This act was revised in 1790; and from the preamble of the act then passed, we may fairly infer that it was not the intention of Congress to do any thing more for the encouragement of manufactures; for it is therein expressly declared, that the support of Government, and the discharge of the debts of the United States, rendered it necessary to increase the duties laid by the former act. Mark this, Mr. Chairman, the duties are increased, not for the encouragement of manufactures, but solely and exclusively for the purpose of supporting our Government and paying our debts. If more be wanting to put beyond doubt the intention of the legislature, we shall find that the duties on that class of articles, now called protected articles, were either left untouched, or else increased in a trifling degree, and that the augmentation of revenue was sought to be derived from increase of duties upon articles which we could never expect to produce. For instance, ready made clothing, hats, boots and shoes, castings of iron, soap, candles, cheese, nails, are among the articles remaining at the old rate of duty; while the duties on teas were raised sixty and eighty per cent., on coffee sixty per cent., and on wines ninety-four and one hundred per cent. In the year 1792, more revenue being wanted, a general increase of duties took place; but still there is no distinctive character of protection to be seen; the increase is equally upon protected and unprotected articles. The same may be said of the act of 1794, and of all other acts imposing duties prior to the war. I will not occupy the time of the committee by a particular investigation of them, but I must call their attention to the act of 1804, by which all ad valorem duties were indiscriminately increased two and a half per cent., and specific duties were left untouched; thereby furnishing ample proof that protection, apart from revenue, was far from the thoughts of the legislators of that day.

Upon the declaration of war, all duties on imports were doubled, and though, from this entire absence of the principle of discrimination, it was impossible for any man in his senses, to suppose that these duties could be intended to encourage domestic manufactures, yet Congress, in the act itself, gave direct warning to those who might be tempted to engage in manufactures, by limiting its duration to the term of one year after the conclusion of peace. Upon the return of peace, what was our course of legislation? Did we offer encouragement to manufacturers; did we levy protecting duties? No, sir! Notwithstanding the great debt which had been accumulated, and the consequent necessity of funds to pay the interest and reduce the principal; notwithstanding the entreaties of the manufacturers, and their declarations, that reduction of duties would be their ruin, Congress persisted in the determination of reducing the duties on articles which entered into competition with our domestic manufactures; and not only so, but the rate of reduction was greater upon many of the protected than upon many of the unprotected articles. For instance, the duties on hammered bar iron experienced a reduction of fifty per cent.; on woollens the reduction was thirty-three and a third per cent.; on cottons, excepting on those falling under the operation of the minimum, the reduction was also thirty-three and a third per cent.; but on Champagne wine there was even an increase of duty; on Madeira the duty remained nearly the same; on Sherry and St. Lucar the reduction was only twenty-five per cent.; and on Port and Lisbon only sixteen and two-thirds per cent. On Pimento the reduction was only twenty-five per cent.; on Cassia twenty-five per cent.; and on Souchong and Hyson skin teas only thirty per cent. It seems to me, therefore, to be evident that the great object of the tariff of 1816 was revenue, not protection; and that all that Congress then vouchsafed to the manufacturers was, to break their fall by a gradual reduction of duties. The eleemosynary protection, which, since that period, has been extorted from us by the clamorous importunity of the manufacturers, ought not, and cannot be distorted into a pledge to continue taxes which are not required by the exigencies of the Government, whose operation is unequal, and whose very name has become hateful to many of these confederated States.

Sir, the gentlemen from Massachusetts have undertaken, several times in the course of this debate, to speak in the name of New England. It is in no spirit of unkindness towards them that I object to this on the part of Maine. Sir, in this controversy we cannot permit Massachusetts to speak for us, for she speaks not our sentiments. Maine ever has been, and ever will be, opposed to the system of monopolies, to the system which has brought the Union into jeopardy. She always has been, and always will be, ready to join heart and hand with her brethren of the South, in the endeavor to bring back and to keep the Federal Government within its undisputed constitutional sphere of action, to reduce our revenue to a level with our expenditure, and to reduce our expenditure as low as may be consistent with a judicious and enlightened economy. Nor is Maine alone among the New England States, imbued with these sentiments: I am confident I shall not be gainsaid when I assert that they are reciprocated by New Hampshire. Two of the six New England States, containing more than one-third of the population, are as fixed as their primitive mountains against the protective system.

Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CHOATE,] not now in his seat, who, I believe, was the third from that State who mingled in this debate, and who is one of the few to whom I always listen with pleasure, however I may dissent from his doctrine, allows that the revenue ought to be reduced, but thinks that this is not the proper time. Sir, this is the invariable language whenever the attempt is made to reform abuses. Let it pass unheeded! The proper day to do good, the proper time to abate a nuisance, is the first day, the earliest moment on which it can be done.

But, moreover, we ought not to legislate now upon this subject, because there is not sufficient time for it, and because if we do legislate, we shall have been brought to it by the menaces of South Carolina; and because we ought to delay the consideration until the long session of the next Congress, when we may legislate calmly, dispassionately, and without fear.

Permit me a word or two in answer to each of these objections to present legislation. Sir, when the gentleman says that we lack time, he prophesies upon velvet, for the fulfilment rests with his friends. Far be it from me to suppose that they would trifle with our numbered hours. But if they should endeavor to throw every obstacle in the way of the friends of this bill, by refusing, so far as their votes may prevail, to pass more than three hours of the day in transacting the business for which they were sent here, making each day a holiday when there is so much to be done, and, if controlled, then using the various petty vexatious modes of delay, by raising questions of order where none exist; by moving unnecessary calls of the House; by asking for unnecessary yeas and nays; by talking against time, and making ride and tie speeches with the clerk of this House, the member speaking until out of breath, and the clerk then reading some document until the member is ready to mount again—if such a course should be pursued, it needs no one from the dead to tell us that, were we to sit till dog-days, we should be no nearer the completion of our labors.

Sir, in 1828 and in 1832, we consumed four or five months, nearly the amount of two short sessions, in the production of the tariff bills of those years. Perhaps the fanciful comparison of them to Hercules, which was made on this floor, was in consequence of this protracted creation. It would have been "more german to the matter" to term the one a harpy and the other a vampyre. There is nothing in either to render it a favorite. Were they enacted "calmly, dispassionately, and without fear?" Were there not other causes, distinct from revenue or protection, operating upon and controlling their provisions? The bill of 1832 gave satisfaction to no one; but was taken as Hobson's choice. My vote was recorded against it because I would not be instrumental in passing a bill, the operation of which was to relieve the rich rather than the poor. But, bad as it was then allowed to be, we are not to improve it, lest our action should be attributed to fear! Sir, after the very appropriate, just, and eloquent observations of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means upon this head, it is my intention to say but this: that if we should now legislate under the influence of fear, the fault is our own, and we must endure the penalty. We were solemnly warned last year of the dangerous consequences of our legislation; we were told, more in sorrow than in anger, that the South would not submit to it, that a dissolution of the Union was inevitable if we persisted! But the boding voice, like the warnings of the Trojan prophetess, was unheeded. Sir, I fervently pray that our Ilium may not rue the fatal consequences of this delusion!

But how will delay enable us to act more calmly, dispassionately, and fearlessly? Do gentlemen imagine that the way to soothe the angry feelings of the South, is to ask them to call again to-morrow? Do they think that the complainants will urge their grievances next year, with less zeal, or in a milder tone? If they do, they labor under a fearful and fatal delusion. Sir, the murmurings created by your injustice and oppression, aggravated by your neglect, will swell through every valley, and be reverberated from mountain to mountain, of the Southern States, until they burst upon your deliberations with the crash of a thunderbolt!

The gentleman from Massachusetts, whose own interests render him the peculiar champion of the manufacturers, [Mr. ARFLETON,] alluding to the reduction of duties, tells us to beware how we make the Union not worth preserving. Is it come to this; that our Union is, to any gentleman, a mere matter of dollars and cents! and that it is not worth preserving, unless one portion of the community be allowed to fleece the remainder!! Sir, I had thought that our Union was to be cherished as the palladium of republican institutions, as the guardian of equal rights, as the pattern Government, the bright exemplar to all others, bringing peace, security, competence, and happiness, to every roof in our country; and whose beneficial influences were as gentle and refreshing as the dew of heaven, which falls unseen and unthought, but which fertilizes and vivifies. And this Government, beloved and revered at home, respected and admired abroad, is to be spurned if we will not grant a monopoly to manufacturers! Sir, I will not do the citizens of my native State the injustice to believe that they hold thus lightly the blessings of our constitution. But if it were so, I would endeavor, even at this hazard, to restore the Government to a healthy state of action, and prevent our hardy yeomanry from being frittered into manufacturing operatives, that hybrid production, betwixt a man and a spinning-jenny.

Sir, the work of justice which we have in hand is met by pathetic appeals to our compassion. We are asked whether we will ruin the manufacturers? Sir, I do not believe they will be ruined. By their own showing they cannot be ruined; for they insist that high duties have reduced the prices, and that low duties will enhance them. I am no convert to this part of their doctrine, but I will trust to them when they announce to us the fact that they can manufacture as cheaply as in Europe; and I must therefore believe that a duty of twenty per cent., with the additional advantage of the charges of importation, will give them a favorable and commanding position in the home market. But grant that it were otherwise; grant that ruin to the few individuals who have vested their capital in manufactures were the inevitable consequence of the passage of this bill, still we should not hesitate, when we consider the probable consequences, in another quarter, of our refusing to pass it.

Sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] has such affection for the constitution, that he would have all our throats cut, one-half the population of the United States destroyed, and our broad rivers roll waves of blood to the ocean, sooner than this instrument should be impaired. I cannot go to such lengths. Gold may be bought too dear. Besides, I like not this depleting system. I doubt the efficacy of this Sangrado specific. But I will go far to maintain our Union, upon which the constitution depends, and which, I believe, is equally at an end, whether a State be permitted to leave it voluntarily, or be forcibly compelled to remain a member of it. I therefore trust that the gentleman from Ohio, though I cannot keep pace with him, will not only bear with me, but approve me when I say, better, far better, that every one of these bloated manufacturing establishments should be ruined, from roof tree to foundation stone, than that the fair fabric of our Union, purchased by the valor of heroes and the wisdom of sages, should be suffered to crumble, and its ruins, scattered along the waste of time, to remain mournful monuments, to after ages, of the delusive day-dreams of the generation that has just passed away, in supposing that man was capable of self-government, and of the madness of the present generation, in thus sacrilegiously destroying the glorious inheritance derived from their forefathers.

Mr. J. having concluded, about 5 o'clock,

Mr. HOWARD offered an amendment, to make the duty on coffee commence on the 3d September, 1833, which was agreed to.

The question then occurring on Mr. HUNTINGTON'S amendment, which went to strike out the 31st and 32d sections of the bill containing the duties on coffee and tea.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 69, nays 64.

So the amendment was agreed to, and the duties on coffee and tea stricken out of the bill.

Mr. WHITE then moved an amendment, the general effect of which was to make the reduction of the duties on wool, on blankets, on carpets, flannels, &c. and on manufactures of cotton, more gradual than was proposed in the bill.

On this motion the committee rose: Yeas 77, nays 44.

And the House adjourned.

MASSACHUSETTS RESOLUTIONS.

The motion of Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, to reconsider the vote by which the House had received and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, certain resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, coming up as the unfinished business of yesterday morning,

Mr. ADAMS said, that when the hour allotted to the consideration of resolutions had elapsed yesterday, he had apprised the House that he had but a few more words to say; and he should now detain them but a few minutes.

FEB. 1, 1833.]

Massachusetts Resolutions.

[H. OF R.]

He had said that he considered the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia, for a reconsideration of the vote of the House by which certain resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts had been received and referred, as an insult on that State. He would wish, on reflection, to modify that observation, and to say that if the House should sanction the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, he should consider such an act on the part of the House as an insult to the State of Massachusetts. For, although such a motion, under such circumstances, might properly be considered as in itself an insult, yet he did not believe that it was so intended by the gentleman who made it. Mr. A. said that he had been personally acquainted with that gentleman for several years, and it was but doing him justice to say—and Mr. A. said it the more readily because it was said in his absence—that neither in that House, nor out of it, did there breathe a more accomplished gentleman. Mr. A. believed him incapable of insulting, he would not say a State of this Union, but any human being. The intercourse which Mr. A. had had with him had not only been that of courtesy and of kindness, but that of friendship: and he was as far from saying willingly any thing to hurt the feelings of that gentleman, as he knew the gentleman himself to be averse from injuring his. The House knew the gentleman from Georgia to be in a peculiar degree sensitive to any thing which in his own apprehension went to affect his honor: and this may have induced him, in a moment of excited feeling, and under the impression that in the paper which had been received by the House his own sincerity had been impeached, to offer his motion for reconsideration, and to say what he would now wish he had not said. Were it not for the conviction in the mind of Mr. A. that this sensibility to his own good name was the impulse under which the gentleman from Georgia had made this motion, he should still consider it as an insult to Massachusetts. He should so consider it for the reasons alleged by his colleague, [Mr. EVERETT,] because, whatever force there might be in the expressions used in the report made to the Massachusetts Legislature, they were far more mild than those employed by the Legislatures of other States in speaking of that House and its acts, and particularly by that of the gentleman's own State. An order to exclude the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts could be founded only as considering the State Legislatures as divided into two classes, one of which was at liberty to insult with impunity, not merely an individual, but the whole Government, while the other might not utter the least reflection on one of the committees, or one of those who composed them.

What Mr. A. had further to say in opposition to the motion for reconsideration was this: The report of the joint committee of the Massachusetts Legislature said that the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, though it professed to have for its end a reduction of the revenue, would not effect that object; and that those who reported it could not but have known that such would be its operation. The words which have given offence to the gentleman from Georgia are these: "If it be the object of the bill to reduce the revenue, why does it restore the duties on tea and coffee? Are the framers of the bill ignorant of the known and familiar fact, that a diminution of the duties on imported goods, by increasing the importation generally, increases the aggregate receipts? The effect of the bill, should it become a law, would probably be, as your committee have already remarked, not to diminish, but to increase the receipts into the Treasury. The framers of it cannot be ignorant of this; and the real object in proposing it must therefore of necessity be different from the professed and ostensible one."

This, Mr. A. said, was the imputation. And now, after all the arguments he had heard in that House upon this subject he did deliberately give it as his opinion, that the effect of the bill would be to increase, instead of diminishing the revenue of the country. That the committee who had reported the bill were aware that such was the fact, was to be presumed; because it was to be presumed that they understood the subject with which they had been specially charged, and upon which they had reported the bill. It could be demonstrated, by figures, that this would be its result. That opinion Mr. A. had expressed at an early period of the present debate, in Committee of the Whole upon it; and he had called upon the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. VERPLANCK] to show how the bill would reduce the revenue. And what had been the gentleman's answer? Mr. A. had the gentleman's speech, as reported in the Telegraph, and its whole argument, so far as it contained argument on this point, went to show that the bill would augment the revenue. What did it say? It assumed, first, that by the reduction of ten or twelve millions of dollars from the present revenue, the consumers, who now pay it, would have a sum equal to that amount, to increase the exports of the country, which would of course increase the amount of exports in a corresponding degree. It then adds that the reduction of several almost prohibitory duties will also promote an increased importation. It proceeds: "all these causes, it is confidently believed, will raise the average annual importation for several successive years hereafter to the amount, and perhaps above the amount, assumed by the committee. But it does not therefore follow that this increase will be excessive and enormous, or will swell up to an indefinite extent."

Now, it had not been said, either by the Legislature of Massachusetts or by himself, that the bill would increase the revenue "to an indefinite extent." No such thing had been contended for. But he thought it had been pretty well proved by his colleague [Mr. APPELTON] that the bill would increase it to a very considerable extent. But the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had gone into detailed statements upon the effect of the proposed bill upon the revenue to be raised on several of the most important articles of importation; and his conclusions upon every article that he had specified were, that the receipts in the treasury would, under the operation of this bill, either be increased, or at least not diminished, from those which would be received under the act of the last session, which he proposes to repeal. He began with the prominent article of iron, which he had divided into three classes, and he concluded by acknowledging that "the treasury would gain something by a diminished duty on one kind of iron, while it would lose by a diminution on the best and worst sorts."

After going on in his argument about iron, to what conclusion did he come? The next article was cotton: here the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means went into a similar detail, and arrived at a similar conclusion. He again divided the cotton manufactured articles into three classes; and these are the words with which he closed his argument upon that specified article:—"The main operation of the proposed change (said he) will be the admitting certain cotton goods between the two classes I have mentioned. The revenue then from cotton goods, I believe, will stand pretty much as at present."

Pretty much as at present!

But in respect to spirits he had expressly admitted that there would be a considerable increase. The gentleman, he observed, said nothing on the subject of tea and coffee, nor on the increased duty on silks. Yet the duties imposed by the bill on these articles alone would bring not less, probably much more, than a million of dollars annually into the treasury. The report of the Committee of Ways and Means itself admits that at a scanty estimate they will yield upwards of a million. Such had been the conclusions of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means himself, in his own argument, to sustain his own bill, and they all went to prove that its result would be to increase, and not to diminish the revenue. And these conclusions had been exceedingly fortified in his (Mr. A's) mind by an argument, and especially by an experimental illustration, which he had heard yesterday stated by a gentleman who had used it as a recommendation of the bill. He had heard with pleasure an argument from the gentleman from Maine, on his right, [Mr. JARVIS,] and with no less pleasure an argument from another gentleman from Maine, upon his left, [Mr. EVANS,] [Here the CHAIR interposed, and reminded Mr. A. that it was not in order to reply in the House to arguments advanced in Committee of the Whole.]

Mr. A. said, it was not his purpose to answer the argument he had referred to, but to confirm the statements of the gentlemen who had used it.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to refer to arguments in committee.

Well, sir, said Mr. A., I will confine myself entirely within the rules of order of the House. I say, then, that I heard yesterday an argument somewhere; the House knows where, and by whom it was used, or you may suppose, if you please, that I read it in a newspaper; but this argument was illustrated by an examination into the effect of the reduction of duties upon wines. Here there were actual data drawn from the treasury returns at different times during a succession of years. These returns showed what was the effect of high duties, and what was the result of a reduction of them to one-half their former amount; from which a most forcible and convincing argument resulted to prove that the operation of the present bill would be to increase the revenue. When the wine duty had been reduced by one-half, the receipts on that article were doubled. The same result ran through a long detail, the duties upon different wines, as imported at different rates of duty, and the result was invariably the same. When the duties upon Madeira wine had been a dollar a gallon, they had yielded to the treasury, I think, about 150,000 dollars; when reduced to half a dollar, they had yielded nearly or quite double that amount. So it was with sherry, with port, and with every other species of wine imported in considerable quantities. In every single instance adduced, it was shown that a reduction of the duty had been followed by an increase of the revenue collected upon the article. Mr. A. said he wished he had the statement now before him, for, from what had taken place in relation to wines, there was the proof of experience to show what must happen in reference to wools, to cottons, to iron, to spirits, and, in short, to every article the duties on which it was proposed to reduce. What would then be the result of passing the bill? Why, that the same taxation—the same terrible taxation—the insupportable burden of taxation, would remain on the people without diminution; and, according to the argument of some gentlemen, all of it would come from the South; whether high duties or low duties, the South paid all.

Mr. A. did not desire to join in any imputation, in these remarks, upon the Committee of Ways and Means, as having understood what the effect of their own bill would be. He did not charge any such thing upon them. But he called upon the chairman of that committee, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] upon the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE,] the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] and above all, upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GILMORE,] whose opinions, unfortunately for the opponents of the bill, had undergone, since the last session of Congress, so great a variation—he called upon them all to produce any evidence to show that the bill would not operate to increase the revenue; and he would say that such proof, when produced, would be an infinitely better answer to the supposed imputation upon the committee as having understood their own bill, than kicking out of doors the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, said he could have wished, both as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and as a friend to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE,] that that gentleman had suffered the language in the papers from Massachusetts to have passed without animadversion. For himself, he felt none of the sensitiveness of his friend. Gentlemen seemed to think that the committee had been grossly ignorant as to what they were doing when they were reporting the bill; and that they were ignorant as to what the precise effect of the bill would be, he would not deny, because no man could tell beforehand, with any precision, the results of a measure of the kind. But he thought the charge of dissimulation lay as much at the door of the committee of the last Congress, who had reported the bill to reduce the revenue at that time, as it could be supposed now to do at that of the Committee of Ways and Means. All they could be said to know was, that there was no such thing as certainty about results of this kind. If a just sense of propriety were not sufficient to restrain gentlemen, as well out of the House as in it, and it was necessary that certain members of the House should set themselves up as censors, such gentlemen, it was probable, could find little else to do than complain. He was aware that in certain quarters of the House the committee had not escaped denunciations, and, he would say, obloquy, of the strongest character. Yet, because the members of that committee had sat silent, and endured these charges with patience, it was not to be understood that they admitted all that was said against them to be either true or just. Some days since, a member from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEXTER] had indulged himself in a wide latitude of remark as to the motives and character of the committee, and had gone so far as to say that, as far as the article of iron was concerned, the committee must have acted under the superintendence of the gentleman from Philadelphia. That gentleman could not suppose either that the committee felt there was any truth in such a remark, or that the assertion would be believed by any honorable man in that House. The gentleman had even gone farther, and had stated, in reference to another article—[Here the CHAIR interposed, and reminded Mr. A. that it was out of order to reply in the House to remarks made in committee.] Mr. A. went on to say, that if gentlemen would confine themselves to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, they would there find on what principles the bill had been founded. The question had been referred to them in conformity with the views expressed by the President, how far it was practicable and expedient to reduce the existing amount of revenue, and whether ten or twelve millions of dollars of unnecessary duties might not with advantage be taken off. This was the consideration presented to the committee; and it was for this end, and not in consequence of the attitude of South Carolina, although that subject was not excluded from their view, that the bill had been reported. Gentlemen should not deceive themselves with the belief that, because the members of the committee had been silent, and had given no answer to the taunts and the rebukes heaped upon them, they were therefore acting under the influence of fear. It was not a sense of fear that had actuated them, but a sense of the awful responsibility of their situation, and a sense of what was due to propriety. He begged that gentlemen would not divert the public attention from what was the real question before the House, which was, whether the people of the United States would submit to a taxation of ten or twelve millions of dollars, from which they might without injury be relieved, and not how South Carolina was to be conciliated.

Mr. WAYNE said that he must offer a few words in

FEB. 1, 1833.]

Massachusetts Resolutions.

[H. OF R.]

explanation of the grounds on which he should be compelled to give his vote different from that which his colleague [Mr. WILDE] would probably desire. It was often the painful lot of gentlemen in that House to vote, from a sense of duty, in a manner very different from what they could wish. Such was his own situation at this moment.

He was disposed to sustain every motion his colleague might make. But when he was asked to reconsider a vote by which a paper from one of the States of the Union had been referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed, (he cared not how the paper had been introduced, whether it were a memorial addressed to the House, or a resolution in the form of instructions,) and thereby to say that the paper should not be heard, because it contained an imputation on some of the members of that House, he must refuse his assent. He thought that his colleague had been betrayed, by the amiable sensibility of his nature, into a mistake of the true ground which he ought to occupy. Mr. W. did not consider the language objected to as being offensive, because the charge made was mere matter of inference and argument, and was to be viewed only as a strong expression of what the Legislature of a State understood as the true view of a subject before Congress. When the whole Legislature was treated in a disrespectful manner in any document presented to it, that might be good reason for refusing such a paper, or to act upon it. But no such fastidious sense of dignity was indulged when reflections were made on a committee of the House. Nor need his colleague to be so deeply wounded under the idea that the House, by receiving and referring this paper had at all sanctioned any thing that it contained. This was far from being the case.

Two of the gentlemen from Massachusetts had seen fit to resort to the example of Georgia as a vindication of what the State of Massachusetts had done. Mr. W. felt gratified that the gentlemen had gone so far south. And if it was true that Georgia had at all times approached that House in language somewhat grating to ears polite, still the result of her conduct showed that she was right in principle. And he would assure those gentlemen, that whenever Massachusetts should deem her rights to be outraged, and should resolve to resist, as Georgia had done, she would find the people of Georgia rallying round her with a feeling of peculiar regard, as that State which had first rocked the cradle of our infant independence. Mr. W. would not consent to set a precedent, the inference from which might be, that sovereign States, in addressing the General Government, should have their language measured by the rules of politeness, or even decency. For, should their language even be wanting in decency itself, he would still be for receiving it, on the principle that it was the language of a sovereign. When the Legislature of a State transgressed in its public acts the limits of propriety, the members of that Legislature were responsible to their constituents at home, and not to Congress.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia, said he wished to offer a few reasons why he could not vote for the motion of his colleague, [Mr. WILDE.] In some of my views, said he, I have been anticipated by my colleague [Mr. WAYNE] who has just taken his seat. On the ground that they impugn the motives of a committee of this body, the motion is made to reconsider a vote which authorized the printing of certain resolutions sent here from the Legislature of Massachusetts, and which directed their consideration by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I have two reasons for sustaining this course of the House; one is, these resolutions come from a sovereign State; and the other is, they go to support those doctrines which we of the South have been so long contending for, that of State interposition, as I will presently show. I go the full amount, Mr. Speaker, for the State sovereignties, and that they have the right to speak to us just as they please, and we have no other right but to stand and take it. Offensive as may be considered the style, they are our masters, we are their creatures, and in whatever language they may choose to address us, we are not only compelled to listen to it, but I will go further, we are bound to submit to it; for if we do not here, there is a place where they can bring us up to such an account as will very readily satisfy us of their power. This is not very welcome doctrine about this time, but I hope it will not be objected to by the State whose voice it seems to be so desirable should be heard on the present occasion. If she has no authority here, she has no right to speak, and if she has the right to speak, it must be to some purpose. Now, these resolutions come from a sovereign State, in its State capacity; and what one State can do, all can; unless, indeed, there is a difference between Northern and Southern States. These positions being established, let us see in what manner the sovereign State of Massachusetts has thought proper to address us. It must be recollected that she is very much displeased with the course of South Carolina, thinks it very daring and undutiful, and must not be tolerated, and then most bitterly complains that Congress is going to repeal the tariff laws to gratify that State. After complaining of the conduct of the Committee of Ways and Means for reporting the bill now before Congress, they say it "amounts to a proposal to surrender the rights and interests of the whole people to the menaces of a single State, and the passage of it into a law would seriously compromise the honor and dignity of the Government." Now, Mr. Speaker, one would suppose that a State, speaking in such sensitive terms of the great impropriety of this august body's acting under the influence of threats, would hardly have been guilty, in almost the next breath, of a similar rudeness! But listen, sir, to the following resolution contained in the modest document on your table:

"Resolved, That, whilst the people of this Commonwealth, in the spirit of patriotism and of fraternal conciliation, [God help such fraternity!] are ready at all times to submit to such reasonable changes of national policy as the deliberate judgment of the whole country shall require for the common good, they are not bound silently to acquiesce in destructive revolutions in principle and policy, effected by threats of violence through the forms, but in contempt of the spirit and power of the constitution."

Not bound! What do they mean by that? Not bound silently to acquiesce! Do they claim this right under a case of "destructive revolution of principle," and deny it to other members of this Union? Are other members of this Union prevented from acquiescing in destructive revolutions of principles, and Massachusetts alone entitled to that privilege? A gentleman before me, from that State, says she only means a mere resolve to that effect; she does not mean, I suppose, by that, to carry the matter any further. Why, sir, this is absolutely worse. What! resolve, and not carry the matter into execution? Is it to play the part of a blustering, mean bragadocio; to frighten us by threats. Who resolves, that is honest or brave, that does not intend to stand or fall by that resolve? No, no, sir! I cannot think so badly of old Massachusetts. Depend upon it she intends to do what she resolves, and, what is better, she has the right to do it. I want people to take what belongs to them, and not to be afraid of it; but in doing this I do not want them so to take it as to deprive their neighbors of the same right. In the name of all that is just, and fair, and honest, do not establish the principle that all the States north of Mason and Dixon's line, may resolve that they are "not bound silently to acquiesce in a law of Congress, when, in their opinion, it effects a destructive revolution of principle," and deny the same right to States south of that line! Why should it be? Is it because they are free States, and ours are slave States? Is it because on one side there is free labor, and on the other it is slave labor? Is this to be the distinction that must mark the difference of right in the matter? I have heard much said on that subject in this House, and great reliance is placed upon the morality and justness of the distinction in reference to other matters, but gentlemen deceive themselves, grossly deceive themselves, if they think it will hold in this or any other case. Whenever you believe a law unconstitutional and oppressive, you have the right to resolve that you will not silently acquiesce in it; nay, more, and to carry that resolve into complete effect; and I assure you, we of the South will take the liberty to do the same thing, not only tacitly and quietly, but forcibly if we think proper. We exercise no rights that we are not entirely willing that you should, and we mean that you shall not, without allowing us the same privilege. There can be no mistake in the object of the resolution I have read, for its intention was too plainly indicated in the original draft of resolutions reported to the Legislature of Massachusetts. I happen, Mr. Speaker, to have had a sight of that report, and though what I am about to mention is not now found in the paper I hold in my hand, yet it was there when first submitted, and was to this effect, that the passage of the tariff bill now before this Congress would be derogatory to the national honor, and involving such a gross and palpable abuse of the power of the Government, as would justify the States and citizens aggrieved by it, in any measures they may think proper to adopt, for the purpose of obtaining redress. What do you call this, Mr. Speaker? A gentleman by my side says it is nullification! Yes, sir, it is pure, unadulterated nullification! And, what is still better, a Mr. Banks, I think a member of the Massachusetts Legislature, absolutely proposed an amendment to the report, the object of which was to prepare for the separation! Now, sir, only mark how that sign of the case being altered, alters the case: South Carolina shall not nullify, but Massachusetts may, as much and as often as she pleases. Sir, this is not the first time that State has determined she was not bound to acquiesce in the laws of the General Government. She resolved that the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, relative to the northeastern boundary, in which the State of Maine, and perhaps herself, were concerned, should not be binding. That the decision of the umpire on that occasion should not be carried into effect. I see the gentleman shakes his head; I say that she did resolve substantially it should not be carried into effect; and I say more, she was right in saying so, and I would have marched from Georgia, in principle, to have borne her out in her resolve; for the General Government had no right to cede away either the territory or jurisdiction of a State. This was prevented in the State of Georgia, and I hope I never shall be so inconsistent or unreasonable as to claim for my own State, whatever others may do, what I would not willingly yield to another. For these reasons I am constrained to vote against the motion of my colleague.

Resolutions of Massachusetts.

"Resolved, That the adoption of the said line so recommended by the King of the Netherlands, as a part of the northeastern boundary of the United States, would deprive this commonwealth and the State of Maine of large tracts of territory, which, upon any imaginable result of such survey of the northern and eastern boundaries, as is authorized by the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, belong, respectively, in sovereignty and property, to the said State and to the said Commonwealth."

"Resolved, That the Government of the United States has no constitutional right to cede any portion of the territory [the oft repeated question may be asked, who is to judge of this matter, since the treaty-making power belongs to that Government? The Federal Court, to be sure, according to the modern doctrine!] of the States composing the Union, to any foreign power; or to deprive the State of any land, or other property, without the consent of such State, previously obtained, of the States of Massachusetts and Maine, would be a violation of the rights of jurisdiction and property, belonging respectively to the said States, and secured to them by the Federal constitution; and that any act purporting to have such effect, would be wholly null and void, and in no way obligatory upon the Government or people of either of the said States."

The foregoing declaration is distinctly repeated in another resolution immediately following the above. The State of Maine adopted the following resolves on the same subject:

"Resolved, That the convention of September, 1827, tended to violate the constitution of the United States, and to impair the sovereign rights and powers of the State of Maine, and that Maine is not bound by the constitution to submit to the decision which is or shall be made under the convention.

"Resolved, In the opinion of the Legislature that the decision of the King of the Netherlands cannot and ought not to be considered as obligatory upon the Government of the United States, either upon the principles of right, justice, or honor.

"Resolved, further, for the reasons before stated, that no division made by any umpire under any circumstances, if the decision dismembers a State, has, or can have, any constitutional force or obligation upon the State thus dismembered, unless the State adopt and sanction the decision."

Besides the purpose for which the resolutions are quoted, the following deductions clearly result: both States assert their sovereignty, and if their territory and jurisdiction cannot be parted with without their consent, by the General Government, then that Government is not a unit. If the States have sovereignty enough to prevent a dismemberment of their territory, because such act would be unconstitutional, then they have it for any other unconstitutional act, and the doctrine that the General Government acts not upon the States, but upon the people individually, will apply as strongly to the one case as the other; so that every citizen in a State (leaving not a man in it whereby it would be completely destroyed,) might be hung for treason, as well for attempting to prevent the dismemberment of his State as for any other unconstitutional cause. These two States have judged for themselves, and adopted their own mode of nullifying a law; and unless the doctrine in the celebrated case of the farmer and the lawyer, or rather, the ox and the bull, be applied to poor South Carolina alone, they at least ought to shut their mouths.

Mr. WICKLIFFE was anxious to bring this debate to a close, and proposed that, by unanimous consent, the motion for reconsideration should be laid upon the table.

Mr. ADAMS said that he should not have said a word on the subject, but from an imperious sense of duty. And though he had been desirous that a direct vote should be taken, he was willing, as a concession made in the spirit of harmony, to waive his call for the yeas and nays, and consent that the motion should be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER said that if no gentleman objected the motion would be laid upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, objected.

And the hour allotted to resolutions having expired, the subject was laid over.

The House then passed to the orders of the day, and went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, on

FEB. 1, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill,

[H. OF R.]

THE TARIFF BILL.

The question which came up from yesterday, was on the amendments proposed by Mr. WHITE, of New York. The first amendment offered by him, was in the first section of the bill.

Mr. WHITE's amendment went to make the reduction of the duty on raw wool, and on twist and yarn, more gradual, so as to be as follows:

35 per cent.	until 2d of March, 1834.
30 do.	do. 1835.
25 do.	do. 1836.
20 do.	thereafter (a permanent duty.)

Mr. ROOT said, the amendment of his colleague proposed to extend the period of the reduction of the duty, and leave it at least five per cent. more than was proposed by the bill. By the act of the last session, the duty on unmanufactured wool was fixed at four per cent. per pound specific, and forty per cent. ad valorem. The average cost of imported wool might be estimated at twenty cents per pound. Upon that estimate the duty would be twelve cents per pound, or sixty per cent. The duty on woollen manufactures was fixed by the same act at fifty per cent. He proposed that the reduction of duty on the raw material, and the manufactured article, should be made now correspondent. When the duty on woollens was thirty per cent., the duty on wool should be forty per cent. The reason of this proportion was obvious. Wool was the produce of agriculture, of land and labor combined. The grand staple of this country was land, it was our cheapest and most abundant article, and instead of it, the dearest and scarcest article, labor, should be encouraged. It was the sound policy of all Governments to encourage their own, instead of exotic productions. In England, population was more abundant than land. Labor was, therefore, cheap, and their policy was to protect labor and to encourage the demand for the article of which they had the greatest supply. They encouraged the importation of raw materials in order to give employment to their surplus labor, which could not be directed to tilling the ground, because they had not ground to till. But the policy which would be wise for England was not adapted to our situation. Here labor was extravagantly high in proportion to the price of land. Why should we induce the importation of raw materials? Are there not vast tracts of vacant land for the employment of our population? Is it for the purpose of encouraging the emigration of foreigners to build up towns under our protecting policy, and to fill them with inhabitants who would rather raise the union flag of Great Britain, than the star spangled banner? If there was no adequate protection upon wool the boasted American system becomes an European system. When any attempt had been made to raise the duty on wool, the manufacturers had exclaimed that we were ruining their business. The truth is, they can import wool without duty cheaper than our farmers are willing to raise it, because the German farmers, to say nothing of Spanish wool, which is raised from flocks which roam almost entirely over that kingdom, are in the habit of being satisfied with more scanty earnings than our free and independent population. In this bill the agricultural interest of the nation has been overlooked for the benefit of the manufacturers. Our farmers are to be offered up as a sacrifice to allay the burning avarice of the manufacturers. Indigo and sumac, productions of our own soil, are to be imported free of duty, as an offering to the manufacturing interest. To avert their threats, even the duty of three cents per pound on cotton was to be given up. He would not move the restoration of that duty, as he was not the representative of cotton growers. But the principle of sacrificing the agricultural to the manufacturing interest went through the whole bill. Mr. R. then moved to amend the amendment by striking out thirty and inserting forty per cent. in the first part of the amendment. The motion was lost; Yeas 61, nays 60, the CHAIR voting in the negative.

The question recurring on Mr. WHITE's amendment, After some remarks from Mr. STEWART, in which he insisted that twenty-five or twenty per cent. on wool was no protection, and that as the duty was merely for revenue, he preferred twenty to twenty-five per cent.:

Mr. BURGESS followed, and further illustrated the same view.

Mr. ROOT then moved another amendment, so as to insert forty-five per cent., instead of forty, as he had before proposed for the year 1834, and intimated, in answer to an inquiry of Mr. POLK, that he intended to follow this motion, if it prevailed, by moving correspondent amendments to the other rates of duty proposed in Mr. WHITE's amendment.

Mr. J. DAVIS inquired whether the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Root,] intended to follow up his amendments by an increase of the duty on woollens?

Mr. ROOT replied in the negative.

Mr. DAVIS said the bill proposed to reduce the duty on woollens to twenty per cent.; he proposes to increase the duty on wool to forty-five per cent.

Mr. ROOT said, it was his intention to fix the same relative duty on wool and on woollens as was settled by the act of July last. The duty on wool by this bill was sixty per cent. and on woollens fifty per cent.

Mr. J. DAVIS did not understand on what authority the gentleman assumed the duty on wool, under the act of the last session, to be sixty per cent. During the debate upon that bill, the duty was stated to amount to little more than forty per cent.

Mr. HOFFMAN thought his colleague was mistaken as to the average cost of imported wool. He held in his hand a document from the Treasury, showing the importations for several years. Mr. H. stated the cost of three and a quarter millions of pounds imported in 1831, at the various places whence it was imported, and said the average was thirty-three and four-tenths cents per pound.

After some further remarks from Mr. Root, the question was taken on his amendment to the amendment, and was lost; Yeas 18, nays not counted.

Mr. EVERETT, of Vermont, then moved to amend the amendment of Mr. WHITE, so as to restore the protective duty of the act of last year on wool, viz. four cents per pound, and forty per cent. ad valorem; which was agreed to: Yeas 87, nays 67.

The question then recurring on Mr. WHITE's amendment, as thus amended by Mr. H. EVERETT,

Mr. POLK warmly remonstrated against its adoption, as going, in substance, to declare that the House would do nothing in the way of compromise, but would insist on retaining the protecting duties as they were at present in force.

Mr. INGERSOLL contended that the wool interest had suffered most in the bill of last session, and ought now not to be forsaken.

Mr. CAMBRELENG referred to great speculations which had taken place in wool, and to competition between the wool growers and the manufacturers, in consequence of the duty being raised by a former act. If the amendment should be adopted, he should consider it as an indication that no bill was to pass, and that we were to have war between the North and South.

Mr. BEARDSLEY, of New York, now moved to amend the amendment of Mr. EVERETT, so as to limit it to the first year, and then to decrease the duty successively by one cent each year, in the specific duty, and five per cent. in the ad valorem duty, as follows:

4 cents specific, and 40 per. cent ad valorem, until 2d of March,	1834
3 cents, and 35 per cent.	1835

H. of R.]

Massachusetts Resolutions.

[FEB. 2, 1833.]

2 cents, and 30 per cent. - - - - - 1836
 1 cent; and 25 per cent. thereafter, (as permanent duty.)

This amendment was carried: Yeas 86, nays 69.

The question being put on Mr. EVERETT's amendment, as amended by Mr. BEARDSLEY, it was rejected: Yeas 72, nays 73.

Mr. WHITE's first amendment was then adopted without alteration; leaving the duty on wool at 35 per cent. until 2d of March, 1834.

30 do. do.	1835.
25 do. do.	1836.
20 thereafter, (permanent.)

The question was next put on Mr. WHITE's second amendment, which was to the third section of the bill, and made the reduction more gradual, as follows:

30 dollars until 2d of March, 1834.
25 do. do.	1835.
20 do. do.	1836.

And then 15 permanent.

The amendment was agreed to, yeas 66, nays 64.

The question next came up on the third amendment, which is in the fourth section of the bill, as follows:

40 per cent. until 2d of March, 1834.
35 do. do.	1835.
30 do. do.	1836.
25 thereafter (permanent.)

Mr. STEWART proposed to amend this amendment so as to restore the provisions of the act of last year, leaving the duty fifty per cent.

This was negatived: yeas 75, nays 89.

Mr. WHITE's amendment was then agreed to: yeas 76, nays 73.

Mr. WHITE's next amendment was in the eighth and ninth sections of the bill:

Mr. WHITE proposed to strike out both these sections, and insert a provision laying a duty on cotton goods of 30 per cent. till 2d March 1834.

25 do do	1835.
20 thereafter (permanent.)

Mr. SEMMES, of Maryland, moved to amend this amendment so as to leave the duty permanent at 30 per cent. After some remarks from the mover, this amendment was rejected without a count.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, then offered an amendment to the amendment of Mr. WHITE, so as to make the duty

On undyed cottons $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents the square yard;
 Dyed cottons $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents; except twist, yarn, and thread, (which were to be left as by the Tariff of 1824;)
 On nankeens direct from China, 20 per cent. ad valorem;

Stamped floor cloth 43 cents the aquare yard;
 Other floor cloth 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents;
 Matting 5 per cent. ad valorem.

[The effect of this amendment would be to restore the above duties as by the act of last year.]

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, of Maryland, this amendment was divided; and the question taken first on the cottons.

Mr. VINTON moved to rise. Negatived: yeas 72, nays 75.

The first part of Mr. PEARCE's amendment was then rejected: yeas 68, nays 73.

The second part followed without a count.

Mr. STEWART moved to amend Mr. WHITE's amendment so as to leave the duty on cottons permanent at 30 per cent.; and to strike out "silk," as a material.

The motion was negatived: yeas 63, nays 78.

The committee then rose, and

The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

MASSACHUSETTS RESOLUTIONS.

The motion of Mr. WINDE, of Georgia, to reconsider the vote of the House, by which certain resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed, coming up for consideration,

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed that the motion had answered all its purposes, and there could be no good in continuing longer to discuss it. He did not believe there were five members in the House who would vote for it, and he therefore renewed his motion to lay the motion upon the table. Mr. W. however, though with great reluctance, withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, on condition that he would renew the motion; which Mr. D. promised to do.

Mr. D. then said that some of the remarks which had fallen from gentlemen were of a nature to demand some animadversion. Several of those who had addressed the House seemed to suppose, and indeed had expressly said, that Massachusetts had spoken in an improper and unbecoming manner, and had used language of a violent character. Mr. D. denied the justice of both these charges. He knew, indeed, that that ancient Commonwealth was accustomed, at all times, and on all occasions, to speak her opinions openly, plainly, and fearlessly, without regard to what might or might not be the opinions of others. This had been her habit long before she had become a member of the American confederacy; and it would continue to be her practice, so long as the free, liberal, and enlightened character of her institutions should remain. She would, he trusted, at all times, express her sentiments fearlessly, and without disguise, whether her language were put on the records of this House or not. She cared not much whether, like the official language of other States of the Union, it was admitted upon the journals of Congress, or refused a place there. If any invidious distinction was to be introduced, in this respect, he should like to see the ground on which it was to rest. The States had all, at one time or other, spoken with great freedom, without any regard to what might be the opinions of that House, or of committees of that House; and the journals would bear him out in the assertion. He insisted that the paper, so far from being intemperate and violent, was in language quite the reverse: the Legislature had expressed its views with great propriety, and in a very temperate manner; its tone was firm, indeed, but perfectly temperate, inasmuch that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] might have saved himself all the trouble of "hurling" it back, and might, at the same time, have saved the Legislature of Massachusetts from all the dismay occasioned by such a procedure on his part.

He would say to the worthy gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CLAYTON,] that the paper did not sustain the opinions which that gentleman had expressed to the House. It was not Mr. D's intention to interfere with those doctrines of nullification to which the gentlemen seemed so friendly; on that subject the gentleman could think and act as he pleased, but Mr. D. must protest against Massachusetts being charged with the expression of any such sentiments, or any thing that sanctioned them.

[He here quoted the words of the resolutions, and inquired:]

Did this intimate any intention of nullifying the acts of the Government? Nothing was further from the scope of the passage. All it declared was that Massachusetts was not bound to sit silently, with her mouth shut, while a policy was proposed which went to destroy her, as though she approved of what was about to be done: that was the meaning, and the whole meaning. And how the gentleman from Georgia could so entirely misconceive, General Land Office.

or misrepresent it, as in the remotest degree authorizing nullification, was to him perfectly incomprehensible.

He had felt it due to himself and to his State to make these remarks, in reply to what had been said by the gentlemen from Georgia and Tennessee.

He then moved, according to promise, to lay the motion on the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. WILDE, who said he hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] would withdraw his motion, to enable him, Mr. W., to make a disposition of this matter which would relieve the House from all further trouble respecting it.

Mr. DAVIS assenting:

Mr. WILDE proceeded: Nothing had been farther from his expectation when he introduced this resolution, than the debate to which it had given rise, unless indeed it was the new-born zeal for State rights which it had awakened in a certain quarter of the House. He was at first puzzled to conjecture how it happened, that a sentiment which had slept so long and so soundly, had so suddenly awakened; but, on further reflection, it occurred to him, that the uniform advocates of power were consistent with themselves. As they held that States had no rights in a conflict with the General Government, so individuals had no rights in a collision with the States. Nor was the logic of the gentlemen, in his humble judgment, less remarkable than their zeal. Because it was proper that the most unlimited freedom of petition should be allowed—which he admitted—because it was proper that every legislative body should express their opinions of public men and measures, in whatever language they might think becoming to themselves, which he did not deny, therefore, it was right that an individual whose conduct was reflected on in common with his associates, and who, not knowing the fact, had voted for the reference, should not be permitted to reconsider and recal his vote.

Gentlemen seemed to have prejudged his course. They appeared, somewhat too hastily, to have inferred that, if the vote were reconsidered, he would attempt to prevail upon the House not to refer and print the preamble. He had intimated no such thing. He had hinted, on the contrary, that it might be proper for the House to refer and print, but that he could not be expected to vote for the reference of that part of it which, in his opinion, did injustice to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The memorials of other States, on other occasions, had been cited. In these memorials, it was true, the character of laws passed, and the motives of majorities who passed them, had been canvassed with great freedom: Against this he had not objected, and should never object. Nor did he deny that great license in debate was, and ought to be allowed on that floor. In point of precedent, however, the cases did not fit. He had examined a great number of memorials, and he had not found one in which a State Legislature had permitted themselves to indulge in reflecting on the motives of a committee which had reported a measure still pending. But the question was not even whether this was perfectly usual and parliamentary. It was not whether the committees of the House, performing, under the order of the House, such duties as had been assigned to them, were to be exempted from censure, but whether they should be held to vote a censure on themselves, and in asking to be relieved from such a necessity, they were told, gravely told, that their motion was an insult on Massachusetts.

Mr. ADAMS explained. If the gentleman from Georgia had not unfortunately been absent yesterday—he said unfortunately, because he understood it was from severe indisposition—he would have known that he [Mr. ADAMS] had begged leave to correct that expression. He would not be understood as saying that the motion to reconsider was an insult to the Legislature of Massachusetts, because, from his knowledge of the gentleman from Georgia, he knew he was incapable of intentionally offering an insult to any public body or any individual.

Mr. WILDE resumed. He was happy that the gentleman from Massachusetts did him justice. Nothing was, or could be further from his mind, than an intention to treat the legislative body of any State with the slightest disrespect. What motive could he have to insult the Legislature of Massachusetts? Men were usually influenced either by the hope of glory or the love of ease. Prudent and thriving statesmen—which he was not—animated by the first, could hardly fail to remember that the very respectable State of Massachusetts had thirteen votes; and he, who had all his life found the last “the sin that most easily besets,” could scarcely avoid reflecting that the peace which he loved would be little promoted by bringing down upon his head the displeasure of the zealous and talented delegation from Massachusetts.

So far from intending any disrespect to the Legislature of Massachusetts, he had not imagined that Legislature could believe he respected them less because he had this much respect for himself; that he could not acquiesce in an unjust censure which they had been induced to cast on him. Since the representatives of that State, however, had not considered it consistent with her dignity to allow him an opportunity of denying the justice of that censure by his vote, he would prove his respect for the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, by relieving them from the unpleasant predicament of appearing to introduce a grave question of State rights for the purpose of obtaining a petty triumph over an obscure individual. He would withdraw his motion for reconsideration, and in doing so, he hoped he was actuated by no worse a motive than that of returning good for evil.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. CLAYTON requested his colleague to allow him first an opportunity of replying to Mr. DAVIS, but Mr. W. said he could not consent to do so.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion made by Mr. PLUMMER, on the 18th January, ultimo, that the House do reconsider the vote taken on the 17th of January, ultimo, agreeing to the resolution reported by Mr. WILDE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, by which that committee was discharged from the consideration of the estimates, documents, and correspondence, transmitted to said committee by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in explanation of the increased appropriations asked for the service of the present year in that department, and by which the same were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to make certain inquiries therein set forth.

Mr. PLUMMER stated, at length, his reasons in support of his motion to reconsider; insisting that the course proposed was unusual, and that it would be best for the committee to prefer an accusation against the Commissioner, and then call for testimony to support it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE declined going into the subject at this time, or making a Wiscasset business of this matter. The committee wished further information, and could not get it without the power asked for. The House had granted it to them with great promptitude, and they should have exercised it before now, had not their proceedings been suspended by a pending motion to reconsider. The General Land Office had expended $20,000 within the last two years for extra clerk hire, besides an increased compensation to the standing clerks. Mr. W. concluded by demanding the previous question. He withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, who, though entertaining no doubt that the Commissioner would be perfectly prepared to meet the investigation, was in favor of granting the power.

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

[FEB. 2, 1833.]

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried; and, on the main question of reconsidering, the House voted unanimously in the negative.

So the power to send for persons and papers was granted.

The House passed to the orders of the day, and once more resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. APPLETON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the amendment offered by Mr. WARRE, of New York, to the original bill in its eighth and ninth sections.

[The bill proposed on cottons costing twenty-five cents the square yard an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. until March, 1834, and then a permanent duty of 20 per cent.; and on all other cottons 25 per cent. ad valorem until March, 1834, and then 20 per cent. permanent.]

Mr. WHITE's amendment proposed to make the reduction more gradual, as follows: 30 per cent. till March, 1834, 25 per cent. till March, 1835, and then 20 per cent. permanent.

Mr. APPLETON's amendment put the duty at 20 per cent. permanent, and added a proviso that on plains there should be a square yard duty of 7½ cents till March, 1834, and then 6 cents permanent; and on calicoes a square yard duty of 8½ cents till March, 1834, and then 8 cents permanent.]

Mr. A. supported his amendment by a speech, in which he contended that removing the specific duty must operate to destroy the cotton manufacture, especially that of printed cotton; inasmuch that the calico business must be immediately ruined. He believed that this country was supplied with all the cotton goods required for general consumption by our own manufacturers intrinsically cheaper than any other nation whatever. The capital, however, required was so great, that a factory turned out yearly goods only to the amount of half the capital invested. He admitted that this protection was not needed on that particular class of cottons which we now exported; but as the duty was laid on all, he thought it unwise to take it off. The slight difference as to time, proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from New York, was of no value. Ten years was the shortest period that would be any effectual relief.

Mr. WHITE said that there would be no need of heavy protection for an article we were exporting with success, and which was able to meet the British article in the foreign markets.

Mr. WICKLIFFE inquired of Mr. APPLETON as to the existing rate of profit in the cotton manufacture.

Mr. APPLETON replied that the Merrimac company, with a capital of a million and a half of dollars, had manufactured cottons to the amount of 6,000,000 yards per annum; but the proportion of goods manufactured per annum, was not more than 50 or 60 per cent. on the capital, on which business they had found a balance in their favor of but $57,000. Their profits were four per cent. for the last six months; this, however, was a season of peculiar depression. In 1831, when their business had been most prosperous, their profits for six months had gone as high as 10 per cent., being at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum. But nothing was more fluctuating. The only company now at Lowell whose stock was at par, were engaged in manufacturing for foreign markets. In fine goods, the caprice of fashion was such that prices could not be calculated upon.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thought that the statement just made presented one of the strongest arguments that could be adduced against the gentleman's own proposition. The only successful company, it seemed, were engaged in making cotton for exportation. Now, he would ask, was there any protection where these cottons went? Were there any protecting laws for these cottons in Mexico? in Brazil? in Asia Minor? Here then, after forty years of protection, in which the farmers of this country had paid an increased price for all their cotton goods, the manufacturers came forward and avowed that their most profitable business was supplying, not the home market, but nations ten thousand miles off. Mr. C. was for removing the duty, and placing their cottons here in our own market just as they were placed in markets abroad. The Glasgow manufacturers had no protection against those of Manchester; yet they, and even the poor people of Switzerland, were able to compete with the Manchester skill and capital; and surely our people could do the same. Mr. C. referred to the personal wealth of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the thriving state of the manufacturing towns, as proof that the business must be very profitable; deprecated the minimum system as deceptive; and preferred an ad valorem duty, as open and above board.

Mr. APPLETON complained of the disingenuous character of Mr. CAMBRELENG's argument, which seemed to assume that the manufacturers, while supplying foreign countries with cheap cottons, did not furnish them to their own countrymen as cheap. He complained of the personality of the reference to his own circumstances, and offered to transfer to him all his profits, if he would give him ten per cent. per annum on his investments to cover loss. He spoke for his constituents, and if parting with all his own property would permanently settle the present question, he would willingly give it up. The minimum system had been introduced by Southern gentlemen, and it was the unexampled success of that system in practice, which had rendered our cottons so cheap and so good. It was madness in the South to break down this interest, as it must destroy a valuable market for their own staples.

Mr. BURGESS said the question was, whether the cotton manufactures of this country should be preserved or destroyed. The 20 per cent. duty proposed by the bill was to be laid on the foreign cost of the article; and that would be put so low, that the duty would not amount to a cent a yard, although, with all the costs upon it, a yard of that cotton would be worth eight cents. This would let in floods of British goods, and prostrate our own. It was true that the English had reduced their protecting duty to 10 per cent.; but such was the maturity of the manufacture, and the strictness of their revenue laws, that that duty was a perfect barrier against all foreign competition. Her surplus she sent here, and sacrificed at any price, because it would be a dead loss at home; and, besides this, the stock of bankrupts was purchased under the hammer in England for next to nothing, paid little duty, and was then poured into our auction stores. If the Government intended to secure the home market, the only way to do so was to render the duty prohibitory.

Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, insisted that the manufacturers asked a protection which no government could grant. The evil of which they complained grew out of protection itself. The moment there was a diminution of foreign supply, the manufacturer pressed on the consumer: prices rose; high prices produced an over importation; this occasioned a glut; prices instantly fell, and both importer and manufacturer suffered together. If 20 per cent. protection, added to all the cost of importation, after two or three years to prepare for the change, was not enough to sustain the manufacture, then, in the name of God, let it go down. Mr. B. protested with vehemence against the square yard duty, as pressing upon the poor, and relieving the rich.

Mr. E. EVERETT now sent to the Clerk's table the remonstrance of the Lowell manufacturing company, which was read.

FEB. 2, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

Mr. E. said he had received letters from gentlemen of the highest respectability, and for whose veracity he would pledge his own, declaring that if the bill should pass as reported, cotton manufactures must immediately go down. Mr. E. protested against the impolicy of destroying so great an interest just after it had surmounted its first difficulties. A fact had just come to his knowledge, of great importance; which was, that the British Government had recently levied on foreign printed cotton goods a protecting duty of 3½d. sterling per square yard. Was it unreasonable that our comparatively infant manufactures should ask protection, when those of Great Britain herself, so affluent in capital and skill, were found to need it. As to the comparison between a specific and an ad valorem duty in making it, it must always be remembered that, in this country, an ad valorem duty, owing to the difficulty of its collection, was not in practice worth more than half its nominal amount.

Mr. WILDE replied to the remark of Mr. APPLETON, in respect to the minimum system, that it had not been introduced to protect manufactures, but to save specie from going to the East Indies to purchase cottons. The protection at first was confined to coarse cottons. That business being overdone, the manufacturers had gone to the making and printing of finer goods. But this they had done at their own risk. Mr. W. inveighed against minimum duties. Let the tax be open and above board.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, went into an explanation and defence of the minimum system; and inveighed against the gross fraud by which ad valorem duties were constantly evaded. This was the reason why so many specific duties had been laid, and why the square yard duty had been introduced. The destruction produced by this bill would fall, not on the wealthy manufacturer, but on the laborious people whom he employed, and who had no other capital than the hands which God had given them. Their wages were such as to secure to them the comforts of life; but if protection should be removed, and the establishments proceeded, they could have no other resort than to cut down the wages until the laborers in this country were assimilated to the ignorant, brutal, and squalid poor, who in England shared their time between the factory and the poor house.

Mr. D. remonstrated against so fatal an injury to our country. The equivalent for all this was to be our getting foreign calicoes a few cents a yard cheaper. But even this Mr. D. denied would be the result, because the withdrawing of our own goods to the amount of thirty millions of dollars would inevitably operate to raise prices. Reduction had been tried upon salt; and was salt any cheaper? It had been tried on tea and coffee; were tea and coffee any cheaper? Who was it that complained of the duty on sugar? It was the planters of Cuba. And why? Because when our products pressed hard upon foreign competition, our protecting duty was paid chiefly by the foreigner.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, denying that ad valorem duties depended on the honesty of invoices, inasmuch as the goods had to be appraised. He had endeavored to repress fraud, and had formerly drawn a bill for that purpose; and was still ready to go any length for its suppression. He inveighed against all square yard duties. Let the manufacturers say what protection they must have, and let them have it ad valorem.

Mr. DAVIS denied that all the goods were appraised. The appraiser examined but one bale out of twenty; and the grossest frauds still continued. There was a specific duty on iron, why not on cottons and woollens? So enormous had these frauds been, that three-fourths of the American merchants had been driven out of the market. He was happy that the gentleman from New York would aid him in suppressing frauds, as he believed no gentleman was more familiar with the manner in which they were committed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there was one effectual way to prevent these frauds, and that was to reduce the duties to a moderate amount. However familiar he might be with the manner in which frauds were committed, he could assure the gentleman from Massachusetts that whenever he should see him honestly engaged in a sincere attempt to put them down, he would concur in the design.

Mr. CLAYTON, though he supposed that the testimony of a manufacturer from the South of the Potomac would not be entitled to the same credit as that of those at the North, would nevertheless offer his own testimony as a manufacturer, that the manufactures of the South could do without such a protection as was proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It might be an uncommon spectacle in that House to see a manufacturer voting against his own interest; for he believed that, with many of those who voted for protection, it was a case of life and death.

Mr. DAVIS inquired whether the gentleman alluded to him.

Mr. CLAYTON replied in the negative.

Mr. DAVIS said that he did not own, and never had owned, a dollar's worth of manufacturing property in his life.

Mr. CLAYTON said that, if there were any other gentlemen who wished to put a similar inquiry, let them come forward and he would answer them; or he would consent that all those who were personally interested should be excused from voting.

Mr. APPLETON inquired whether the gentleman included those from the South, the value of whose cotton crop was, according to their own statement, vitally concerned in the destruction of the protective system.

Mr. CLAYTON said he had not intended to produce any excitement, but as he was himself a manufacturer, and the question should be put whether protecting duties should be increased, he should feel bound to go without the bar. But he presumed he was at liberty to vote against himself. The existing protection gave him the monopoly of the State of Georgia, and enabled him to make a profit of fifty per cent. on cotton cloth at ten and twelve cents a yard. If a square yard duty of seven and a half cents should be added, as was now proposed, what would his profit be then? The gentlemen of the North wanted a law which should be equal to the advantage the European manufacturer had in the cheapness of food, &c. Now, with the duty of seven and a half cents, those Northern manufacturers had made cloth, and sold it at the door of his factory at six cents per yard. At what rate could it be got, should free trade be established? The gentleman from Massachusetts had made an eloquent appeal against reducing American labor, and compelling the operatives to do without the comforts of life. That very condition the gentleman so much dreaded was now the condition of Mr. C.'s constituents. If gentlemen needed such a protection to carry on their manufactures, why not impose the tax upon their own State, under a State law? Why make the South pay for it? Supposing Georgia and Massachusetts to be the only States in the Union, would it be fair to make Georgia pay a tax to support Massachusetts?

If their fields produced cloth and hats, and all other necessities of life, growing on bushes, would it be fair to make them pay a tax on these articles for the benefit of Massachusetts? Would not this reduce Georgia to the state of a colony? If the bill would destroy the Northern factories, let the operatives go to the West. It was declared that the Government had a right to bring down the slave labor of the South to a level with the free labor of the North; id est, that the Southern capital should be reduced in value till it was on a level with Northern capital. If so, it was time the South knew it. The Southern climate produced, in cotton, rice, tobacco, and sugar, about forty-five millions of dollars; and it was to get at this amount that the Northern capitalist seized upon the Government as an instrument, and enacted the tariff law. The South got this out of the earth by their slaves, and yet they were told that slavery was the cause of all their trouble. The truth was, that their slaves were, in fact, the slaves of the North. It was their slaves that sailed the Northern ships and ran the Northern spindles. Their slaves were their machinery, and they had as good a right to profit by them as Northern men had by the machinery they employed. It was not slavery that produced the depression of the South; it was the robbing the Southern planter of one-half he earned, to swell the profits of the Northern manufacturer.

Mr. STEWART replied that the gentleman had made a most excellent tariff speech. He had informed the House that the business of manufacturing at the South realized a profit of fifty per cent. He presumed it was by slave labor.

Mr. CLAYTON said that his hands were part white and part black; but as a white man in a factory was no better than a slave, the gentleman might call it all slave labor.

Mr. STEWART resumed. If slave labor was worth fifty per cent, why could not the South turn its labor to manufactures? Southern gentlemen told the House that slave labor employed on cotton and rice was worth but five per cent. If in a factory it would bring fifty per cent., who but a madman would keep it in the field? Could any man believe the two statements? Were men any where so blind? Now he put the gentleman on the horns of a dilemma. Either slave labor employed on cotton and rice yielded a profit of fifty per cent., or else manufacturing did not yield that profit. The gentleman might choose which horn he liked. If slave labor was worth that price, why did the South complain? He should like the gentleman to explain.

Mr. CLAYTON replied that his factory was the only one in Georgia; it might, therefore, be expected to do a better business than was done where factories were so numerous as at the North. He believed there were one hundred and fifty in Rhode Island. There had been a time when these factories realized fifty per cent.

Mr. APPLETON: Never.

Mr. CLAYTON continued. Yet those factories were now suffering. So it will be by and by, in Georgia. Others would come in, and there would be bankruptcies as at the North. For his part he should be glad to get out of it.

Mr. STEWART said that here again the gentleman had made an excellent tariff speech. Profits in Georgia were now enormous, but they were to come down. Yes; and what was to bring them down? Competition. This was the very ground the friends of the tariff had always taken. This had brought cottons down, though the protection still continued. The gentleman had said that the protecting duty gave him the monopoly of Georgia. How so? Could not the Northern manufacturer come and sit down by his side; and then where was his monopoly? A distinguished manufacturer from Rhode Island would guaranty to any gentleman half a million of dollars worth of manufacturing property there at an advance of six per cent.; yet at the South it brought fifty! The gentleman had further said, that, although the protecting duty was seven and a half cents, yet the Northern manufacturer had sold cotton at six cents. According to the gentleman's doctrine, as the protecting duty went into the price, they must have given the cotton away, and paid a cent and a half for the pleasure of doing so. If slave labor brought fifty per cent. he thought the South might, in reason, give up something in a spirit of compromise.

Mr. S. went on to remark on the effect of protection on the interest of agriculture; inveighed against reducing our laborers to a level with those of Switzerland and Ireland, and related an anecdote of some Irish operatives who had come over here, and, by continuing to live as they had done at home, had laid up a handsome little fortune out of their wages as factory hands.

After some remarks in reply to Mr. CAMERLUNG and Mr. WILDE, Mr. S. expressed his hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would, as he had given notice, test the sense of the committee, by moving to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The debate was further continued by Mr. VERPLANCK, and Mr. CLAYTON, who made a brief reply to Mr. STEWART; when, on motion of Mr. DEARBORN, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, FEB. 4.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEISTER, of Pennsylvania, presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that slavery may be abolished within the District of Columbia.

Mr. H. said he had had forwarded to him seven petitions of the same tenor, containing the signatures of more than one thousand citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of a law or laws for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Although it was not likely, at this late period of the session, and at a time when the attention of the National Legislature is engaged on subjects of primary and paramount importance, that any action could be expected during its present session, in reference to the subject matter of the petitions he held in his hand—yet every philanthropist might justly cherish the hope that the time was not remote when the Congress of the United States would deem it not unworthy of their serious consideration to devise some practicable scheme for the gradual abolition of slavery, and its worse concomitant, the slave trade, in this District.

When we reflect, sir, for a moment, (said Mr. H.) on the gross inconsistency of the theory and practice of our Government, and look to the sentiment contained in that sacred instrument, the Declaration of our Independence, that all men are born free and independent, "with certain inalienable rights, amongst which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;" and see that, in practice, there exists the most abject slavery in this boasted land of liberty, and that, too, at the very portals of your hall of legislation, and in these "ten miles square," over which exclusive legislation has been confided to Congress—an anomaly such as this may be unhesitatingly pronounced unprecedented in any country, at the present or any other period of time.

We all know, said Mr. H., how the evils of slavery were entailed upon our country; that it is not a matter of censure, but of regret; and how delicate a subject it is to touch, or to legislate upon. And he would be among the last of those whose misguided zeal might desire Congress to interfere in any manner with this species of property within any of the States of this Union.

But whatever others might think with regard to the propriety of petitions coming from any other source than from the people of this District on a subject in which they alone may be supposed to be interested, he had no hesitation in saying that amongst the names attached to these petitions, there are those of men inferior to none in estimating the sacred rights of private property, and in a discriminating knowledge of legitimate subjects to be brought here for the consideration of this honorable body. And he would add that, in his humble belief, in common with theirs, the fair fame and character of the whole nation is deeply involved in the continuance of slavery and the slave trade in this District; and that the subject merited, and he trusted it would receive, the deliberate attention and consideration of this body, at no very remote period. He moved their reference, without reading, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On this motion, Mr. MASON, of Va. demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ADAMS desired the reading of the memorial, and it was read accordingly.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MASON observed, that this memorial came from persons not interested personally in the question of negro slavery; and the language of the memorial, and the remarks with which its presentation had been accompanied, referred to the existence of slavery very generally; and though the gentleman from Pennsylvania disclaimed any wish that Congress should abolish it in the States, yet this was but the commencement of a series of measures which tended to that result. It would be time enough for Congress to act respecting the District of Columbia when the people of the District should themselves request it.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, moved to lay the memorial upon the table.

Mr. DENNY observed that many similar memorials had already gone to the same committee.

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, said he was as much opposed to all impertinent interference by States not interested in slave property with the tenure of that property in the slave-holding States as his colleague could be; but the people of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, and all the Northern States, were as much concerned in all matters relating to the District of Columbia as those of the Southern States, and therefore the petition was perfectly regular, and such as the petitioners had a right to prefer, and should therefore be treated as other petitions were.

Mr. ADAMS said that he hoped the question would be taken, if the gentleman from Virginia should not, on reflection, conclude to withdraw his call for the yeas and nays. If he would withdraw it, he would confer a benefit upon the House and the country, by preventing a very unpleasant debate. Mr. A. had last session presented fifteen memorials of a similar tenor with this one; they had all gone to the Committee on the District. A short report had soon followed, and then the subject was heard of no more during the session. Mr. A., though not in favor of the sentiments expressed in the memorial, was opposed to laying it on the table, as being disrespectful to the petitioners. The right of petitioning was guaranteed by the constitution, and nothing but very extraordinary circumstances should induce the House to treat a petition with disrespect.

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, after a word or two, renewed the motion to lay the memorial on the table. On this motion Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays. They were taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 75, nays 98. So the House refused to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. MASON then withdrew his opposition, and the memorial was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The House passed to the orders of the day, and again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WYNN in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. WARD, of New York, addressed the committee in support of the bill. He said it was not his intention to detain the committee with any remarks of his, either upon the bill under consideration or upon the several amendments which had been submitted to it. He had considered the present a crisis for prompt and decisive action, and had made up his mind to record his vote in favor of almost any modification of the tariff at this session, with a view of reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government, and leaving it to those who were in favor of raising more money from the people than could be wanted to justify themselves to the people by their speeches if they could. And, sir, (said Mr. W.) I should not now have risen for the purpose of submitting any remarks upon the bill at this time, but for the speech which the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILSON] made a few days since on this bill, when he took occasion to read a paragraph from a Baltimore newspaper, wherein it was stated that the Governor of the State of New York had written to the friends of Mr. Van Buren in Congress from that State to vote against this bill. I am now, however, entirely satisfied, from the explanation which that honorable gentleman has since made, and I take great pleasure in making this acknowledgment, that he did not intend to make the remarks he did in any spirit of unkindness. But, sir, as one of the Representatives of this House from that State, I feel it to be my duty to say that my vote on this bill will be, as I hope it ever has been, based upon principle, and not influenced in the slightest degree by considerations of personal favor to any man. And, sir, I take this occasion further to remark, that if I had father a candidate for the Presidency, and I believed I could promote, or even secure, his election to that high office by voting against a bill, the rejection of which might hazard the prosperity of our free and happy Union, I have no fear that I should hesitate between duty and affection, even in such a case. And I have that confidence in the intelligence, honor, and patriotism of my colleagues, as I have in the people of my State, that I firmly believe they require no prompting from personal feeling or party considerations to enable them to do their duty on this occasion to their State and their country.

The charge that the Governor had written the letter referred to is without the slightest foundation; the distinguished individual now in the chair of that State is incapable of such an interference in the legislation of the nation, either upon the great question now before us or on any other.

I feel it my duty to state that I am decidedly in favor of a tariff of protection: It is in mind constitutional and useful; and although it may have borne hard for a time upon certain sections of our country, yet I have never entertained the belief, that it has in any respect injured any portion of the nation, yet I am so much attached to the Union, that I would unhesitatingly (without abandoning the right to protect domestic industry, by countervailing foreign legislation,) reduce the rate of duties to the requirements of the Government. It is an abuse of the protecting principle to apply it to raise a revenue not needed.

I had the honor of a seat in this House in 1828, and I take pleasure in stating that I recorded my vote against the act of that year, because I then considered that sufficient protection was given to every interest under the act of 1824, and because I considered, and subsequent events have satisfied me of the fact, that that bill was brought before us with a view to political effect, and to have a direct bearing on the then pending presidential election. And I religiously believe that we should not now have been involved in the difficulties we are, had it not been for the passage of that act. I have always entertained the opinion that no national measure should be connected in the slightest degree with the politics of the day; that legislating for particular occasions and to carry particular points, was as unjust as it was mischievous.

During the debate on the bill under consideration we have heard gentlemen upon this floor allege (as their principal reason why they should vote for or against this bill) that they considered themselves bound to sustain the interest of their immediate constituents; and whilst I believe that they were actuated by the purest of motives in making the declaration, still I must be permitted to say that in my judgment we do not come here as representatives solely of any particular section of our country, or of any particular interest; but, on the contrary, as the representatives of the whole Union. Partial, it is true, with respect to the interest of a portion, but anxious to encourage and sustain the prosperity of the whole; neither bound nor allowed to sacrifice the great public interest of the country to that of our immediate constituents, even if they could be so unjust as (which I am proud to know mine are not) to require it.

However, since gentlemen have been permitted to speak of the interests of their immediate constituents, I trust that I may be indulged in observing that, were my vote to be influenced by such motives, I feel persuaded that I should be promoting the interest of my constituents by voting for the bill under consideration, with the amendment recently submitted to it by my honorable colleague who sits before me, [Mr. WARR], which relieves the bill from all of its exceptionable features. For, sir, I believe that the existing tariff now bears as heavily upon the district I have the honor to represent, as upon any other section of our country. I admit, sir, that the people in that district are not only reputed, but they are in fact, a thriving people, and many of them have amassed great wealth.

As regards the agricultural part of that community, I have to observe that they now enjoy one of the best markets for their products that we have in this country. Every thing that they grow upon their farms is daily sent to the city of New York, which is now acknowledged to be the first commercial emporium of this country, and they receive therefor, in return, the highest cash price. Upon the prosperity of that commercial city, upon its increase in wealth and population, it must be manifest that their hopes, and that of their children, depend; and that city would dwindle into comparative insignificance were it not for the commerce of the country; consequently the interest of the people in that district is intimately connected with the interest of that great emporium. Strike that city out of existence, or break up or impair its commercial prosperity, and you would thereby deprive them of their market, and the advantages they now enjoy.

It is perhaps proper that I should observe, in connexion with the subject, that the indirect tax which is now drawn from that district under the existing tariff laws on foreign articles consumed by them, will amount to upwards of $100,000 annually; a sum which, it seems to me, would be paid by them with great reluctance, were it levied upon their lands and tenements; and yet it is a tax in fact, as much so as though it was thus levied and collected.

But, sir, notwithstanding they have heretofore paid this onerous tax to the Government, and that too without receiving any thing in return in the shape of protection, except it be the protection given to the commerce of the country, and the protection extended to them by the strong arm of the Federal Government, in securing to them the enjoyment of their absolute rights, i. e. that of personal security, personal liberty, and private property, yet they have never been heard to complain of the several tariff laws heretofore passed, and which were passed with a view to raise the revenue for the extinguishment of the debt created by the war of the revolution, the war of 1812, and the necessary expenditure of the Government.

It does not follow, sir, that they would bear with equal patience such a burden when these objects are accomplished: and when those who administer the Government say of any tax upon the people that it is unnecessary, I am unable to imagine how I could excuse myself for voting for it.

Sir, we have heard much with respect to the condition of the people in the Southern section, and but little with respect to the condition of the people of the Eastern, Middle, and Western sections of our country, except it be the operations in the manufacturing establishments. If, sir, the agriculturists are more prosperous in those sections of the country than they are at the South, it depends, in my humble opinion, entirely upon themselves; for, sir, a farmer starting in life in these sections of the country of the age of twenty-one years, upon a farm of from one hundred to three or four hundred acres, will be constrained to mortgage it in the beginning for near its value, and by laboring with his own hands, and by adopting the most rigid economy, he finds himself, at the close of the year, not only able to pay his proportion of the taxes to the State and General Governments, but after having expended liberally for the support of his family and the education of his children, he has a surplus left sufficient to pay the interest on the debt created by him and a portion of the principal; and in pursuing this course, year after year, he finds himself at last, after a well spent life, out of debt; and he then calls his farm his own. The children, following the example of their fathers, pursue the same course, and their labors and perseverance are in like manner rewarded.

If, sir, we follow those of our citizens who emigrate to the West; see them settle upon the land purchased by the scanty means they may have left after they shall have reached the spot of their choice; observe the forest fall before their axe; the ground cleared for their crops; the log house first built, and then, in the course of a few years, the more stately mansion erected to supply its place; and it seems to me that it must be admitted that their sufferings are infinitely greater than that of any portion of our Southern brethren; and yet, sir, these pioneers have contributed largely to the expenditures of the Government, and that without a murmur.

I do not wish to be understood as casting the slightest reproach upon our Southern brethren on account of their alleged sufferings and grievances, nor have I adverted to it in the spirit of unkindness; and while I admit that they have had cause of complaint, yet, I consider that they have not only magnified their complaints, but they do not attribute the cause to the right source.

But to return to the subject. It appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the whole of the national debt which remained unpaid at the commencement of the present year amounted only to seven million sixteen thousand dollars; a sum less than the market value of the stock of the Bank of the United States owned by the Government; consequently it may fairly be conceded, that we can say we have no longer a public debt. The Committee of Ways and Means, in their report on the bill under consideration, have truly observed that,

"The time and the occasion, whilst they are fitted to awaken the noblest feelings of the patriot, and to give confidence and ardor to the principles and hopes of every friend of republican institutions, call also upon us, with equal force, to discharge the weighty, honorable, and practicable duties to which we have been cordially invited by our Chief Magistrate—the removal of those financial 'burdens which may be found to fall unequally upon any,' and 'the reduction of the revenue to such a limit as shall be consistent with the simplicity of an economical Government, and necessary to an efficient public service.'"

As the Government, therefore, has more means in the Treasury than sufficient to pay off and extinguish every dollar of the national debt; and as the national revenue from customs and other sources will amount, under the present tariff law, to nearly thirty millions annually; whilst the annual expenses of the Government, hereafter, will not exceed fifteen millions annually, it seems to me that no solid objection can be raised against a reduction of duties at this time. The committee, in their report already alluded to on that subject, have made use of this strong language: "To this annual amount of fifteen millions must the revenue be reduced. All beyond this must be a needless burden upon the people; a tax falling directly or indirectly upon the land and labor of the country, certainly injurious in its effects, and probably unequal; enriching the treasury only to divide and distract our public councils, by tempting to expenditures of doubtful constitutional right, or inconsistent with the simplicity of republican institutions, staining their purity and hazarding their permanency."

The Tariff Bill.

The honorable gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. INgersoll,] one of the Committee of Ways and Means, it is true, seems to doubt the accuracy of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the means now in the treasury for the extinguishment of the national debt. But, although I entertain the highest respect for the talents of that able representative, yet, sir, when his opinion is put in opposition to the distinguished individual at the head of the Treasury Department, and that opinion is confirmed by the chairman and all the members of that committee, except himself, I feel constrained to believe the Secretary when he assures us that, unless something is now done to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, we shall have, at the commencement of the next year, from five to nine millions remaining in the treasury unappropriated. And, unless Congress now interposes, the receipts will roll up and retain a dangerous surplus in the treasury, which, it is to be apprehended, may endanger the peace of the country and the permanency of the Union itself, in the struggle for its distribution. And, sir, it is a fact worthy of observation, that those gentlemen who now oppose this bill all concur in this opinion.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Choate,] made use of the following observation in his speech in this House on that subject a few days since:

"A vote of the House this morning (said that honorable gentleman) seems to indicate that our minds are not yet fully made up on the practicability, or inexpediency, or right, of effecting such a distribution. [Alluding to a division of the surplus funds among the States.] On the other hand, the accumulation of money annually in the hands of the Government is still less to be thought of. Upon this point the opinion and practice of all modern statesmen are decided and uniform. No Government lays up gold or silver, or any other form of wealth in its coffers."

Unless we pass some bill at this time, reducing the revenue, Congress ought, at least, to make some disposition now with respect to the surplus money which will be accumulating during the present year; and, I would ask, what shall be done with it? Shall we pass a law authorizing commissioners of loans to be appointed in the several counties in this Union for the purpose of loaning out the money to the public on bond and mortgage? No; for in a few years the whole landed property in the country would be mortgaged to the Government. Shall we, then, pass a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to invest it in the stocks of the incorporated companies? No; for we should thereby interfere with the rights of the citizens, and reduce their income upon the stocks they now hold.

What, then, shall be done with it? I answer, there is, sir, but one opinion with respect to it; and in that opinion all of those who have opposed, most strenuously opposed, the passage of this bill, concur. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Choate] makes use of the following able remarks in relation to it:

"I consider it to be the settled opinion of the country (says that gentleman) that the national revenue ought to be restricted to, and measured by, the necessary annual expenditure of the Government, out of debt, and economically administered. The public demand is, I think, that the tariff be so constructed as to yield that amount of revenue and no more; and if the tariff of the last session shall be found, on a full experiment, to yield more than that, sooner or later it must, of course, be altered. In other words, if fifteen millions a year will administer the Government, fifteen millions are all which we can permanently collect from imposts."

This, sir, is the opinion of one who has taken a decided ground against the passage of any bill at this session. And, sir, it is worthy of remark, that all who have opposed it have concurred in the same opinion.

And now, sir, since this point cannot be controverted, why not let us set about adjusting the tariff now? I do not wish to be considered the advocate of the bill in the shape it was reported by the committee, but am willing to vote for the amendment proposed by my colleague, [Mr. Wirtz,] and if that is not deemed by the friends of our manufacturing interest a sufficient protection, then I call upon them to present us with such an amendment as will afford them as ample a protection as the amount required for the national expenditure will justify. And, sir, if I may be permitted to take the liberty which has been taken by other gentlemen on this floor, that of adverting to the observations of gentlemen who are not members of this House, but who are now present, and without the bar, then I can assure the committee that I have been informed by a manufacturing gentleman of high standing in this country, and one who has a large capital at stake in that interest, that he could prepare such an amendment to the bill as would not only be acceded to by the members from the Southern and Eastern sections of the country, but such an one as would afford ample protection to the manufacturers; and at his instance I introduced the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means, and received from the chairman of that committee for answer that, so far as regarded himself, he was willing to make any fair and honorable concession or compromise of the question. Since, then, it is in the power of the manufacturers to present such an amendment, I call upon the friends of that interest to come forward at this time with it and I will give it my cordial support.

The chief objections which have been raised by those opposed to this bill against the passage of any modified tariff at this session are, first, that the act of 1832 has not yet gone into operation.

And, sir, is that a solid objection against our acting upon the subject now? I should think not. The law of the last year, it is true, has not yet gone into operation, and therefore it is the same as though no law had passed at that time in reference to it. The subject was ably discussed in this House, which then consisted of the same members. We have therefore the benefit not only of all the light which was communicated to us at that session fresh in our minds, but we have this further and important fact presented to us, and already adverted to, namely, that unless we pass an act at this session, further modifying the tariff, the revenue will exceed by several millions the expenses of the Government the ensuing year.

If, sir, we believe the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and we must repose confidence somewhere, then, sir, it seems to me that no rational objection can be raised against the passage of a bill now.

The next and principal objection which has been urged against the passage of any bill at this session is, because South Carolina has prospectively nullified the law of last session. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Choate,] whose speech I have already referred to, makes use of the following observations in relation to that objection:

"It would be mere affectation in me," says that gentleman, "sir, to pretend not to see that this bill is introduced because South Carolina has prospectively nullified the law which we made in pari materia, five months ago. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means does not, to be sure, say this in his speech, or in his report, but there is not a man, woman, or child, in the United States, who does not know it."

I am free to admit that it is deeply to be lamented that resistance has been so threatened and manifested, that it is difficult to settle this question without adopting measures to which we may seem to have been driven by violence rather than to have been led by the calm consideration of political wisdom. But this imputation, which the folly or the pride of others may cast upon us, ought not to shake our firmness. We ought to do right, and disregard what may be thought or said of our motives. We ought to proceed to that adjustment of a great measure which the condition of the country and the welfare of the whole may seem to demand.

Again, it has been stated on this floor, during the course of the debate, that the President does not desire the passage of the bill at this session; and this has been urged by those opposed to the measure as another objection against it.

There is not, in my opinion, the slightest foundation for this last objection, because it is well known that, in his message which he sent to both Houses of Congress in December last, after adverting to the fact, and congratulating his fellow-citizens on the near approach of the extinguishment of the public debt, he recommended the subject to Congress in the following words:

"The final removal of this great burden [alluding to the public debt,] from our resources, affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defence which the constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for them. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury it will be seen that, after the present year, 1831, such a reduction may be made to a considerable extent, and the subject is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in the hope that the combined wisdom of the representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall unequally upon any, and as may promote all the great interests of the community.

That part of the message which recommends a further reduction of the tariff was referred by the House to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that committee, in compliance with that recommendation reported the bill now under consideration.

The President has, therefore, met the question, as he has always met every thing, with firmness. He is not a man to shrink from the responsibility he has thus assumed. He has discharged his duty to his country, fearless of any miserable imputation that folly might cast upon his motives. And he has given the strongest illustration that he possesses the bold and independent bearing, the upright and honorable perseverance, that the times require. Indeed, there seems to be but one opinion now among the friends of the Union with respect to that distinguished individual, and that is, that in these perilous times, when the mania of change is shedding its disastrous mildews over our own highly favored land, that it is a source of gratulation that we have a tried and talented Chief Magistrate in the chair of State, whose firmness may be compared to the rock by the sea shore, at whose base the mighty billows may dash in vain, and around whose head the gathering tempest may burst without injury.

Nor need we fear to be reproached with cowardly yielding to violence and menace, in passing this bill, when the same reproach must fall on him who recommended it; and such a reproach upon such a man would be ridiculous. No, sir, rather let us follow the example of magnanimity he has set us; like him, and like the rock against which the tempest vainly beats, let us disregard the assaults that may be made upon our motives; and standing firm and erect at the post of duty, we shall be partakers with him of the high rewards of patriotism—the approbation of our consciences, and the thanks of a country delivered from anarchy and blood.

The President having discharged his duty, it becomes those who approve of the measures he has recommended, to sustain him. We have therefore much to do. But it has been said on this floor, that we ought not to pass a bill at this time modifying the tariff, because it will be alleged that we have been coerced into the measure. Sir, in the present crisis of our country, it may be well to review the course and the principles of sages and patriots of other days, and see whether, in the discharge of a patriotic duty, they feared to encounter suspicion and reproach for their country's deliverance.

If those men who founded our republic wavered not in their purpose when the terrors and ignominy of the scaffold were before them, when they knew that their blood must cement the foundation of the structure they reared, and they themselves become the first sacrifice in the temple of liberty which they dedicated, and in which we worship, shall we be dismayed; we who have lived to see beyond the clouds that were then shrouding their footsteps? Lost, it seems to me, must he be to every generous, every patriotic emotion, who is not ready to come up with heart and hand to this work. There is no room for wavering. We are acting for our country, and our motto should be "Our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country." We have been told, that on the decision of this question, on our prudence and energy may depend the existence of these States, or at least their Union; and to us there is no distinction between existence and union. If, then, so much may depend upon our wisdom, how deeply important that we now act with coolness and candor, remembering that we must answer for the conclusions at which we arrive, at the bar of a redeemed or a ruined nation.

We have heard it asserted in the course of this debate by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] who, I have no doubt, was influenced by the purest of motives, that he would rather see the land stained, and our rivers flow, with American blood, than see the constitution of the United States broken down or impaired in the slightest degree. Sir, I hope and trust we shall never live to see the happening of either event. Indeed, I should, so far as regards myself, much rather settle the question now, and save our constitution, than that the life of even one solitary individual should fall a sacrifice through our neglect or omission to do our duty at this time.

From the course the debate has taken, the subject, I regret to say, has now assumed a solemn aspect. If it is not to be read in the solemnity with which we daily assemble, or the voice and countenances of each member of this House, it will be discovered by the numerous public meetings held throughout our country, the agitated state which now exists in the public mind, and by the great number of gentlemen of distinction who are now here from every section of our country inquiring what is to be done to save our Union.

The evidence is written on every heart, that we are on the brink of an awful precipice; and whether we shall escape or be dashed into the depths below, He only knows who rules in the heavens and governs the nations upon earth.

We boast, and well we may boast, of our ancestry of statesmen, and heroes, and martyrs in our country's cause that no soil but our own has reared; and shall we, who sit here, be regardless of our responsibility, and forgetful that there is intrusted to us all that the patriot holds sacred—all that we cherish and love? Our country is in danger; let patriotism awake; dead to every other feeling, to every little and local interest, let us obey its holy impulse, and save our country.

The Tariff Bill.

In this place of high responsibility we must act.

For one, I would gladly relinquish my seat to the humblest of my countrymen who would bring more prudence and intelligence to this momentous question. But, while I say this, I would yield to no one in sincerity of heart, and devotion to the peace and prosperity of the proudest land under heaven.

On us, at this moment, are fixed the eyes and the hopes of this great people; they have trembled as they foresaw this coming evil, but they had no power to avert it; the strength is delegated to us, and for them we must act.

And not only are the eyes of our country fixed on us, but the friends of the Union in that State on which the severest of the impending evils must fall are now asking our protection, and look forward to the result of our councils with intense anxiety.

Sir, we have heard within these walls the language and resentful feeling addressed to the misguided people of that State. Shall we feel indignation towards the majority of that people, or the evil counsellors that have misled them, and have we no sympathy for a noble and true hearted minority; a minority that remembers they are Americans; that look upon the nation whose representatives we are, not as a foreign lord with which they may contract and dissolve alliances at pleasure, but as their own, their native land, to which they owe an allegiance as absolute and as dear as that which binds them to the spot of their birth; a minority that remembers they have sworn allegiance, not only to a part but to the whole of that country which all are proud to call their own, and who declare themselves ready to suffer all the persecutions and oppressions that are prepared for them, rather than swerve from their sworn allegiance? Sir, there are no men upon the face of the earth more deserving the sympathy of the brave and patriotic, whether we consider the perils to which they are exposed, or the spirit with which they meet it, than the friends of our great Union, in South Carolina. Pass this bill, and you save them from a state in which it is to be apprehended they must either engage in deadly strife with their brethren, or submit to an usurpation the most cruel and unrelenting. Sir, I confess, I am not insensible to this claim on my sympathy; and while I avow my desire, by the passage of this bill, to give relief to them and peace to our whole land, I do avow that I am ready to give to the administration of the General Government (as I trust we shall do) the most ample powers for their protection, that it may be enabled to defend this gallant and patriotic minority from its oppressors, and to save, with the shield of the Union, those who have dared to be faithful to the Union.

And when an appeal is made to the patriotism of our fellow-citizens, in behalf of the institutions of our country, when they are told that their constitution is in danger; that their peace and prosperity will be blighted; their republican principles trampled upon; their hopes of happiness in their beloved land forever blasted; tell them this, and a spirit would go forth rousing the sons of liberty in their strength, and millions would go forth and beg the privilege of dying as their fathers died, and of leaving to their children the legacy of a martyr's name.

But may we not hope, that at this time every man will come up with a high devoted spirit of patriot feeling, and sacrifice on the altar of the common welfare every prejudice that will weaken or distract at such a crisis?

In such a spirit as this was the independence achieved; in such a spirit was our constitution framed; and both have been generously maintained until the present time, when the want of this spirit threatens to sap the foundations of the one, and blot out the existence of the other.

It is a proud reflection to know that our prosperity at present, and our prospect for the future, all unite in teaching us that we are destined to become a great, as we are a glorious, nation. The sun in his course shines not on a prouder land than ours; it visits no happier clime; his beams rest on the mansion of the rich, and he is blessed and protected in the enjoyment of his honest and hard-earned wealth. His rays shine on the thatched roof of the peasant, and he thanks God for his cot and his home, in this his native or adopted land. In the arts and sciences we have prospered, and we are advancing with rapid steps to a high place among the nations of the earth. And this great charge is committed to our trust, to be given to posterity, with none of its glory obscured; robbed of none of the jewels of its crown.

It is well known that we are making the grand experiment of self-government, and on our success or failure hang the hopes of a rising world. There have been Governments styled republics, and ruled by tyrants who taught the people that they were free, while the chains were forging for their necks. Rome was a republic; but liberty there was only a name for licentiousness, or a cloak for despotism. Greece was a republic; while a demagogue swayed the ignorant and deluded multitude, and needed but a sceptre to make him a king.

But where are these republics? The sepulchre of nations is inscribed with their epitaph. The flames that consumed their foundations still burn as beacons to warn us of their fate. They perished (as we must perish, if we ever perish) by their own hands. Invincible in arms, a world could not enslave them, while the factious spirit of a few spread the elements of discord among the people, and rendered them an easy prey to a foreign enemy. And thus it may be with us. Sunder the cords that unite us together; erect each State into an independent nation; arouse the jealousy and ill will and contention, that would naturally spring from such a state of things, and the last ray of liberty is extinguished.

I feel reluctant to believe that the seeds of disunion are, at this early period of our existence as a nation, sown in our republic, or that a people who govern themselves cannot be their own rulers; and, I trust in heaven, notwithstanding our present difficulties, that this Government will be transmitted unimpaired from generation to generation, until the end of time. Certain I am that there is none here ready to stand by and witness the prostration and the sacrifice of those principles in which this Government was laid, and in which it has advanced to its present greatness. I appeal to the patriotism of this House, by every motive that can rouse an American heart, or move an American arm, to come forward (to use the language of the sages of the revolution,) "in that spirit of amity and mutual concession the peculiarity of our political situation renders indispensable," and settle at this time the question which is now before us, and which, it must be admitted, has given rise to the difficulties in which we are now unhappily involved. I call once more upon those gentlemen representing the manufacturing interest, to bring forward their amendments to this bill, if any further are required to preserve the manufacturing establishments.

I will conclude by observing that I believe, religiously believe, that a more favorable opportunity will not soon occur again in a way to secure a permanent protection to our manufacturing establishments; for if the estimated statement of the Secretary of the Treasury should prove true, and we should have, at the commencement of the next year, from eight to nine millions of money in the treasury unappropriated, the people will call for a much greater reduction than is now asked for. It cannot be that any interest in the country is so infatuated as to imagine that an intelligent people will ever consent, for the protection of any particular interest, to tax themselves in order to raise millions of dollars more than can be wanted for the public expenditure; and, I may further ask, if such a protection could be given at the hazard of the public peace, would it become those who hold it, to be so selfish as to require it? And what is there in the work of the republic, to save the interest that might be thus protected from the common ruin that would overwhelm all our interests, all our hopes?

Mr. WARDWELL, of New York, said, that soon after the bill now under discussion was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, he had determined to give his reasons at large, why it ought not to pass into a law. He had examined its details, and believed he understood some of its provisions, and felt himself called upon to state the motives which would govern him in recording his vote against it. But so much had been said on the subject, and he had been anticipated in his arguments by so many gentlemen, that he had since concluded to remain, as he had heretofore done, entirely silent; and he would not now have troubled the committee with any observations, had it not been that some gentlemen, not being content with occupying the time of the House for several hours, have thought proper to give the committee a second, third, and even a fourth, edition of their very lengthy arguments. Mr. W. had, therefore, concluded that the committee would not now take it unkindly if he trespassed on their attention for a few moments.

He did not consider himself an ultra tariff man. The constitution under which Congress now acts was established on principles of mutual concession and compromise. It was on these principles alone the Union must rest; it could not long be sustained by force. It was on these principles he acted at the last session in voting for the tariff bill which passed by such unexampled unanimity. He voted with the friends of the bill throughout, and when it became a law, no man was more rejoiced than himself at so important a result. Six millions of taxes were taken from the burdens of the people by that law, and he considered it an earnest, and so he thought the South ought now to consider it, that after the law should go into operation, and it was found that it still bore upon the South too heavily or unequally, that a further reduction should be made by a subsequent Congress, having due regard, however, to the rights and interests of all. He did not suppose he should be called upon so soon, before even any part of that law had gone into operation, to vote for a much greater reduction of duties than was anticipated by any moderate man at the last session of Congress. It appeared to him that no circumstances had happened which imperiously required such further reductions before it was possible to ascertain the effect which the law of July could have upon the country. It further appeared to him that the moderate men at the South ought not to require it at this session. Gentlemen from the South ought to reflect that this system, which is now sought to be destroyed, was not the creature of a day or a year. The duties on imports had been gradually increasing from the year 1816 to 1832. Large and extensive establishments had grown up under the various laws which have, from time to time, been enacted by the Government of this country. And, said Mr. W., are these establishments now to be utterly prostrated in a moment? Surely the South will not require so great a sacrifice of property without at least one year's warning. Men of business had made their arrangements for the ensuing year. A large amount of property had been invested in the various employments of life, which are intimately connected with the tariff laws. The merchant had sent out his ships; the manufacturer had purchased his stock for the ensuing year, and they had a perfect right to rely on the continuance of the law of July last, at least for that short period.

Mr. W. said he had taken some pains to gain information on this important subject. Not from manufacturers themselves; men who are interested in this question, but from men who had not one dollar invested in any manufacturing establishment, and who were called free trade men, but who had ample opportunity to investigate and understand the subject. He had also, some experience of his own, and he did not hesitate to say, that if the bill before the committee should pass into a law, every cotton and woollen factory in the Union (excepting, perhaps, the one owned by the gentleman from Georgia,) [Mr. CLAYTON,] would be either severely crippled in its operations, or utterly ruined and destroyed.

Believing this, said Mr. W., he could not vote for this bill, with its present provisions. He would, with the permission of the committee, read a short extract of a letter which he had received on this subject.

"I have looked over his [Mr. VERPLANCK's] report which you sent me, and cannot help thinking that the cotton manufacturers have not had justice done them. I approved of the principle of the tariff of 1816 as a basis, but think that principle has not been preserved in the bill reported. The act of 1816 established the minimum of twenty-five cents per yard on cotton cloth, and sixty and seventy-five cents per pound on white and colored cotton yarn. Had these minimums been preserved I believe the cotton manufactories could have lived; but without them they must be destroyed. On bar iron the act of 1816 enforced a duty of nine dollars per ton, and the present bill proposes as the lowest, fifteen dollars. Here appears to me a manifest preference of Pennsylvania to New England."

But, said Mr. W., if it were now necessary to pass another tariff bill; if the "signs of the times" imperiously demanded from Congress another law, reducing the duties still more than the act of July last, this was not, in his humble judgment, such a bill as ought to meet with a favorable consideration. It is manifestly unequal in its provisions, and must be so in its effects. This bill proposes to reduce the duties on cottons and woollens to twenty per cent. ad valorem. It leaves brown sugar at two cents per pound, and clayed and white sugar at two and a half cents per pound. This, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us, is equal to forty-six per cent. ad valorem. If, however, instead of two cents the pound weight it was converted into a duty of forty-six per cent. on the prime cost of the article, the duty might then be tolerable. On some kinds of sugars it would be about one cent the pound weight. Mr. W. considered sugar as one of the necessities of life. Next to breadstuffs, it was the most important article of home consumption. The poor people of the North depended on it for subsistence as much as they did on their bread. It affords a nourishment equal to that of any food on which man subsists; and yet this article of food so necessary to all classes of people, pays a duty by this bill, according to a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, of forty-six per cent., and on some kinds of sugars, as Mr. W. believed, of at least seventy-five per cent., while the protective duty on cottons and woollens was reduced to twenty per cent., and that on raw wool to fifteen per cent.

Mr. Chairman: Let us compare these interests, and ascertain if there be such necessity of making the discrimination as is made by the bill before us. Sugar is grown and made only in one State of this Union. No one pretends that it can be made with any degree of profit in any other State but Louisiana, and possibly in some parts of the Territory of Florida. There are now engaged in the sugar business only about 700 men; at the most 800; and a majority of these are gentlemen of fortune. The capital invested in the cotton factory business alone, far exceeds the capital employed in the sugar business. Cotton factories can be established in all parts of the Union, and all classes of our citizens can, if they please, become more or less interested in them. One would naturally suppose, therefore, that the greater the interest the greater the protection. But a rule the reverse of this is adopted by the bill before us. Now suppose, Mr. Chairman, that it shall be necessary to destroy these two interests; let us see who of those concerned in them would sustain the greatest loss in proportion to the amount of capital invested. The land and the slaves now employed in the sugar business could immediately be employed, without much expense, in the growing of cotton, which article, if the Southern doctrine be true, will immediately be enhanced in price, by commencing a free trade between this country and Great Britain. Should, however, the large manufacturing establishments of New England be destroyed by this bill, the capital employed in the erection of buildings and in machinery would be a dead loss both to the owners and to the country. A vast multitude of men, women, and children, would at once be thrown out of employ, and many of them would have no other hopes of subsistence left, but in leaving the land of their fathers for the "far West." The farming interests, too, sir, could not altogether escape the sad effects of so sudden a change in the policy of this Government.

Mr. Chairman: There is another important interest which is protected by the existing laws, which, in my opinion, will be severely injured by this bill if it should pass into a law. I mean the tailoring business in our large cities. By this bill the duties are reduced from fifty to twenty per cent. on ready-made clothing. Time was, sir, when many of our citizens, and particularly the dandies of Broadway, considered a coat not worth the wear unless it was made in London. But the high rates of duty on ready-made clothing has prevented, in some measure, the importation of these articles; and a business has grown up under the protection afforded by the existing laws in our large cities, of the utmost importance to a large number of the working classes of those cities, and which now to destroy, would deprive thousands of men, women, and children, of the daily means of subsistence.

From a document laid on our tables, from the Treasury Department, it appears that the value of domestic cottons and woollens used by the tailors in the city of Boston is

The city of Boston contains, by the last census, 61,000 inhabitants. The city of New York 202,000. Now, allowing that a proportionate amount of business in this branch of home industry is done in the city of New York, as is done in the city of Boston, according to the number of inhabitants in each, and we shall have the following results:

An amount considerably exceeding the amount of exports from the State of South Carolina. These garments are sold in different parts of the Union for home consumption. It is from this branch of business that your navy and merchant ships are principally supplied. I am somewhat surprised, sir, that my honorable colleague [Mr. VERPLANCK] who reported this bill, should have overlooked an interest so important to the working classes of his own city, and at the same time should have imposed a duty of from 46 to 75 per cent. on brown sugar, without which no family can be said to have the comforts of life.

The amount of duties which accrued to the Government in the year 1831 on brown sugars was $2,145,303 37. By whom is this enormous tax paid? Not by the Southern or Western, but by the Northern and Middle States. And paid, too, for the benefit of a few hundred wealthy planters of Louisiana. But it may be said, that if you destroy the interest in Louisiana, you destroy the market for many of the productions of the Western States. In like manner, sir, if you destroy the manufacturing interests of the North, you destroy the market for many of the productions of the Northern States. I would destroy neither, sir; I would deal out evenhanded justice to both and to all other interests in the Union; but I would not seek to build up or protect, by any legislation, one branch of American industry, and at the same time destroy or materially injure another of at least equal importance.

There is another item in this bill, although small in itself considered, yet it shows the gross inequality of its provisions. The duty on refined sugar by this bill is ten cents the pound, or 103 per centum ad valorem; besides the encouragement which is afforded to the manufacturer by a drawback on its exportation. It would be very desirable to know what object the Committee of Ways and Means had in view in fixing this high rate of duty. It cannot be that of revenue. The duty amounts almost to a prohibition. The amount of revenue which will accrue on this article by the bill is estimated at $51,651. And, it will be seen, by the report from the Treasury Department, that there was paid for drawbacks on this very article in the year 1831, the sum of $63,688 65. It thus appears, that instead of a revenue being derived from it, it operates as an absolute drain from your Treasury. If this high duty is imposed for protection, it may be asked, why the necessity of this high protection? Is it one of those articles which will be necessary in time of war? Does it at all contribute to the comfort of the laboring classes of the country? And yet you propose by this bill, to continue the high protection afforded to this comparatively unnecessary article, and at the same time, withdraw altogether your protection from cottons, wool, and woollens! There are many other articles which might be mentioned to show the inequality and inconsistency of the bill; but Mr. W. said he would mention but one, and that was the article of spirits. The duty on foreign spirits, by the act of 1828, is in the average fifty-nine cents the gallon, or 145 per cent. ad valorem. On first proof spirits it was fifty-seven cents, and on second proof spirits it was sixty cents the gallon. By this bill the average duty is twenty-nine cents the gallon, and on first and second proof only eighteen cents the gallon. Here is a reduction of considerably more than one-half on the article of foreign spirits.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who is so blind as not to see the effect of this operation? In the first place, it will have a tendency to increase the number of retailers of spirits by increasing their profits. The price of a glass of rum ever has been and ever will be the same. The retailer of gills will reap the benefit of the reduction of the tax, and not the consumer; and who does not know that, if you increase the number who sell rum, you will increase the number who drink it.

Reduce the tax on foreign spirits, Mr. Chairman, and the importation of the article will be proportionably increased. The greater the quantity of foreign spirits which is brought into the country, the less demand there will be for domestic spirits.

Now, sir, suppose you destroy an important market for

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

[FEB. 4, 1833.]

the produce of the farmer, by prostrating your manufacturing establishments, as in my judgment you will, if you pass this bill without some material modifications; and suppose, by flooding the country with foreign spirits you materially lessen the price of domestic spirits, is it not manifest that the price of coarse grain must also fall? Until public opinion shall be brought to bear against them, domestic distilleries will be kept in operation; but it will be at the expense of the farmer. He alone must pocket the loss which must follow the reduction of duties on spirits as proposed by this bill.

If men will drink spirits, let those reap the benefit who are the most useful to their country.

Sir, if this bill were otherwise unobjectionable, the reduction of duties which it proposes on many important interests, are altogether too rapid and unwarranted by any state of things which now exists. Can it be possible that the people of this nation require such a bill at our hands? Can it be possible that the people of the North would sanction its passage if they could be convinced that millions of property would fall a sacrifice to the unjust operations of such a bill? All the gentlemen from the South, with whom I have conversed on this subject, have expressed to me a perfect willingness to have the reduction of duties so gradual, as to meet entirely the views of all reasonable representatives of the manufacturing interests. They say, on this subject, that all they desire is, an assurance on the part of this Government that the duties shall, in a reasonable time, come down to the just wants of the Government. And are two or three years a reasonable time? Can it be possible that the leading manufacturing interests of this country can meet so important a change in our legislation as is proposed by this bill, and survive the shock? I consider it altogether impossible; and I think this feature in the bill is alone a sufficient objection against its passage.

I will now notice a few observations made by some gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, and I have done.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENNY] stated, a few days since, that "instead of lowering the duties on imports, he would raise them higher." Precisely such language as this have the manufacturers used for several years past; and it is what, in my opinion, has brought them to their present perilous situation. Until lately they never have been satisfied with the protection which the Government have, from time to time, afforded to them. They have been constantly endeavoring to "raise the duties higher." And now, sir, a reaction is about to take place which they begin to fear, and which I fear, will entirely prostrate their establishments. For when a reaction in public sentiment does take place on any exciting subject, among a people like ours, it is always difficult to prevent its operating in the opposite extreme. In my opinion the manufacturers have heretofore asked too much. Had they been satisfied with the law of 1824, there is good reason to believe that the present state of things would not have existed.

I will now notice a remark by a gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] in relation to New York. I should have let it pass unheeded had he not repeated the sentiment in his published speech, which I read this morning. The gentleman, speaking in relation to the inequalities so manifest in this bill, asked the question, "Who then will be satisfied? New York; provided she ensure by it the accomplishment of her ulterior object." The gentleman had better not have made this expression. It was quite unnecessary and uncalled for. I can tell him he knows nothing about New York, her public men, her State policy or measures. I was at a loss to ascertain his meaning until it was explained by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE.]

rior object was the election of a president from the State of New York. That the delegation from that State should vote on this great question, not as they should think right and just as honest men, but with a view to this ulterior object. To the gentleman from Georgia I have nothing to say. He had made an explanation in relation to this subject, which, as I understood, was satisfactory to my colleagues. But to the gentleman from Maryland I must be permitted to observe, that he who is in the habit of imputing improper motives to others, is very likely to be governed by such motives himself.

There was one other remark, however, which fell from the gentleman from Georgia, to which I feel bound to reply. He stated, if I understood the gentleman, that "if those in whose power it was to settle this question, should now fail to do it by their votes, the settlement of it might fall into other hands—the South and the high tariff men of the North might arrange this matter, and thereby obtain their ulterior object." Be it so, sir. It would not be the first coalition that I ever witnessed. At the last presidential election, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, a grand coalition was formed to effect a political purpose. But, sir, the sovereign people did not see fit to sanction the bargain.

Not one hundred years ago, a coalition was formed in that grand assembly of "learned doctors," to which the gentleman made some allusion. The dissection of a living subject was the grand object of that coalition, formed as it was of such repulsive materials. Every body had heard or read the result of that unnatural union. And such ever will be the result among a people who are virtuous and intelligent. Managers may make bargains, but unless they are founded upon correct principles, the people will never sanction them.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. W., I am opposed to this bill with its present provisions. I cannot think that I should be in the discharge of my duty in voting for it, without very material modifications of it. I most honestly believe that a large share of my constituents would not be satisfied with it. The South, in my opinion, ought not to require it of us. This great question cannot be settled by one Congress. We have already done much, and the next Congress will undoubtedly do more. It is not the work of a moment. No human foresight can predict the effects of the bill of last session upon the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests of the country. I do verily believe that this question can be settled by the moderate men of all parties, in a manner that will give entire satisfaction to the liberal and moderate portion of the community. But, sir, I fear it cannot be done at the present session of Congress; and, in my judgment, it ought not to be required or expected of us.

I have no hope of ever satisfying the high tariff men of the North, nor the high toned, sensitive politicians of the South. The former, so far from relinquishing any portion of the protection which they have heretofore enjoyed, have been constantly pressing for higher and greater protection. The latter never will be satisfied with any other course of policy than such as will, in my humble judgment, utterly ruin and prostrate some of the most important interests of the nation.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, further explained a speech which he had formerly made, and which appeared to him to have been generally misunderstood.

Mr. LEAVITT, of Ohio, said, it had been his wish, at an earlier period of this debate, to have presented to the committee some of the views which he entertained in relation to the bill under consideration. But, such had heretofore been the great pressure upon the time and attention of the committee, that he had not ventured, until now, to obtrude himself upon its notice. In rising at this time to participate in this debate, said Mr. L., I am fully aware that I labor under great and manifold disadvantages.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The pending bill has been under discussion for several weeks, and has been very fully and elaborately debated. The whole field of argument has been explored; and, he that would now address the committee, on this subject, will find himself embarrassed by the consideration, that much of what he had deemed it proper to say, had already been urged by those who have preceded him in debate. But, notwithstanding all these discouraging circumstances, I feel myself called upon to state some of the considerations which have induced the conclusion that I cannot yield my assent to the passage of this bill, with the provisions which it now contains. Representing on this floor a district as largely interested in the maintenance of a well regulated and judicious tariff as any other west of the Ohio, I should, perhaps, be obnoxious to the censure of those who have honored me with a seat here, were I to remain entirely silent on this interesting occasion. But, sir, I will give the committee the consolatory pledge, that in the remarks which it is my purpose to submit, I will be as brief as the nature of the subject will permit.

In submitting my views of this bill, it is my intention, Mr. Chairman, studiously to avoid any remarks having a tendency to increase the exaceration of feeling which but too obviously exists as between some gentlemen on this floor, from certain opposite sections of the Union. I am sure I need not make the protestation to those gentlemen from the anti tariff States who feel an interest in the passage of this bill, and with whom, upon this occasion, I am constrained, by a sense of duty, to differ, that in arriving at the conclusion which I have announced, I have been influenced by no feeling of sectional hostility, or sectional prejudice. In truth, sir, the only consideration which has created any feeling of regret on my part at the course I am about to pursue in regard to the pending measure, is, that it involves a diversity of opinion and action between myself and some gentlemen in this House, with whom it has heretofore, on most occasions, been my good fortune to agree, and for whom I entertain the highest respect. But, sir, I should be unworthy of the responsible trust which has been confided to me by my constituents, were I to allow myself to be swerved in my course here, by any such consideration as that to which I have just adverted.

After having carefully examined the provisions of this bill, and anxiously deliberated upon it, in all its aspects and bearings, I have come to the conclusion, that whether we regard the amount, and the adjustment of the duties upon imports which it provides, or the time at which Congress is called upon to act, it is unfit and inexpedient that it should receive the sanction of this House.

It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to go into a full or elaborate examination of the details of this bill. This has been so ably and so satisfactorily attended to by other gentlemen who have gone before me in this debate, that I should hold myself unpardonably intrusive upon the committee, were I to attempt it. There are, however, some items of the bill with which the interests of my immediate constituents are intimately connected, and which I shall specially bring to the view of the committee, for the purpose of showing, that the protection proposed to be extended to them is altogether inadequate and insufficient. But, before I proceed to do this, and as necessary to the correct understanding of my views as to the measure now under consideration, I must be permitted to present a very brief and general outline of my opinions of the protective system. And in the first place I would remark, that I have never doubted but what it was within the constitutional competency of Congress, in the adjustment of duties upon imports, to afford protection and encouragement to the domestic industry of the nation. It has always appeared obvious to me, that this authority was clearly embraced in the delegation of power to Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., and to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The fact that such has been the construction given to these constitutional provisions, by all the departments of the Government, from its earliest history, would seem to supersede the necessity of any argument to prove the legitimacy of the exercise of the power in question. In my reflections upon the protective system, I have therefore been unembarrassed by any other considerations than those connected with its expediency. And, upon this point, I have long since arrived at the conclusion, that it was the true policy of the Government to extend its fostering aid and support to all such manufactures as could be successfully introduced and sustained in our country. Among these, those that should stand most pre-eminently meritorious, are such as are necessary to our national defence in time of war. But, sir, while I have thus entertained the opinion, that a well regulated and judicious system of protection was essentially conducive to our national prosperity and independence, I have not doubted, but it might be carried to an extent that would be productive of pernicious consequences. This system should never be tolerated to such an extent as that it would produce an unnatural or a hot-bed growth of manufactures, or allure the rich capitalist or restless speculator, to invest his funds in the business of manufacturing, with a view to the realization of enormous profits, or the rapid accumulation of large fortunes. But that degree of protection which is necessary to enable our manufacturers to compete fairly with the foreigner, and which shall enable them, with the aid of competent skill, and assiduous attention to their business, to realize fair and reasonable profits, ought to be afforded them. It is not to be denied, but what Great Britain, the great work-shop of the world, possesses many and important advantages over the United States, as a manufacturing nation. It has been her settled and unwavering policy, for ages past, to extend governmental protection to her manufacturing interests. Her tariff of duties upon articles coming in competition with her own fabrics, is prohibitory in its character. Her manufactures thus protected, and the skill of her artists, matured by time and experience, have attained a state of high perfection. But, this is not all: from the density of her population, and the nature of her Government, a large class of the people are in a state of degrading dependence and want, that leaves them no alternative, but to labor for the scantiest pittance, or perish with starvation. Hence, the price of labor in that country is much reduced below what it is here, where all are left free to pursue their own interests, and their own inclinations, in regard to their pursuits and occupations. In addition to all this, the abundance of capital in Great Britain, gives her a most decided advantage over us, in the business of manufacturing. Capital there is worth not exceeding four per cent., and the rich and lordly owners of it, who invest it in manufacturing establishments, may well be content to realize that amount of profit from it. But, in this country, to the owner of a few thousand dollars, such an investment, with the prospect of such a profit, holds out no strong allurements. So far, then, as protection, in the form of duties upon foreign imports, is necessary to compensate our manufacturers for the disadvantages under which they labor, in contrast with those of Great Britain, to that extent, and that extent only, should it be afforded by the Government. There is one other reason, to which I will briefly advert, which makes the protective policy, in this country, the more necessary. I allude to the commercial restrictions of Great Britain. Not only does she protect her manufacturing interests by high and prohibitory duties, but she also protects her agriculture, by the exclusion from her ports of all such articles as she can produce. Hence, all the staple productions of the grain-growing States of the Union are as effectually shut out from her markets; as if the "fast anchored isle" was surrounded by some impassable barrier,

The Tariff Bill.

Without going more at length into the consideration of the protective system, a subject which has been exhausted and worn threadbare, by discussions here and elsewhere, I must adopt the conclusion that to the extent which I have indicated, it is in accordance with the best interests of this nation. Such, sir, was the opinion of those eminent patriots and statesmen who participated in the councils and the legislation of the country, in the earliest periods of her history. That this policy, under proper restrictions, so wise, so just, and so judicious, has been perverted and abused by the intrigues and arts of ambitious aspirants for power, is but too obvious. Sir, it has been for the last twelve years so mixed up with the party strifes of the day, so blended with our presidential elections, so much used as a hobby for demagogues to ride into office, that it were not strange if the American people should now look upon it with doubt and suspicion. It is but a brief period since the doctrine was openly avowed and maintained by one sect of politicians, that the maintenance of a high tariff of duties, and system of internal improvement by the General Government, were indissolubly connected; and that, like the Siamese twins, if the band which connected them were severed, the destruction of both must unavoidably follow. By this theory, the people were to be taxed without special reference to the protection of the home industry of the nation, that millions might flow into the treasury, to be afterwards expended on objects of internal improvement. This, sir, was, at one period, the true meaning and interpretation of those cabalistic words, the American System. But this system, thus understood, however plausible, splendid, and imposing it may have been; with whatever fascinations and charms it may have been bedecked by popular declaimers; to whatever height its ephemeral popularity may have attained; has received the stamp of popular disapprobation; and they who claimed the honor of its paternity and its advocacy, have failed in the accomplishment of the ends, which it was their purpose, through its agency, to achieve.

But, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the opinions of gentlemen as to the expediency of the protective system, I maintain that a due regard to the obligations of justice, and the plighted faith of the nation, forbid that we should now treat it as an original question of public policy. It is our duty to look upon this subject with a special reference to the existing state of things; to that state of things which our past legislation has produced. Under the several acts of Congress, intended to foster and encourage domestic manufactures, by affording incidental protection to those interests, in the adjustment of duties on foreign imports, we have virtually declared to our citizens, that this was, and would continue to be, the settled and permanent policy of the country. Sir, what has been the effect of this? In one portion of the Union, the pursuits and occupations of its people had been almost exclusively commercial; but the effect of our restrictive system has been to drive them from the ocean, and compel them to embark in manufactures. Under the policy which has so long received the sanction of the Government, they have changed their pursuits, and have invested millions of capital in manufacturing establishments. This is more especially true of New England than any other portion of our country; but it is true, to some extent, in relation to other parts of the Union. Even in the Western country, manufacturing interests have grown up that are by no means inconsiderable in their extent and importance. In my view, therefore, if it were even conceded that this protective policy was unwise in its origin—if it were admitted that the true interests of the nation would have been more effectually promoted by the opposite system, still, sir, we are not at liberty to shut our eyes to the state of things which it has produced. We cannot, we ought not, consistently with any principles of just and rightful legislation, to violate those implied pledges of continued protection which we have made to the country. Such a course, there is every reason to believe, would have a most disastrous effect, and sensibly impede our onward march in the path of national prosperity. To illustrate my ideas as to this matter, permit me to suppose the case of a human being, laboring under a state of excessive, painful, and dangerous tension. Sir, what would be the course of the skilful, judicious, and scientific physician who should be called upon to prescribe for such a patient? Would he by powerful remedies and ministrations, suddenly reduce his patient from this high state of tension, to the opposite extreme of hopeless relaxation? No, sir; it would be his object, by medicines and applications cautiously administered, to reduce him to the medium standard of healthful action. So, sir, in regard to our protective policy; if it has been carried too far, if its cords have been too tightly drawn, it should be our object to apply the remedy with great caution, and, by a gradual relaxation, to place it upon its proper footing.

Although I had not anticipated that the present Congress would be called upon for any further action on the tariff, yet, when, at the commencement of this session, the subject was introduced, and a reference of it made to the Committee of Ways and Means, I had hoped they would have pursued the course which I have just indicated. I had hoped they would have carefully examined the tariff act of last July, and that so far as it should be ascertained a reduction of duty upon the protected articles could be made, below the standard fixed by that act, without sacrificing our manufacturing interests, they would have done so; and, by such reduction, and the needful reduction upon the unprotected articles, have reduced the revenue to such a sum as might be thought necessary to supply the demands of the Government. For myself, sir, I am strongly inclined to the opinion, that experience will prove that reductions may be made below the rates fixed by the act of 1832, consistently with a due regard to the interests of the manufacturer; and that such an adjustment of this subject may be made as will be satisfactory to all parties. But I regret to say, the bill before us utterly fails to accomplish this purpose. I cannot but view it as entirely disregarding of the fate of some of the most important and essential manufacturing interests. I view it as, in many respects, anti-protective in its character and features. Probably such was the view of the anti-tariff gentlemen on the committee, who concurred in reporting this bill; though, sir, in relation to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GILMORE,] who is friendly to the protective system, and who also concurred with the majority of the committee, I doubt not but he honestly entertains the opinion that this bill gives sufficient protection to the manufacturing interests. But, although I have for that gentleman the highest regard, and believe that for patriotism and integrity of purpose he has few superiors, yet I am constrained to differ with him as to the effect and operation of the bill before us.

I have already intimated that I did not design to examine this bill in all its details. It would be inexcusable in me to fatigue the committee by such a course. I must however, be permitted, in a few words, to call the attention of the committee to the subject of wool and woollens, and the protection proposed to be afforded to them by the bill under consideration. It will be borne in mind, that, by the act of the last session, which made a very material reduction of the duties upon these articles below the act of 1828, a specific duty of four cents per pound, and an ad valorem duty of 40 per cent. upon all wool costing over eight cents the pound, is imposed. By the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, the specific duty upon this article is entirely abolished, and the ad valorem duty reduced ultimately to 15 per centum. And on woollens it is proposed to leave the duty, ultimately, at 20 per cent. I do not forget, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEAT] proposes an increase of five per cent. upon each of these articles, and extends the period within which the reductions are to take effect. If this amendment shall prevail, the duty upon wool will remain permanently at twenty per centum; and on woollens, at twenty-five per cent. I apprehend it will require no argument to prove that, for the purposes of protection, these duties will prove wholly insufficient and inadequate. In support of this position, it is only necessary to advert to the fact, that even the high duties imposed by the act of 1828, have had but little effect in checking the importation of these articles. In reference, then, to the duties proposed by the present bill, the naked question presented is, whether the great interests of wool and woollens are to be utterly abandoned and left to the fate which inevitably awaits them, if this bill shall become a law. It seems to me, that whether we regard these interests as intimately blended and interwoven with the agricultural prosperity of the country, or as connected with the national defence in time of war, they are entitled to our special favor and regard. In looking into the various provisions of the bill before us, I find that an ample and adequate duty is retained on iron. I presume the committee, in thus providing for the iron interest, were governed by the consideration, that this metal was essential to our military defence. Let me ask, if upon the same principle, the wool and woollens interest are not entitled to favor and protection? We are told, that in war, guns and swords are necessary, and that we must not be dependent upon foreigners for these. But, sir, it will be in vain that you furnish your soldiery with arms and ammunition, and all the accoutrements of war, unless you also have the necessary clothing wherewith to protect them from the wintry blasts and the cold and "pitiless pelting of the storm." In whatever view, therefore, I look upon these interests, whether in respect to their great magnitude and value; their intimate and vital connexion with the agricultural prosperity of the nation; or their relation to our national defence and independence, I cannot but feel some surprise, that the committee should have proposed a duty that must result in their total sacrifice and prostration.

The Tariff Bill.

But, waiving any further consideration of the details of this bill, I repeat, that, believing its passage would be pregnant with the most fatal consequences to some of the most important agricultural and manufacturing interests of the nation, unless in its progress through this House it shall be materially modified and amended, I shall not feel myself at liberty to vote for it.

I will now proceed to state some of the views which occur to me, illustrative of one of the positions which I assumed in the outset of my remarks; namely, that this is not the appropriate time for action, on the subject of the tariff. I am free to express it, as the strong conviction of my mind, that the gentlemen from the South, and their free trade friends from the North, ought not to have brought this subject before Congress at this session. I make this declaration, wholly uninfluenced by any feelings of prejudice or hostility towards the South. It is, I fear, but too true, that this feeling does exist, to no inconsiderable extent, between the Eastern and Southern portion of our country—but, for myself, I protest that I have none of it. I had lived, almost from the period of my infancy, in the Western country, and possess, I hope, some portion of that liberality of feeling, which so honorably distinguishes the great mass of the population of that prosperous and flourishing section of our Union. Occupying this position, I am constrained to say, that in my opinion the South ought not to have asked that the subject of the tariff should be agitated at this session. I am not unadvised of the state of feeling which exists in that section, in regard to the protective policy; nor have I been an uninterested spectator of what has been passing there. The voice of complaint and of discontent, which has come to us from that quarter, has not been unheard by me. I have been disposed to give it a respectful audience, and to pay it a respectful attention, without inquiring too astutely, whether the grievances complained of were fancied or real. In this spirit, I approached the consideration of the modification of the tariff, at the last session, and gave my vote for the bill which then passed. I voted for it, as a measure conciliatory in its character, and as making no inconsiderable concessions to the South. And, may we not justly infer, from the strong vote it received from gentlemen representing the South, that they too considered it in this light? The provisions of that act, in contrast with those of the act of 1828, are highly favorable to the South. It is estimated, that the operation of the act of last session will result in an aggregate reduction of the duties on imports, to the amount of nearly eight millions per annum. And, among the articles upon which, by that act, the greatest reductions are made, is the cloth of which negro clothing is made, and negro blankets. These are permitted to come in under a mere nominal duty—a duty of five per cent. Sir, will gentlemen contend that this is no boon to the South, no mitigation of what they are pleased to call the oppressions of the tariff? I well remember with what feelings of high gratification the passage of the act of the last session was received, not only by myself, but by gentlemen opposed to the protective policy, and representing anti-tariff States. I rejoiced upon that occasion, because I had, as I thought, the best reason to believe, that while that act would afford competent protection to the manufacturing interests, it would allay the discontents, and quiet the excitement in the South, and restore once more the disturbed harmony of the country. That act passed both Houses of Congress by an almost unprecedented majority; and, as it regards the vote in this House, one strong item of testimony in favor of the justness and fitness of the arrangement of duties which it provided, is to be found in the fact, that the negative votes upon its final passage, are made up of gentlemen who belong to the extremes of the two parties on the tariff question; of those who may be called the highest toned friends of the tariff, and of those, who, both upon the grounds of constitutionality and expediency, are its unyielding and uncompromising enemies. But, again, sir, it should be borne in mind, that this subject of modifying the tariff was then laboriously examined, and amply debated in this House, and also in the Senate. It occupied the almost undivided attention of Congress for many weeks—and, every gentleman here can bear witness of the arduousness of the duties of this House during that period. None will have forgotten how, day after day and week after week, we were doomed to encounter the noxious, I was going to say pestilential atmosphere of this Hall, when within it; and without, the burning rays of an almost midsummer sun. But the bill did pass, and became the law of the land, though made to take effect on the 2d of March next, a day to which we have not yet been brought in the revolution of time.

Sir, it is under these circumstances that we are again called upon to act on the subject. The law of last session making very material changes in the tariff law, sanctioned and passed by the very members who are now present, has not yet gone into operation. And we are now called upon to pass another act, making further and still greater alterations in our system of laying duties on imports. In view of all these facts and considerations, am I not fully justified in the assertion that Congress should not have been called upon for its action on this subject, at this session? Is it not due to the people, is it not due to the character and standing of the Congress of the United States, that the act of July 1832 should be permitted to take effect, to the end that we may have a practical illustration of its bearing and operation, not only upon the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the nation, but upon its revenue?

The Tariff Bill.

[FEB. 4, 1833.]

I am aware that the expediency and necessity of the measure under consideration, is urged and vindicated upon the ground that the national debt being nearly extinguished, the act of the last session will produce a greater amount of revenue than the ordinary demands of the Government require. We are told that the people may be relieved from the payment of a heavy amount of taxes by the passage of this bill, and it is strongly and plausibly commended to our favorable consideration, by the adduction of this argument. It is not my purpose to detain the committee with the inquiry, whether the duties paid upon foreign imports are justly to be considered as taxes upon the consumer, or whether the people are not amply compensated for their payment by advantages which accrue to them, as indirect consequences of such payment. Nor will I enter upon any examination of the debatable question, whether the reduction of duties upon imports will decrease the revenue of the country. These interesting subjects have been amply discussed by other gentlemen, in the progress of this debate; and to say any thing respecting them, would be only to repeat what has already fallen from others. But may I not inquire whether it be practicable for any one, no matter what may be his financial experience, attainments, and talents, to estimate, with reasonable certainty, what amount of revenue the act of last year will produce? I am aware that the Secretary of the Treasury, (whose qualifications for the elevated station which he occupies, no one can more highly estimate than myself,) supposes there will be a large surplus in the treasury at the end of the current year; and the enlightened committee, from whom the bill before us has emanated, have made known their concurrence in the views of the distinguished gentleman, at the head of the treasury. But with all due deference, I would suggest, that, from the fluctuations of trade, and consequent uncertainty as to what may be the amount of imports—from the impossibility of foreseeing what contingencies and events may happen, calling upon the Government for extraordinary expenditures—and more than all, the difficulty of determining with accuracy, what may be the practical operation of a law not yet in force, and concerning which we can have no experimental knowledge, are considerations which might, at least, justify a doubt, whether the Government will be encumbered with the anticipated surplus in the treasury.

The argument, therefore, in favor of an immediate reduction of the tariff, predicated upon the supposition that the bill of last session is to give us a redundant treasury, is not, to my mind, conclusive or satisfactory. Is there, then, any other fact or consideration, which calls upon this Congress at this session, to adopt the anomalous course of reviewing and repealing a law which was enacted by it, after great deliberation, so late as the month of July last, and which has not yet taken effect? I am aware that the State of South Carolina, acting in her sovereign capacity, "has adopted measures to nullify not only the act of last July, but all other laws for the imposition and collection of duties. I am aware too, that she threatens to put her nullifying machinery into operation, with all the "pomp and circumstance of war." But certainly no gentleman is prepared to admit that this sort of military demonstration, this "peaceable" process of nullification, ought to induce Congress to pursue a course in relation to the tariff, different from what they would have done under other circumstances. If the tariff is now reduced, in pursuance of what may justly be called the dictation of South Carolina, will it not be to sanction the legitimacy and efficacy of the course she has adopted, and to make nullification triumphant? Sir, it was but a few days since, that at a public meeting in South Carolina, it was openly avowed by a prominent orator and leader in the ranks of the nullifiers, [Colonel Preston,] that the bold stand which that State had taken against the tariff had caused Congress to pass the act of last session, and had been the means of inducing the Secretary of the Treasury to recommend a further reduction of six or eight millions. And what, sir, would be the language of the orator, if we were to pass the bill now before us? Would it not be ascribed to the fear of nullification; and would not the people reproach us with having pursued an extraordinary course of action in our legislation on the tariff, under the influence of this fear?

But we are told that, leaving South Carolina wholly out of view, justice to the other Southern States which do not sanction the course of that State, demands at our hands the immediate adoption of the measure under consideration. Sir, I cannot admit the legitimacy of this conclusion. Let gentlemen from the South view this subject candidly and dispassionately, and I think they will concede, that, in pressing the passage of this bill at this time, they are asking more than strict justice will warrant. Let them bear in mind what they have already achieved, in their efforts to modify and mitigate the protective policy, and what has already been yielded to them by its friends and advocates. Let them reflect, that the prosecution of an extensive system of internal improvement by the General Government is no longer considered a part of its settled policy, and is not likely hereafter to afford a pretext for drawing money from the pockets of the people, to be expended for those purposes. Let them moreover bear in mind what they have gained by the passage of the tariff act of last July: and, lastly, let them remember, that gentlemen on this floor, of all parties, and from all quarters of the Union, have united in avowing the opinion, that the revenue of the country ought not to exceed the wants of the Government, administered upon just and economical principles. It seems to me the South ought to be well satisfied with this state of things, and has no right either to ask or expect of the Northern, Middle, and Western States, a total sacrifice of their vital interests. Sir, I believe there is no such irreconcilable diversity of interests between the different sections of this Union, as that they cannot all exist and be prosperous under the same system of legislation. If the subject of adjustment of the tariff shall be approached at the proper time, and in the proper spirit—in the spirit of compromise and conciliation—I doubt not but it may be settled upon a permanent basis, in such a manner as that, while the great agricultural and manufacturing interests of the nation shall be adequately sustained, the South shall have no cause or pretext for complaint.

In conclusion, I repeat that I cannot yield my assent to the bill before us, for the reasons before indicated, that the adjustment of duties which it contemplates, is unsatisfactory and exceptionable, and because this is not the accepted time for action upon the subject. A new Congress is about to come into existence under the recent apportionment of representation. Its members will assemble here, bearing with them the will of the people on this important subject. The tariff act of last July will then have gone into operation, and its practical effects upon the interests of the manufacturer, and upon the revenue of the country, will have been tried by the unerring test of experience. In short, sir, they will be able to act upon this subject under circumstances highly auspicious to its satisfactory adjustment, and will dispose of it, I trust, in such a manner as that the peace and harmony of our country shall be restored, and our glorious and happy Union perpetuated for ages to come.

Mr. WICKLIFFE rose to say he declined making a speech on the bill. He said he would explain his course to his constituents in the form of a circular, on his return home; and in the mean while remonstrated with the committee on the delay of public business, by endless discussion on general principles involved in the bill.

FEB. 4, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

Mr. DRAYTON fully concurred in these remarks. He had desired to reply to some of the speeches in favor of Mr. APPLETON's amendment, but would waive that purpose, and hoped other gentlemen would follow the example.

Mr. ADAMS then rose and said that he had some days since given notice of his determination, after the friends of the bill should have had an opportunity of rendering it as perfect as they could, to move to strike out the enacting clause; he would now fulfil his purpose, and would move that the enacting clause of the bill now before the committee be stricken out.

He would offer a few words in support of the motion. The merits of the bill, as well as its demerits, had been very fully argued, and he would not repeat what had been so well said by others. It was his opinion that neither this bill, nor any other at all resembling it, should pass at the present session of Congress. There was one idea which he had not heard suggested by any gentleman, and which was a decisive reason with him why the bill ought not to become a law. The bill would not, as it seemed to be calculated by many, reduce the amount of the revenue, but, on the contrary, greatly increase it. To reduce the revenue was the professed object of the bill. The reasons for passing it had been assigned, first by the President in his message to Congress, then by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, and lastly by the Committee of Ways and Means. But the President himself had recommended the measure conditionally only; if it should be found upon examination that the existing protection on certain commodities-manufactured in the country was excessive, that is, that it was greater than the good of the country required, that then a bill should be passed to reduce it. Had such an inquiry been instituted? It had not. No inquiry had taken place, and the House was consequently in possession of no evidence to show that the present protection was excessive. If the House then should pass this bill, which went so materially to affect great and wide-spread interests of the country, without any previous inquiry, it would not be following the recommendation of the President, but the contrary. Mr. A. did not say that if such an inquiry should be made, and it should then appear that the protection was too great, that he should oppose a bill to reduce it; but the investigation was an indispensable preliminary, and the fact must first be established.

There was another reason why Mr. A. should vote against the bill. From a certain quarter of the Union Congress had a most solemn declaration, made in the name of one of the States of the Union, and addressed to all the other States, that the protective system should no longer be carried into effect within that State. In the address from the convention of South Carolina to the people of the twenty-three other States of this Union, communicated by the President, with his recent message to Congress, are the following passages. The convention, speaking in the name of the people of South Carolina, say:

"We have therefore deliberately and unalterably resolved, that we will no longer submit to a system of oppression which reduces us to the degrading condition of tributary vassals; and which would reduce our posterity in a few generations, to a state of poverty and wretchedness, that would stand in melancholy contrast with the beautiful and delightful region in which the providence of God has cast our destinies. Having formed this resolution, with a full view of all its bearings, and of all its probable and possible issues, it is due to the gravity of the subject, and the solemnity of the occasion, that we should speak to our confederate brethren in the plain language of frankness and truth. Though we plant ourselves upon the constitution, and the immutable principles of justice and interest to operate exclusively through the civil tribunals and civil functionaries of the State, yet we will throw off this oppression at every hazard. We believe our remedy to be essentially peaceful. We believe the Federal Government has no shadow of right or authority to act against a State of the Confederacy in any form, much less to coerce it by military power. But we are aware of the diversities of human opinion, and have seen too many proofs of the infatuation of human power, not to have looked with the most anxious concern to the possibility of a resort to military or naval force on the part of the Federal Government; and in order to obviate the possibility of having the history of this contest stained by a single drop of fraternal blood, we have solemnly and irrevocably resolved that we will regard such a resort as the dissolution of the political ties which connect us with our confederate States; and will, forthwith, provide for the organization of a new and separate Government."

And again, and in another passage, the convention still more pointedly say:

"We will not, we cannot, we dare not submit to this degradation, and our resolve is fixed and unalterable that a protecting tariff shall be no longer enforced within the limits of South Carolina. We stand upon the principles of everlasting justice, and no human power shall drive us from our position."

Now, with respect to the peaceful nature of this remedy, he never heard it spoken of but it reminded him of the first adventure of Gil Blas. Gil Blas had been furnished by his uncle with a sorry mule, and thirty or forty pistoles, and sent forth to seek his fortune in the world. He set out accordingly, but had not proceeded far from home, when, as he was sitting on his beast counting his pistoles with much satisfaction into his hat, the mule suddenly raised her head, and pricked up her ears. Gil Blas looked round to see the cause of her alarm, and perceived an old hat upon the ground in the middle of the road, with a rosary of very large beads in it. This was the object which had startled his mule. At the same time he heard a voice addressing him in a very pathetic tone—"Good traveller! in the name of the merciful God, and of all the saints, do drop a few pieces of silver into the hat." Looking in the direction from which these sounds proceeded, he saw, to his great dismay, the muzzle of a blunderbuss projecting through the hedge, and pointing directly at his head. As he moved, this threatening muzzle moved also, still directed at his head. On looking more closely into the hedge, he perceived that it was supported on two cross sticks, and aimed by a figure having the air of an old soldier. Gil Blas, not much pleased with the looks of this very pious mendicant, hastily dropped some pieces into the hat, and clapping his heels into the sides of his mule rode off with all the speed he could from this peaceful solicitor of alms. This presented to Mr. A.'s mind one of the most perfect emblems of the pacific remedy of nullification he had ever seen.

But if it was indeed true, that nullification was intended as a pacific remedy, Mr. A. had this consolation, that the execution of the laws was also a pacific operation, and would continue to be such, as long as the resistance to it was pacific; so long as nullification was pacific, the resistance to nullification would prove to be pacific too, and so there could be no danger that force would be used at all. This was one reason why Mr. A. should vote against the bill. Gentlemen supposed that if it should not pass, there would be great danger of bloodshed; but there could not be the least danger of this, provided those who adopted the principles of nullification acted according to their professions and promises. It was not their purpose to resort to force; and as there would then be no need of force to execute the laws, there would be no force in the matter, and, of course, no bloodshed. It was supposed that this very peaceable and friendly question might be settled without the intervention of force. Mr. A. wished it might; but he considered it of such a nature that the question ought to be settled. It ought to be known whether there were any measures by which a State could defeat the laws of the Union. For if there were, and the laws might be set aside at pleasure; we must seek for some other form of government to live under.

The Tariff Bill.

With respect to the doctrine of protection, South Carolina expressly declared that there should no longer be a protecting tariff. Now it was Mr. A.'s firm belief that protection to his rights and interests was the right of the citizen, and the duty of the Government. What was Government instituted for? For protection. He repeated the position, that protection was the right of the citizen, and the duty and obligation of the Government. It was, on the part of Government, a corresponding duty to that of allegiance on the part of the citizens; and if Government should wholly neglect it, the bond between it and the citizen was dissolved. The principle was, in fact, admitted by the nullifiers themselves, in the address they had published to the citizens of South Carolina, in which they called upon the citizens to support nullification by their allegiance, as an admitted duty. It was very true that that paper denied to the United States Government the right to claim any allegiance; it denied that any allegiance was due to the United States by any body. But that, he believed, was not the opinion of a majority of the committee. He was confident that they believed the constitution was made by "We the people of the United States." By way of parallel Mr. A. had placed these two documents side by side, and looked alternately at both. The first instrument began with these words: "We the people of the United States." Now he would ask gentlemen whether these words conveyed to their mind any idea or not? He was speaking to men of intelligence—to men of feeling. What impression those words conveyed to other minds, it was not for him to say; but, for himself, he could say that nothing short of divine inspiration conveyed to his mind an idea more sublime. How were the words used? They were the first, the opening words of the constitution; they designated the speaking parties; these parties it was who declared that, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America."

If ever there had been an assemblage of men whose aspect impressed the mind with the ideas of grandeur and of moral sublimity, it was these men, using this language.

By the side of this paper he then placed the other; and how did it commence?

"To the people of Massachusetts, Virginia, New York, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Maryland, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, New Jersey, Georgia, Delaware, Rhode Island, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Missouri:

"We the people of South Carolina, assembled in convention," &c.

Mr. A. compared the two; and how did they sound? In the second, he found, indeed, the same idea as in the first. The people of these twenty-four States were the very same people as those who spoke in the constitution; but where was the grandeur, the moral sublimity, that filled the mind when we read the words, "We the people of the United States?" To his mind it was gone.

Indeed, when he read over this long list of names, all designating one people, it reminded him of the Spanish Hidalgo who knocked at the door of an inn at a late hour, and on a very dark night, and being asked his name, gave in five-and-twenty names, all of which belonged to him; but on hearing which, the innkeeper refused to open his door, declaring he had not room for one-half of all those people.

Did those words, "We the people" mean nothing? Did those who issued this instrument lie in the face of the world? Was there no such being in existence? If it were indeed so, then all the ideas Mr. A. had ever entertained must undergo an entire revolution. If the words meant any thing at all, they declared explicitly that that constitution was the work of the people of the United States. Who would deny it? Who could deny it, and not give the lie to that most majestic corporate body, and deny that it had any being?

Mr. A. had heard this Union called a confederacy of States; and such was the idea put forth in the South Carolina address. It did not address the people of the United States; it recognised no such people. The constitution, according to that doctrine, was the work, not of the people, but of their attorneys. It was said that the act was the act of the States, and that this was a union of States. That was, in one sense, true. It was a union of the people, and also a union of States. The convention of 1787 was the result of an act of the representatives of States; but, as it came from their hands, the instrument was nothing; it had no more force or value than a blank indenture, not sealed. It might as well be maintained that the attorney who drew an indenture was one of the parties to it, because he drew it. It was true that the States were also parties to it, because they had always been separate communities, and, after the establishment of the national independence, were still to continue so. That was the reason why the votes of the people were taken in separate masses, and not in one. It was more convenient; but it was not the State who gave force to the constitution. The convention sent the instrument to Congress, and asked them to submit it to the State Legislatures; but did the State Legislatures act upon it? No. And why? Because they could never use the language, "We the people." They were not the parties to it; they could not give it their sanction; they did not pretend to act upon it; they called conventions of the people to decide on the single question, and the people adopted the constitution, commencing with the words, "We the people." It had been the act of the people collected in separate communities, but forming one people, whose sanction alone gave to the constitution all its power. Even had the States, as States, unanimously ratified it, it would have been a dead letter until the people had acted upon it. In fact, it was in this very point that the difference lay between this instrument and the confederation. The nullifiers would have them to be one and the same. The confederation had been created by the State Legislatures and by Congress. They went on the principle that this was not a Government, but a confederacy. Therefore it was first made by the State Legislatures, and afterwards by Congress. The people had never acted upon it at all; they had no part or lot in making it; and it was because such an instrument was found, in practice, to be wholly inefficient, and that it would be impossible for the people of this Union to live happily or peaceably under it, that they went to work another way.

Here, however, Mr. A. said that he was wandering from the subject before the committee.

The position he had assumed was, that the Government was bound to protect the great interests, all the great interests of the citizens. Wherever any great interest existed in the community, there the protection of Government must, of right, be extended. But protection

The Tariff Bill.

might be extended in different forms to different interests. It was true that the interests of one portion of the community could often be protected only at the expense of some other portion of it. It was the complaint of the nullifiers that the Government took money out of the pockets of one portion of the Union to put it into the pockets of another. And, in extending protection, this must always more or less be the case. But then, while the rights of one party were protected in this way, the rights of the other party were protected, equally, but in a different way. He would illustrate this position.

In the Southern and the Southwestern portions of this Union, there existed a certain interest, which he need not more particularly designate, which enjoyed under the constitution and the laws of the United States, an especial protection peculiar to itself. It was protected first by representation. There were on that floor upwards of twenty members who represented what in other States had no representation at all. Mr. A. believed that it was not three days since he had heard it declared by a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CLAYTON,] that the species of population he now alluded to constituted the "machinery of the South." Now, that machinery had twenty odd representatives in that hall; representatives elected, not by the machinery, but by those who owned it. Was there any such representation in any other portion of the Union? Did the manufacturers ask for any representation on their machinery? He believed their looms and factories had no vote in Congress; but the machinery of the South had more than twenty representatives on that floor. And if he should go back to the history of this Government from its foundation, it would be easy to prove that its decisions had been effected in general by majorities less than that. Nay, he might go further, and insist that that very representation of which he had spoken, had ever been, in fact, the ruling power of this Government. Was this not protection? Was it not protection at the expense of another portion of the community? If it did not literally take money out of the pockets of some, and put it into the pockets of others, still it operated in precisely the same way. Yes; this very protection had taken millions and millions of money from the free laboring population of this country, and put it into the pockets of the owners of Southern machinery. Mr. A. did not complain of this. He did not say that it was not all right. What he said, was, that the South possessed a great protected interest—an interest protected by that instrument—[Mr. A. held the constitution in his hand.] He was for adhering to the bargain, because it was a bargain. Not that he would agree to it if the bargain were now to be made over again.

This interest was further protected by another provision of that same instrument.

"No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

What was this but protection to the owners of the machinery of the South. And let it be observed that a provision like this ran counter to all the tenor of legislation in the free States. It was contrary to all the notions and feelings of the people of the North, to deliver a man up to any foreign authority unless he had been guilty of some crime. And, but for such a clause in the compact, a Southern gentleman who had lost some article of his machinery, could never recover him back from the free States.

The constitution contained another clause, extending still further protection to the same interest. It guaranteed to every State in the Union a republican Government.

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

This, to be sure, was a general provision, operating alike on every portion of the Union. But every body knew that, where this sort of machinery existed, the State was more liable to domestic violence than they were elsewhere, because that machinery sometimes exerted a self-moving power. Such a power had been exerted. The call for this protection had very recently been made, and it had been answered; and the power of the Union had been exerted to insure the owners of the machinery against domestic violence. Mr. A. would say one word more on this guarantee of a republican form of Government. It was a serious question in his mind whether that part of the constitution was not at this very time on the eve of being called into execution. He had no hesitation in saying that, if South Carolina were not at this moment under a Government not republican, she was at a very little distance from it. It deserved serious consideration, whether the ordinance of the nullifiers had not placed South Carolina without the verge of republican Governments. When he endeavored to reflect upon what the proceedings of South Carolina had been, and asked himself whether the power now operating there could truly be described as a republican Government, he felt himself unable to answer the question. He should not further enlarge on this point at present. But it was a serious question, and it deserved serious consideration.

Such was the protection extended by the constitution to a particular interest in this Union.

But that same interest was further protected by the laws of the United States. It was protected by the existence of a standing army. If the States of this Union were all free republican States, and none of them possessed any of the machinery of which he had spoken, and if another portion of the Union were not exposed to another danger, from their vicinity to the tribes of Indian savages, he believed it would be difficult to prove to the House the necessity for any such thing as a standing army. What in fact was the occupation of the army? It had been protecting this very same interest. It had been doing so ever since the army existed. Of what use to the district of Plymouth, which he here represented, was the standing army of the United States? Of not one dollar's use, and never had been. He would go further. The army was not of one dollar's value to the whole manufacturing interest. The persons engaged in manufactures were, and ever had been, most orderly and exemplary in their obedience to the laws. No army was necessary to keep them in order. Now the United States kept up an army of six thousand men. What to do? To protect the owners of this machinery, and to defend the settlers on our Western frontier. In what had it been occupied during the last summer? In protecting the factories? No. In suppressing an Indian war. The army existed only for the protection of the South and of the West. Of what value was it to those manufacturers or agriculturists, at whom the House was going to strike by this bill? There was not one among the poorest shepherds who tended their flocks on Mr. A.'s native hills, that did not pay his quota towards the support of this army. Was not this taking money out of the pockets of one, to put it into the pockets of another? Yet what was the ground of all the complaints? While the people of Massachusetts were spending their money to support the South and the West, what show of right had gentlemen from the South? He would do the members from the West the justice to admit that they said no such thing, but what right had the representation from the South to come on that floor, and tell them, "We will not submit to pay one single cent to protect you?"

But there was another great interest protected under

H. OF R.]

The Tariff Bill.

the constitution. He referred to the interest of commerce and navigation. The country had a navy, which was now costing it two or three millions of dollars a year. Of what value was this to the manufacturer, or to the wool grower, if they should reason on the narrow and contracted principle, that their personal interest was the only interest in the community for which they ought to care? On such principles, the navy was nothing to them. It might achieve as many, and as glorious victories as ever had been won by the wooden walls of the fast anchored isle: the manufacturer was not a cent the richer for them. But he was obliged to pay to support the navy, and to pay six or seven millions, including navy and army.

When he heard gentlemen talk about reducing revenue to the wants of the Government, he wanted them first to specify what are the wants of the Government. Protection, it seemed, was not one of them. Well; if they must withdraw protection from the free white labor of the North, then it ought to be withdrawn from the machinery of the South. Let them disband their army: this would go as far as four or five millions towards reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government. The next step was to abolish the navy; for why should commerce and navigation continue to enjoy protection, when it was withdrawn from the other interests of the country? Well; when this had been done, and Congress had been so very generous as to give away all the public lands, what, he asked, would remain for the General Government to do? Nothing. There would be nothing for it to do. The members might then withdraw protection from themselves by abolishing their pay, and there would be but one step more remaining, which would be to dissolve the Government. No Government would be needed. Let it go back to its original elements—let it go back to the States—let it go back to the confederation—go back to the people. This was the legitimate consequence of those arguments urged by gentlemen who would no longer submit to a system of protection.

Mr. A. might say, that his constituents possessed as much right to say to the people of the South—we will not submit to the protection of your interests; as the people of the South had to address such language to them.

There was another decided reason which operated with him against passing any bill whatever, upon this subject, at this time.

The House could not pass any bill that would not, of necessity, confirm the ordinance of South Carolina. No law upon this subject could, at this time, be enacted by Congress, but would be received and understood by all parties, friend and foe, to be the triumph of nullification. The State of South Carolina had said that the tariff law was null and void; and that it should not be executed within her limits. And Congress immediately replies, by declaring that that law should not be executed any where. Mr. A. admitted that such a proceeding might, for a moment, remove the question of nullification. But it would be for a moment only. Let Congress permit one State to declare that its laws should not be executed, and submit to have that declaration carried into effect, and they would soon have States enough tell them that the laws should not be executed within their limits. And, without intending any reflection on South Carolina, he might observe, that there were States in this Union, who, if they should say the same thing that South Carolina had said, might make it a much more serious question. And the House might take his word that they would have such language addressed to them.

Mr. A. was against the passage of any thing. He wished to see the question settled. South Carolina had made up an issue; she said she wished it settled peaceably. Mr. A. was for meeting her, and settling the question she had made. This Union was now tottering. It was tottering to its foundation, on the question whether a single State possessed the power to annul laws enacted by the whole Union. He averred that this was a question on which the continuance of the Union depended. It was a question that must be settled, and this was the time to settle it. There was no time in which it could be so fitly and so advantageously settled, as at this time, because those who raised the question declared their desire to be, that it should be settled peaceably. Mr. A. wished that it might be settled peaceably. He believed that it would be, because he believed that the nullifiers would not strike the first blow; and that the Government would be too wise and too cautious to do it; and if neither party struck the first blow, it must be settled peaceably. Either the laws would be executed, or the tariff annulled, and the protecting system destroyed. If that system should be destroyed, he would not say in what form the question would come up, as a question far more serious than was now made, and to be settled in reference to a different interest. At present, the interests of the South were protected, and superabundantly protected, by the provisions of the constitution. Let that protection be destroyed, and they would find their security put in question in a manner not so easily gotten rid of. The notion held out in favor of the bill was, that it was to allay discontents. And the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had delivered a very pathetic and very eloquent eulogium upon fear. Mr. A. had listened to it with great delight; but as he knew that gentleman to be an accomplished classic scholar, he would venture to remind him that there were other virtues besides fear, suitable for the exercise of a patriot and a statesman, on which as just and eloquent eulogiums might be pronounced. Among these was the virtue of fortitude—a virtue, which he was under a solemn conviction that every member of this House, and every intelligent citizen of this community, would at no distant day be called upon to exercise; in commendation of which he would refer the gentleman to a classic authority, which no one better understood, or was more qualified to appreciate. He alluded to the sentiment so eloquently expressed by the great Roman poet.

*Iustum et tenacem propositi virum
Non civium ardor prava jubentium.
Non vultus instantis Tyranni, Mente quatit solida.*

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. A., I ask the forgiveness of the committee for having detained them so long, and have nothing more to say.

Mr. JENIFER hoped the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would either be withdrawn or rejected, until the bill should have been further amended.

Mr. BARRINGER replied, with warmth, to the speech of Mr. ADAMS, deprecating any step that should go at once to test the strength and existence of the Government.

Mr. BURGESS followed, and in the course of his remarks stated that he had a resolution which he wished to offer, limiting the operation of the bill of last session to eight years.

[Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, replied to Mr. ADAMS, in a strain of great warmth, as having introduced topics that must inevitably excite the most hostile and even furious passions. He examined the positions which he understood to have been taken by Mr. ADAMS, and which he condemned, as worse than nullification itself.]

Mr. ADAMS denied that Mr. DRAYTON had justly represented his argument.

The following is a substantial report of Mr. DRAYTON's remarks, though defective in some of the particulars upon which Mr. ADAMS touched in his reply a few days afterwards:]

Mr. DRAYTON said that, had it not been that the debate had taken an entirely new turn, and utterly inconsistent with the subject before them, he should have persevered in the silence which he had stated that he should maintain, so long as the bill was in committee; but to the

The Tariff Bill.

inflammatory remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts he felt himself compelled to reply.

That gentleman, in the course of his argument, had introduced a topic of a particularly delicate and exciting nature, and discussed it in a manner which was calculated to engender the bitterest discord. He had thrown a fire-brand into that hall. After expatiating upon the protection which is guaranteed by the constitution to the various interests embraced within it, he told us that its protection was extended to the slaves of the South, and that if the protection required by the manufacturers and agriculturists of the North and East, to which they were equally entitled, should be withheld from them, as it would be by the passage of this bill, protection would be refused to the South; and they might take their own interests in their own hands. He [Mr. D.] was not certain that he had given the words of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (as he had taken no notes of his speech,) but he was satisfied that he had substantially expressed their meaning.

Mr. ADAMS here interrupted Mr. D., and said that he had said no such thing.

It being now five o'clock, Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved that the committee should rise; but the motion was overruled.

Mr. DRAYTON then resumed. The remarks had been made; and he repeated that they were, substantially, what he had said. He appealed to all who had heard the gentleman from Massachusetts, whether he had not expressed, or plainly implied, that protection would be withdrawn from the slave property of the South, unless the freemen of the North and East were protected by a tariff, which would not be the case if this bill should become a law. Had not language such as this a natural and necessary tendency to create discontent and inflammatory feelings, to excite a burst of indignation in the bosom of every one who heard it? If the intention of the gentleman from Massachusetts had been to rouse up those prejudices and passions, (which should be peculiarly excluded from a legislative body,) he could scarcely have accomplished his intention more successfully.

Mr. D. went on by observing, that well indeed might the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARRINGER] pronounce this to be a spirit-stirring question, as the question presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts was, whether we were to remain as united States, or be broken into unconnected and hostile fragments, according to the rejection or the passage of a bill which, whether expedient or inexpedient, was clearly within the constitutional power of Congress to act upon; for no one will doubt the constitutional power of Congress to reduce the quantum of protection to the manufacturers, or the amount of taxation to be levied upon the people. Has it already come to this? said Mr. D. Are we now to choose between the alternatives of dissolving the Union, or of rejecting this tariff bill? Does the permanence of our free and renowned institutions depend upon our granting as many dollars and cents for the protection of domestic industry as its advocates shall prescribe to the legislature? He could not, Mr. D. said, and would not, believe that motives so degrading could operate upon the people in any section of the United States.

After a few remarks in reply to some observations of Mr. BURGESS on the subject of the numerous persons who would be thrown out of employment in the event of the protection afforded to the Eastern manufacturers being withdrawn, Mr. D. proceeded to notice another part of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts. That gentleman had said that the bill had been introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means, from the apprehension of a coalition with the nullifiers of South Carolina. Mr. D. replied that this was not the first time that he had disclaimed, nor would it probably be the last time that he should disclaim the doctrine of nullification. He regarded it as a doctrine false in theory, mischievous in its results, and unsupported by any arguments which bore the semblance of plausibility. Reduced to practice, it was neither more nor less than revolution; its termination must be civil war, to be decided like all other appeals to arms—by the longest purse and the largest battalions. But, whilst we were told that apprehensions of the terrors of nullification had occasioned the introduction of the bill, was it not proclaimed by the gentleman from Massachusetts that we might expect to be visited by the vengeance of certain sections of the country, should they be deprived of that protection which they claimed as a constitutional right? But whether the South Carolina doctrine, as it is termed, was to be upheld or denounced, did not constitute the question before the committee. It was for us now to determine, whatever might be the course of South Carolina, whether the bill upon the table was a good or a bad one; whether the surplus revenue, which the Secretary of the Treasury informs us exceeds the proper wants of the Government by several millions, would not be reduced by it; and whether, therefore, for these, or for any other reasons, the bill which has been reported ought not to become a law.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, not content with asserting that the Committee of Ways and Means had taken counsel from their fears, had charged the members of this committee, who should vote for the bill, with being dictated to by their fears of South Carolina. Mr. D. did not believe that the vote of a single representative would be directed by so unworthy a motive as fear. What had an individual performing his duty here to apprehend? If fear did, in any degree, operate upon the minds of any members, it would not be the fear of offending, or of irritating South Carolina, but the fear of being suspected to be controlled in their votes by the menaces of South Carolina. A fear arising from this cause, which might unconsciously influence an honorable man, would be more likely to render him hostile than friendly to the bill. But the fear which the gentleman from Massachusetts had appealed to, was direct. He had alluded to what he supposed were the fears, the personal fears, of the slaveholders of the South; to the dangers with which they would be surrounded should the protection of the constitution be withdrawn from them; to the refusal of that protection by the North and East, should the protection to which they were constitutionally entitled be taken from them; to the spirit which would be called forth by the passage of this bill, among the manufacturers and agriculturists of the North, more to be dreaded than the nullification of South Carolina. The inference to be drawn from this declaration, Mr. D. presumed to be, that as the physical force of the North and East exceeded that of the South, it was, therefore, more to be dreaded, as it was more competent to effect its object. If this spirit could be excited by the passage of the bill; if it was to drive those who were inflamed by it to the desperate extremes which had been represented, then, according to the gentleman from Massachusetts, should this bill pass. The North and the East would no longer regard themselves as bound by the federal compact, and the Union would be dissolved.

Mr. D. appealed to the committee, whether observations such as these were not more reprehensible than the doctrines of South Carolina. Whether she was right or wrong in her assertion of the right of nullification, (and that he thought her radically wrong, he had never hesitated to avow,) her resistance to the legislation of Congress proceeded from the enactment of laws which three-fourths of South Carolina and of the Southern States believed to be unconstitutional, whereas the resistance with which we were menaced from the North and from the East, would be founded upon the passage of a law, the constitutionality of which they could not question.

H. OF R.]

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. D. would say a few words upon that part of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts which related to the protection afforded by the constitution to the South. In the second section of the first article of the constitution, a representative to Congress is granted to the Southern States for three-fifths of their slaves, and as an equivalent for this concession, they are liable to the payment of direct taxes, in a ratio apportioned to that representation. This was a compromise assented to when the constitution was adopted, and was one, among other instances contained in that instrument, of the mutual concessions and compromises, upon which it was established. As the South obtained a larger representation than their free population entitled them to, in return they were bound to discharge a proportionably greater share of direct taxation. These were the conditions of the compact. They were fairly and voluntarily entered into; they were considered to be expedient when they were ratified, and, at this day, none of the contracting parties have a right to complain of them.

As to the other species of protection, by the provisions of the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts had so much enlarged, Mr. D. observed that this protection was rather nominal than real; that the Southern States placed no reliance upon it; that they were confident that they were able to protect themselves; and he felt assured that if they believed that the security of the tenure by which they held their slaves, depended upon the succor which they were constitutionally authorized to require from the Union, they would abandon all hope of retaining their slaves in subjection.

Mr. D. then commented at some length, and with considerable acrimony, upon certain passages in a report and resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, relating to the bill before the committee; but having subsequently ascertained that the report and resolutions were inaccurately transcribed in the paper in which he had read them, and that they did not contain the passages which he had censured, we have, at his request, omitted to publish that part of his speech.

[On a subsequent day, Mr. D. took occasion to make an explanation in relation to the expressions used by him respecting language which he had erroneously understood to be contained in the resolutions of the Massachusetts Legislature, and which he afterwards discovered not to be in that paper; he fully retracted what he had said, and expressed, in very complimentary terms, his high regard for that State and her citizens.]

Mr. D., in concluding, said that he should not examine the details of this bill; that it never had been his intention to do so before the committee; that he had risen solely in consequence of some of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts; and that in giving his vote he should be influenced by the provisions of the bill, and not at all by the situation of South Carolina; and he trusted that no members would be drawn from the path of their duty, by irrelevant and inflammatory remarks, but that they would be led by those motives of justice and expediency which, as legislators, they were bound to obey.

Mr. ADAMS was about to reply, when

Mr. PATTON obtained the floor, but gave way for a motion for the rising of the committee.

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

The morning business having been gone through, the House passed to the orders of the day, and again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. WAYNE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. PATTON, of Virginia, rose and said that he had not intended, until the evening before, to ask the attention of the committee to any observations of his upon the important measure now under discussion.

He did not now propose to enter upon any examination of the general principles of the American system. He concurred in the sentiment which had been expressed, and he believed was universally entertained in the House, that no argument, on either side, was likely to produce a change of opinion, either as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality, the expediency or inexpediency, as a measure of national policy and justice, of that system. For ten or twelve years these questions, in all their aspects, had engaged the deliberations, not only of Congress, but of the people of the United States, and with continually increasing anxiety and solemnity. Those who were not by this time satisfied upon these questions, must be either above, or below, or beyond, the reach of argument.

In the progress of the discussion, not only hostility of interest, and consequent collision of opinion, between different classes of men, have developed themselves, but they have unfortunately assumed a sectional location, out of which have arisen geographical parties, who, pushing their opinions to extremes, have brought about a state of things which, in the opinion of cool, reflecting men, is more menacing to the peaceful continuance of the Union, than any which has ever existed since the establishment of independence.

So long, said Mr. P., as the discussion pursued the ordinary path, I, in common with most of those with whom I act on this subject, abstained and intended to refrain from contributing to a debate which, confined almost exclusively to the opponents of the bill, they seemed disposed, for reasons best known to themselves, to protract to an almost interminable length. Our course was to wait patiently until this tide of discussion should have an ebb, and avoid saying any thing that, by possibility, might tend to increase that excitement of feeling, so unfriendly to a peaceful and harmonious adjustment of this distracting contest, until some decisive indication was given by this body as to its intention to do any thing calculated to ameliorate the grievances of which the South complained.

The debate, however, has suddenly taken a new and unexpected turn, on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, a motion which, if successful, levelled a fatal blow at all prospect of conciliation and peace, and which he has thought proper to accompany with remarks of a character, uttered in a temper, and indicating a spirit, in my judgment, extremely unsuited to the occasion, the crisis in the affairs of the country, and the source from which they proceeded: remarks, which I concur with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DRAVOT] in considering as well calculated as any that could have been uttered, to throw a firebrand into our councils, to add fuel to a flame already burning too fiercely, and to arouse passions, and exasperate prejudices, which it ought to be the business of every patriot to do all in his power to extinguish, to allay, and subdue. Standing here as the representative in part of a State, which, by her Legislature, has so recently manifested, with almost unexampled unanimity, her desire to preserve peace, by entreating both parties to the impending conflict, to forbear from proceeding to extremities; which has expended so much blood and treasure in defending and maintaining the liberties of these States; and contributed so largely, both in council and in action, towards creating and preserving, and has so deep a stake in the continuance of this Union, it was impossible to suppress the expression of my surprise, regret, and alarm, at the spirit displayed so unexpectedly by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

For what purpose I know not, it has seemed good to him to draw into this discussion topics which have nothing to do with the bill before this committee, and to invite us, by the course of his remarks, to enter upon that wide field of political metaphysics which, from another source, had been unfortunately spread out upon the political arena prematurely, unnecessarily, and, in my judgment, unwisely. I allude to the President's proclamation.

The gentleman has avowed opinions, in relation to one of those questions, which have thus been presented to the American public, involving some principles in relation to the origin and character of this Government, which the State of Virginia has uniformly and strenuously denied to be true, and which I feel it my duty, concurring, as I do, in this opinion, and since no other of her delegation have chosen to do so, not to permit to pass without entering my protest against, and making an humble effort to refute them. I shall confine myself to those topics which the gentleman has drawn into discussion, and will not enter upon any of the others connected with them in the document to which I have already referred; and for the full discussion of all the theories contained in which, a more suitable occasion will be afforded, in all probability, during the session.

The proposition which he asserts, in substance, is, that this Government is a completely sovereign Government, created by the people of the United States, as one people, and exercising its powers by the authority of the people, as one political community. And by what argument does he sustain this proposition? It is founded exclusively upon a part of the preamble of the constitution, "We, the people of the United States." And he says that, not to admit the truth of his proposition, is "to give the lie" to the express declaration of the constitution itself. Sir, it seems to me that a candid examination of this part of the preamble, as well as every other part of it, leads to an opposite conclusion; and that, to admit the interpretation contended for by him, is not only to pervert the obvious sense of the passage he relies on, but "to give the lie," to borrow the gentleman's language, to the whole preamble, to the article of ratification, and to the most notorious historical facts. This expression of "We, the people of the United States," was objected to by Patrick Henry, in the Virginia Convention called to consider of the ratification of the constitution, as justifying the inference that a consolidated Government was intended to be created. And he asked by what authority the convention had used the expression "We, the people," instead of "We, the States." He was answered by Mr. Madison, also a member of that convention, who had then recently been a member of the convention who framed the constitution, who had taken a prominent part in forming, and has since done more to rescue it from the perversions and misconstructions to which it has, at different times, been exposed, than any man living or dead. This is his language:

"Who are the parties to it? (the constitution.) The people; but not the people as composing one great body, but the people as composing thirteen sovereignties. Were it, as the gentleman asserts, a consolidated Government, the assent of a majority of the people would be sufficient for its establishment; and as a majority have adopted it already, the remaining States would be bound by the act of a majority, even if they unanimously reprobated it. Were it such a Government as is now suggested, it would be now binding on the people of this State, without having had the privilege of deliberating upon it. Should all the States adopt it, it will then be a Government established by the thirteen States of America, not by the intervention of the Legislature, but by the people at large."

I should be glad to know what is the difference between these two expressions, "we, the people of the United States," and "we, the people of the States united." Do they not express the same idea? Do they not both assert precisely the same historical fact, viz. that the union of the States was assented to by the people of the States, as such?

Let us look a little further into this preamble. What did "the people of the United States" propose to do? Why, to form a more perfect union, &c. Now, who ever heard of a union of people in a political association? The term union, applied to States, is intelligible and appropriate. It was, then, the people of the States who agreed to the union of the States. The whole amount of it was that they resolved to continue the union, which existed before under the articles of confederation, and to make that union more perfect. This union, it is admitted by the gentleman, constituted a mere confederacy; but the origin of both is the same; created alike by the authority of the States; their assent being given, in one case, by the State Governments; in the other, by the people of each State. And what was it that, in this last case, was created? a constitution for the people of America? a constitution for the people of the United States? No; neither; but, as the preamble itself declares, "a constitution for the United States." This was not a new name even for the Government; the first section of the articles of confederation declares that "the style of this confederacy shall be the United States of America."

This view of the question is fully sustained by an authority which, in Virginia, has always been regarded as entitled to the highest respect, and cannot fail to be so regarded every where, for the ability with which it treats of the origin and character of the Government, and the lucid manner in which it expounds those doctrines of constitutional construction upon which the republican party came into power in 1801. I beg leave to read a passage which places this matter, which I am now considering, in a clear light.

In support of that branch of the third resolution of 1798, which affirms "that the States are parties to the constitution," after enumerating the various senses in which the term "States" is used in the constitution, and, among others, that, "lastly, it means the people composing those political societies in their highest sovereign capacity," the report drawn by Mr. Madison proceeds thus: "In the present instance, whatever different constructions of the term 'States,' in the resolution, may have been entertained, all will at last concur in that last mentioned, because in that sense the constitution was submitted to the 'States;' in that sense the 'States' ratified it; and in that sense of the term 'States,' they are consequently parties to the compact, from which the power of the Federal Government results. This is, in truth, nothing more than a condensed statement of historical facts.

The article of ratification found at the close of the constitution seems to me to confute the interpretation for which he contends. The ratification of nine States shall be "sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between the States so ratifying the same;" not over the people of America, or over the people of the United States even, but between the States so ratifying the same. The charter itself thus, at the end of it, declaring, in unequivocal terms, its character, when formed, to be a government between States, as in the preamble it had deduced its own origin from, and declared its object to be for a union of States. Compare this article of ratification, and the preamble of the constitution, with the old articles of confederation. They are called "articles of confederation and perpetual union between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay," &c. &c., naming the whole thirteen; their style was, as before stated, "the United States of America." They were then, "articles of confederation and perpetual union between the United States of America;" and so this constitution was established "between the United States of America." I put it to any candid man to say if there can be a distinction made between the foundation and origin of the two Governments, as to the question whether they were compacts between States. The source from which both Governments were derived was the same. The articles of confederation constituted a Government for the confederacy as much as the constitution constitutes a Government for the Union. They are both Governments—constitutional Governments—compacts between sovereign States. They differ as to the extent of the powers conferred upon the Government, and in the mode in which those powers are to be exercised: in one case, the action of the Government being upon the States; in the other, upon the citizens directly. In its mode of action, this Government is partly national, and partly federal; in its origin and foundation, it is wholly federal. The States created—the States preserve—the States alone can reform, alter, or abolish it.

The honorable gentleman says, and he seemed to be transported into the regions of poetry at the thought, that "there is a moral grandeur and sublimity" in the idea of this great Government over the whole people as one people. I will not dispute with him about a matter of taste, though it seems to me to be an essential ingredient in the grandeur and sublimity of an idea of Government, that it should have some foundation in truth. If the picture of moral grandeur and sublimity presented to the mind by this imaginary Government of one people was only completed, as there is some reason to apprehend it will be, by engrafting upon the constitution, and establishing in practice, the "common defence" doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the "general welfare" doctrine by which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. Buxton] resolves all questions of constitutional power, then we should have established a vast consolidated empire, with a Government of unlimited powers, apparently the consummation of the hopes and efforts of one class of politicians in this country. Let me oppose to this idea of moral grandeur and sublimity the sentiment of the venerable sage and patriot of Montpelier, who says, in that report which I have already quoted, that "it adds to the stability and dignity, as well as to the authority of the constitution, that it rests on the legitimate and solid foundation," derived from its being formed by "the sanction of the States, given by each in its sovereign capacity."

It may suit the fancy of a poet to revel in the "moral grandeur and sublimity of an idea" of Government which exists only in the imagination—the offspring of fiction; but, to my mind, there is something more grand and elevating in the contemplations of a statesman who admires the stability and dignity of a Government resting upon the solid basis of truth and reality.

I will proceed to reply to some other portions of the gentleman's remarks. A new, I believe perfectly new, and most extraordinary argument is advanced by him in favor of the protection which he claims for domestic manufactures.

It is claimed as an equivalent for the protection given (as is alleged) by the constitution to the slave interest of the South. Far be it from me to undervalue the benefits conferred upon the South; no less than other parts of the country, by this Union. I have endeavored to calculate its value, and deem it incalculable. I should regard its dissolution as one of the greatest evils which could befall, not ourselves and our posterity only, but the whole human family; it would blast forever the best hopes of the friends of freedom throughout the world, and extinguish the fire of liberty upon all the altars on which it has been kindled by our example and our success. The beneficent protection afforded by the Union is, that it is the bond of domestic tranquility, the safeguard against intertine commotions and civil wars, and the arm of our defence against foreign aggression. But the only just and legitimate protection which this Government, or any other Government, can extend to individuals or classes of individuals, is to secure them in the enjoyment of the fruits of their own industry; in the unfettered exercise of their own skill and enterprise, and in the pursuit of their own happiness in their own way; with this restriction only, in the language of the maxim of the civil law, that they shall so use their own as not to injure that of another. This great rule is the corner stone of every well constructed edifice of Government. I believe the Government of this Union was designed by its framers to rest on this solid and just foundation; and if it were thus administered, it would secure all the purposes for which it was formed; "establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." But when any Government imposes burdens upon the community which the legitimate purposes of the Government do not call for—takes money out of the pockets of the people at large, not required for public uses, but for the benefit of a particular class of individuals, its action is essentially unjust and tyrannical, no matter under what former pretexts it is done. And, sir, when a claim is made to persevere in a system of unequal and unjust taxation, (as we of the South regard the tariff system to be,) even at the hazard of civil war, upon the allegation that the South receives an equivalent for these exactions in some peculiar protection which is afforded by the constitution and the Union to our slave interest, I feel it to be proper to meet the assertion and argument on the threshold, and to examine if it has any foundation in the constitution. I deny it utterly.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has referred to various provisions of the constitution as sustaining him in this novel position.

1st. The provision by which, in apportioning representation among the States, it is required that three-fifths of the slaves shall be enumerated.

2d. The fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution, which provides that the United States shall, "on application of the Legislature or of the Executive," when the Legislature cannot be convened "protect each" State "against domestic violence."

3d. The authority given to Congress to raise and support armies and a navy.

As to the first, I need hardly remind this committee, and certainly not the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the question as to the proper basis of taxation and representation, in relation to the slave interest of the South, was coeval with the declaration of independence. Immediately after that event, the articles of confederation were discussed in the old Congress of '76. The article relating to this matter, as originally proposed, and finally adopted, provided, that "all charges of war, and other expenses incurred for the common defence and general welfare, &c. shall be defrayed out of a common treasury," to be "supplied by the several colonies in proportion to the number of inhabitants of every age, sex, and quality," &c. It was proposed by Mr. Chase, of Maryland, to amend it so that the quota should be fixed by the number of the white inhabitants.

It is a curious piece of political history, especially taken in connexion with a sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that, in the decision of that question, all the slave-holding States, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, (Georgia being divided,) voted in favor of the amendment; and New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, all substantially non-slave-holding States, voted against the amendment, and rejected it. It is worth while to notice the argument by which this decision was sustained, and for this purpose I will read an extract from one of the most distinguished, eloquent, and (notwithstanding that the violence of party spirit induced many to undervalue his services and character,) I will say one of the most patriotic of our revolutionary men.

I read from the speech of Mr. John Adams. He observes: "That the number of people were taken, by this article, as an index of the wealth of the State, and not as subjects of taxation; that, as to this matter, it was of no consequence by what name you called your people, whether by that of freemen or slaves; that, in some countries the laboring poor were called freemen, in others they were called slaves; but that the difference, as to the State, was imaginary only. What matters it whether a landlord employing ten laborers on his farm, gives them annually as much money as will buy them the necessities of life, or gives them those necessities at short hand? The ten laborers add as much wealth annually to the State—increase its exports as much in the one case as the other. Certainly, five hundred freemen produce no more profits, no greater supplies for the payment of taxes, than five hundred slaves; therefore the State in which the laborers are called freemen, should be taxed no more than that in which they are called slaves. Suppose, by an extraordinary operation of nature, or of law, one-half of the laborers of a State could, in the course of one night, be transformed into slaves; would the State be made poorer, or less able to pay taxes? That the condition of the laboring poor in most countries, that of the fisherman, particularly of the Northern States, is as abject as that of slaves," &c.

Here is the argument (in which there is certainly great force) upon which the southern States were taxed, from the beginning, in proportion to their whole slave population. It goes to prove that both kinds of labor ought to contribute to the support of Government equally; and authorizes the inference, as a legitimate deduction, that they are entitled to the same kind and degree of protection, and in the same mode—by being represented. But the argument here is that a different and additional protection is to be given to the labor of the North, and that too at the expense of the labor of the South, though the character of the labor is the same as to the State, as well as the actual condition of the laborer.

There was no inconsistency in the course and opinions of the distinguished man whose argument I have just quoted. Immediately after the decision referred to, came on another question: how the States should be represented in the Congress of the confederacy? He spoke in favor of each State voting in proportion to the numbers of her people. Some of them who had voted for taxing us, according to the number of our inhabitants, and who represented large States, were in favor of voting in proportion to the number of free inhabitants. On this question the interests of the small States preponderated; and it was settled that each State should have one vote.

In the Convention these questions again arose; and the arrangement of the subjects of taxation and representation, in reference to the slaves, constituted one of those distracting subjects of controversy which brought the Convention to the verge of dissolution without agreeing to a plan of Government. It could not but produce difficulty; it was not a question that could be settled by any rule of abstract right. For, to borrow again the language of Mr. Adams, in the same debate, "Reason, justice, and equity, never had weight enough, on the face of the earth, to govern the councils of men; it is interest alone which does it, and it is interest alone which can be trusted; that, therefore, the interests within doors should be the mathematical representatives of the interests without doors."*

The representatives of the slave-holding States, in the Convention, as well as those of the non-slave-holding States, were fully sensible of this truth; and, by their course in that body, gave a new illustration of it; the interests without doors were represented by interests within; and the slave-holding States insisted that they were entitled to representation for their whole slave population; and the free States, that the slaves should not be counted at all. This contest resulted in the adoption of the rule of apportioning representation and direct taxes by the same ratio, and estimating three-fifths only of those slaves in regard to each. On what authority, then, does the gentleman refer to this clause of the constitution, as conferring peculiar protection to the slave interest in the South? Why may not we, with as much propriety, insist that it had secured to the labor of the North an advantage to which it was not entitled; and, for which, in the administration of the Government, we ought to have an equivalent? Instead of having our whole population represented, as we thought it ought to have been, and for which we had the authority of Mr. Adams, we insisted only upon a part being represented, while the whole population of the North was told. It was the result of that spirit of compromise which presided in the formation of the constitution; which, on several occasions, since its establishment, has effected its preservation; which must be invoked again, and now; and will not be invoked in vain, if the professions of devotion to the Union are as sincere as they are loud, frequent, and ostentatious.

The gentleman from Massachusetts tells us, if the bargain were to be made over again, he would not make that compromise. I do not wonder at all at it. If that unyielding spirit of fortitude (as he calls it) which he has manifested, had prevailed in the convention, or a tithe part of it, we should never have had this glorious Union, which he now professes so much anxiety to preserve. If his spirit of fortitude be substituted for their spirit of concord and conciliation, and his doctrines, as to the power and authority of the Government, prevail, it requires little foresight to perceive that the Government must end, sooner or later, either in an irretrievable dissolution of the bonds of the Union, or be converted into one vast consolidated Government; which would be the sure and speedy precursor of a military despotism.

Sir, I had fondly hoped that, at this momentous epoch, Massachusetts would have been found standing by Virginia, in the cause of peace and harmony. I could not fail to remember, with lively sensibility, their early and constant association in the struggle for independence. Together they rocked in the cradle of the revolution; together they nursed and fostered the glorious offspring of that revolution—the union of these States—while it was rearing into vigor and maturity. They have differed, indeed, but I trust in no hostile spirit, as to the proper construction of the title-deeds, and the most judicious mode of managing the estate. Yet, I did hope that, animated by the same holy and ardent love of justice and liberty, they would yet be found standing together again, and employing their moral and political strength in the preservation of the noble inheritance of union from being despoiled by the hand of injustice, or its existence destroyed by the hand of violence. Sir, that hope is gone.

The spirit which is here indicated was not that which animated the venerated band of sages, heroes, and patriots, who composed the convention; they had not yet learned to forget—they were deeply imbued with that fraternal sympathy and affection which had been generated in the hearts of the American people, by their common suffering—their common perils—their common triumphs in a common cause. When the old confederacy was upon the eve of falling to pieces, and from causes which would have led inevitably to conflicts between the parties to it, the members of that convention, many of whom had hazarded their lives, sacrificed their fortunes, and, in the cabinet or in the field, given their support to the cause to which they had pledged their sacred honor, came forward, and, with true and genuine fortitude, laid upon the altar of their country their prejudices, their passions, and their local interests. The idea of resorting to arms for the purpose of avoiding the apprehended conflicts and quieting the existing disputes, was the last that would have entered into their minds. It was the alternative most abhorred, and to prevent which almost every thing was to be yielded.

But now, when a crisis scarcely less appalling is perceived by all to exist, what is the spirit displayed—the sort of “fortitude” recommended to us as more worthy of admiration even than the fear of doing injustice? Every exasperating topic, calculated to inflame passion and frighten away harmony, is sought for, and forced into the debate; and we have an exhibition of fortitude which, if it does not delight in, is determined to do nothing to prevent, a civil commotion; fortitude which enables gentlemen, rather than make any concession, rather than make any change even in the form of a law, to rejoice in the prospect of making an experiment of the strength of the Government, as philosophers kill rats in an air-pump to illustrate the truths of science; and with cold-blooded indifference regard the approach of a conflict between Governments in arms, which, if it shall once begin, no eye hath seen, nor ear heard, nor can any tongue adequately tell, its termination, or all its train of unutterable horrors. This is not the fortitude of patriots and statesmen, but that of professors and poets turned politicians; those Dermot McMorrough.

The gentleman, in the next place, deduces an argument in favor of this notion, that some peculiar protection is afforded to the slave interest of the South, from that provision of the constitution which stipulates that the United States shall protect each State against domestic violence. Is an opposition to the State laws and State authorities, by “domestic violence,” more likely to arise in the slave-holding States than in the non-slave-holding States? I deny it. Let it be proved. Virginia has been a slave-holding State, or community, for upwards of two hundred years. During all that time, there has never been any rising of the slaves against their masters of a character so formidable as to require any foreign aid whatever; none which could not have been suppressed in a few days by the people of the neighborhood, with the utmost ease, without even marshalling the State authorities. Indeed, I know of but one event of the kind in the whole Southern country, and that was the Southampton tragedy, which occurred in Virginia a year or two ago. This, in truth, was scarcely entitled to be regarded as an insurrection at all; it was a truly bloody but aimless outrage of a madman, and a few drunken followers. It is true, that, under the influence of a temporary panic occasioned by it, and a thousand unfounded rumors of contemplated and concerted risings in other places, an extraordinary and unfortunate debate was got up in the Virginia Legislature, principally promoted and sustained, however, by those who have comparatively no direct interest in the subject: for there, as here, it so happens that the anxiety which is manifested for the safety of the owners of slaves against “domestic violence,” comes principally, not from slave-owners themselves, nor from the slave-holding part of the country, but from the gratuitous, though I dare say amiable solicitude of those who have little or no concern in the matter. Shall I be told that we have been indebted for our security, while a colony, to the protection afforded by the mother country, and since, by the Union? Unfortunately for the proposition and the argument, there have been two instances of domestic violence against the State or colonial Governments, by discontented and insurrectionary white men—I mean Bacon's rebellion, in Virginia; and another of a character wholly different, and which I am ashamed to mention in the same connexion—I mean Shay's insurrection in Massachusetts. They were both very formidable.

I have an impression on my mind—the gentleman from Massachusetts knows as well as any other man whether it is well founded or not—that I have seen it stated by some authority entitled to confidence, as a part of the political history of this Government, that the extent and formidable character of the resistance to the State authorities in Massachusetts by Shay and his followers, contributed very essentially to overcome the reluctance which that State felt and manifested to send delegates to the convention in 1787.* Perhaps this fact may account for the peculiar arrangement of the States in voting upon a motion made in that convention by a Southern member, to strike out the words “domestic violence,” and insert “insurrections”—probably on the ground that the last word more distinctly embraced the kind of domestic violence that might be apprehended from the slaves. The votes were thus:

YEAS.—New Jersey, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia.

NAYS.—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

Perhaps there was no essential difference between the two phrases; but it is not at all unlikely that the vote for retaining the words in the constitution was given in the full and awful recollection of that formidable resistance to the State of Massachusetts, which was so extensive as, in many places, to prevent the administration of justice, by driving the judges from their seats, and shutting up the court-houses. And it is recorded of one of the judges, who happened to be something of a “military chieftain” too, that he marched into his court at the head of some hundreds of the people who stood by the Government, in the face of a larger body of the rebels assembled to prevent him from going on with his business, and used this memorable expression on taking his seat: that “he would live a judge, or die a general.”

Gentlemen may rest assured that the people of the Southern slaveholding States estimate this vaunted protection to our slave interest so far as it is regarded as furnishing us any peculiar safeguard, unconnected with the general blessings of union, as of very little worth. I expect there is not a Southern man within the sound of my voice who will not bear me out in the expression of the opinion that there is no people on earth who live in less apprehension from “domestic violence” than the people of the South. In support of this opinion, I beg leave to read a passage from a work which contains an able, comprehensive, and philosophical analysis of all those questions of slavery, colonization, abolition, &c. which I would most earnestly and respectfully request our Northern friends to peruse in a candid and dispassionate temper. If they will do so, I think they will at least be convinced that there is no occasion for them to suffer so much kind and anxious solicitude for our safety, or the comfort of our slaves.

I read from Professor Dew's Review of the Debate in the Virginia Legislature, in 1831 and 1832:

“We believe there was not a single citizen in Virginia

* Since making these remarks, I find the fact stated by me fully sustained by Marshall's Life of Washington, page 111, 5th volume; and the insurrection described as much more extensive and alarming than I represented it. The anecdote mentioned by me is told of a Colonel Cobb, almost in the language used by me. In the account given of the rebellion, it is stated, on the authority of Colonel Lee, that “a majority of the people of Massachusetts are in opposition to the Government. Some of the leaders avow the subversion of it to be their object, together with the abolition of debts, the division of property, and a reunion with Great Britain,” &c.

who felt any alarm from the negroes previous to the Southampton tragedy, and we believe at this moment there are very few who feel the slightest apprehension. We have no doubt, paradoxical as it may seem to some, but that the population of our slaveholding country enjoys as much or more conscious security than any other people on the face of the globe. You will find throughout the whole slaveholding portion of Virginia, and we believe it is the same in the Southern States generally, that the houses are scarcely ever fastened at night, so as to be completely inaccessible to those without, except in the towns. This simple fact is demonstration complete of the conscious security of our citizens, and their great confidence in the fidelity of the blacks."

The only well-grounded cause of apprehension that we have, proceeds from the perpetual teasing interference of deluded, but, I dare say, well-disposed fanatics, who infect our country with homilies about colonization, abolition, and emancipation. Sir, the only protection we have ever required, or probably ever will require on this subject, is, to "let us alone," and we will leave the entire benefit of the constitutional provision now under consideration, to our brethren of the North, as a security against domestic violence from their laborers, whom this tariff system, if carried out and persevered in, will grind down, ultimately, to the point of resistance here as well as in England, from which it is borrowed, where the starving operatives in the manufactories are almost daily found lifting their hands against their employers, committing acts of lawless outrage and desperation, and having to be dispersed by the bayonets of the military.

But this protection to us is alleged to be so peculiar and important, that it is made the pretext for sustaining a system which, it would seem to be assumed by gentlemen on both sides, is almost exclusively injurious to the slave labor of the South, and beneficial to that of the North, but which, in my opinion, acts injuriously to the labor and industry of the country every where, though not in an equal degree.

But, with these apparently avowed effects, it is asked that this unjust and unequal system shall be continued; that the labor of the North, by means of burdens on the slave labor of the South, may be lifted above its natural elevation in all other countries, so that the North may have no occasion for constitutional protection against "domestic violence," while we shall be compelled to reduce the comfort of our slaves, by reason of the diminished profit of slave labor, to the lowest point of depression, and thus the danger of "domestic violence" increased; and we are to be comforted and pacified with the assurance that protection, thus rendered necessary, is secured to us by the constitution.

Such is the character of the mild and beneficent protection for which we are to be persuaded not to act upon this matter at this time, lest one of the Southern States, which is not sufficiently sensible of its value, and has become refractory, should have a triumph, and this Government should lose so favorable an opportunity of manifesting its energy, by sending the army, the navy, and the militia, "to sweep from the face of the earth the high-minded, gallant, and talented representatives of that State on this floor;" "to make all her rivers run red with blood, and to exterminate one-half her present population;" and this spectacle is thus almost invoked by one gentleman in language which "Danton, Marat, and Robespierre, might blush to own;" and by another, who, in a sneering tone, says he wants to see this peaceable struggle; and, with heartless irony and derision, urges the adoption of his motion, in order that the authorities of South Carolina and of this Government may have an opportunity of showing the peaceful character of their measures.

The third source of protection to the slave interest of the South is furnished by the standing army and navy, on the score of which we ought to acquiesce in the protection of domestic manufactures.

And does the North derive no benefit from the army and navy? Is it for the South to be reproached with the expense of keeping up the army and navy? It has been a standing reproach against us that we were not willing to consent to a sufficiently large force being kept up. The State of Virginia gave very strong evidence of her indisposition to have a standing army, and that she did not want any such protection. One of the amendments proposed by her convention, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, was, "that no standing army or regular troops shall be raised or kept up in time of peace, without the consent of two-thirds of the members present in both Houses." The present army is a mere skeleton, and the navy is inconsiderable in point of strength, though it has attracted universal favor by its valor and achievements. But what are they? Not raised or kept up, certainly, for the purpose of giving protection to the slave interest of the South; they are the fruits of the "second war of independence," as it has been called, and which certainly did much to establish our national character abroad.

This was a Southern war, waged for the protection of Northern interests; for "Free trade and sailors' rights." And what have we got? Restricted trade, and our shipping and commercial interests heavily burdened.

And now the army and navy, which is kept up in case of future national emergencies, and which, in all quarters, has been assented to in consequence of the experience of the want of such establishments at the commencement of the war, is to be charged to the Southern States, and to constitute a reason for subjecting their industry to permanent and unequal taxation. And what is to be done with them now? This army and navy is to be employed to crush one of the Southern States—to make "all her rivers run red with the blood" of her gallant people; and this for the mere purpose of proving the strength of this Government, and illustrating the value of the Union. This is, indeed, protection: "but it is such protection as vultures give to lambs, covering and devouring them."

Let me not be misunderstood. I am not either the advocate or apologist of the proceedings of South Carolina. I do not believe in her doctrine of State interposition. Far from it. I believe it false in theory, and that in practice it must be disastrous; inevitably ending in force or separation, and perhaps both. The measures that have been adopted there, are, in my estimation, rash, precipitate, and unconstitutional. The citizens of these States cannot, I think, be justified in resisting the regular and lawful authority of this Government by any law or ordinance of the State, so long as the State itself remains a member of the Union. And this Government has no discretion but to go on and execute the laws which are sanctioned by all its constituted authorities.

Whenever I am called upon to act on that question, painful as the duty may be, if the attitude now assumed by South Carolina be persevered in, or should be assumed by any other State, as a member of this House, as a representative of the State of Virginia, I shall feel impelled by the duty I owe to the constitution which I have sworn to support, to give my sanction to any safe, prudent, and constitutional measure to enable this Government to execute its laws, taking care to adopt such only as are necessary and best calculated to avoid collision. I have ever, in public and private, cherished a disposition to acquiesce in the constitutionally expressed will of the majority, so long as that acquiescence does not sink into submission, to deliberate, palpable, and dangerous injustice and oppression. In a Government of opinion, such as ours, covering so vast an extent of territory, it is vain to expect that there will not arise great diversity of sentiment, and much collision of hostile and irreconcilable interests. I am too deeply sensible of the infirmity of my own judgment, as well as the intrinsic difficulty and delicacy of many of the questions on which these differences of opinion, and collisions of interests are manifested, to countenance the bigotry which would denounce all who differ with me as seduced by folly or actuated by knavery. I am not, therefore, prepared to buckle on my armor for the purpose of resisting every measure which I deem unauthorized, and which operates injuriously to my interests. But there are limits to the respect which is due to the controlling authority of a majority: "to be rightful, it must be just." It must be exercised in a spirit of moderation and forbearance. Constitutional Governments are intended to restrain majorities from oppressing minorities. When these barriers are broken down, and the will of the majority is displayed in infractions of the charter, and in perverting the powers conferred upon it to the purpose of oppression, it will be time even for temperate men to begin to inquire whether "the mask of freedom," which will then be worn, "is any better than the bold uncovered front of tyranny." I speak in no other tone than that in which Virginia claimed her rights when she adopted the constitution; when she "declared and made known that the powers granted under the constitution, being derived from the people of the United States, may be resumed by them whenever the same shall be perverted to their injury and oppression."

And whenever abuses and usurpations are thus persevered in, and a deaf ear is turned to the voice of supplication for justice and forbearance, secession will become not only a right, but a sacred duty. And, in the language of Mr. Madison, "it cannot be doubted that a single member of the Union, in the extremity supposed, but in that only, would have a right, as an extra and ultra constitutional right," "to appeal from the cancelled obligations of the constitutional compact to the original rights and the law of self-preservation."

When that attitude is to be assumed by any State or number of States, what will be the relations, the rights, powers, and duties of the co-States and of this Government towards the seceding State or States, are queries I will not go into further than to say that there will be presented a question of peace or war between sovereignties, or Governments representing sovereignties; a question to be decided, as all such questions must be, in reference to all the circumstances of the case when presented, and the consequences which must follow the decision; and to be settled only by acquiescence, negotiation, or public war.

It is urged, however, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and probably by other gentlemen, that we ought not to pass any bill, no matter how unobjectionable in itself, because that would be to confirm the South Carolina ordinance; because, as I understood the argument, the operation of the ordinance will be obviated by the passage of any bill whatever. This is a consideration which will recommend to me the passage of almost any bill which does not aggravate the inequality or injustice of the present tariff of 1832, which I think it would not be easy to do. I would rejoice at having an opportunity, by such (if there be no other) peaceable means to postpone a conflict, which I am so solicitous to prevent now. I trust, however, that we shall not be satisfied with this. If we cannot agree to pass the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, let us not give up the effort to do something material towards restoring the tranquility of the country. Let us reason together, one with another, as men, as brethren, as statesmen, and not as mere politicians, or partisans; and we surely can agree on something, in a spirit of brotherly love, and by making mutual sacrifices of opinion and of interests, which will compose this great strife, now and forever.

But the great argument against the passage of this bill is, that South Carolina is in a menacing attitude; that it would be to yield to unmanly fear to accede to her demands; that it would be to give up all she asks; and that it is unbecoming the dignity of the Government for us to comply with demands made by South Carolina with arms in her hands. I do not design to add any thing to what has been already so ably and eloquently said by the gentlemen from New York and Georgia [Messrs. VERPLANCK and WILDS] in answer to this argument.

I think, on examination, it will be found that all the declamation, all the denunciation, all the appeals to passion, to prejudice, and to pride, which have been so freely poured forth from all quarters in support of this argument, have no foundation in fact. And, if it were not impossible to suppose that honorable gentlemen here, at such a time, could be influenced by such motives, it would be difficult to resist the belief that they were used as mere pretexts to inflame and mislead, to deceive ourselves and others.

Does this bill satisfy the demands of South Carolina? Will its passage prostrate the Government at her feet, by yielding to her menaces every thing she asks? What says the address of the convention of South Carolina to the people of the United States? "But we are willing to make a large offering to preserve the Union, and, with a distinct declaration that it is a concession on our part. We will consent that the same rate of duty may be imposed upon the protected articles that shall be imposed upon the unprotected; provided that no more revenue be raised than is necessary to meet the demands of the Government for constitutional purposes; and provided, also, that a duty substantially uniform be imposed on all foreign imports." This is her ultimatum, lofty enough, and somewhat arrogant. Here is what she asks; with which, as a concession, but with which alone, she will be satisfied. Now, does the bill answer and satisfy this demand? Does it meet, or approach even an equalization of duties upon protected and unprotected articles? Or are the rates of duty on all foreign imports substantially uniform? No, nothing like it. This bill has been framed by gentlemen on the Committee of Ways and Means from all parts of the Union, as a compromise of the controversy, in which neither side has demanded, or had a right to demand, every thing to be yielded to it, which it thought strict justice would give. The rates of duty proposed by it vary on the protected and unprotected articles widely, and in favor of the former; and very many, and some considerable subjects of foreign imports, are admitted free of duty. South Carolina, I have no question, if the bill passes in some such form as it was reported, will abandon the position she has taken. The authority of the Government will be sustained, and there will be a triumph over nullification. And those gentlemen who have made it a stalking-horse from which to declaim in favor of the authority of the Government, and to denounce in unmeasured terms the gallant and patriotic people of South Carolina, and her eloquent and high-minded politicians, would then be gratified in having this heresy put down; not, to be sure, by using the hempen cords which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURLESTONE] thinks we ought to be preparing for the convention and people of South Carolina, whom he characterises as "a handful of conspirators;" not by "sweeping from the face of the earth her representatives on this floor," and "making all her rivers run red with the blood" of her people; not by satisfying the philosophical and humane desire of those who wish to witness the experiment of the strength of the Union tried by a conflict between Governments in arms; but put down by the quiet, peaceable, and irresistible power of public sentiment, which is more terrible than "an army with banners."

* The State, of course, must judge for herself of the existence of the extremity; has a right so to judge, and to act upon that judgment, as a sovereign State.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. or R.]

Pass the bill, and you will quell the spirit of disorder and discontent which has already broken out in almost open resistance in one State, and which, stimulated as it has been by the "false doctrine, heresy, and schism" that has mingled in the controversy, there is too much reason to fear is spreading into the neighboring States, and may break forth into a flame, if, instead of passing the bill, and exercising a spirit of forbearance and moderation, the whole military and naval power of the country is employed to punish and subdue a sister State, which, although she "starts madly from her sphere," has been impelled by what she regards an intolerable extremity of oppression.

Remember that those neighboring States, Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina, Virginia, Mississippi, and perhaps Tennessee, concur with her in thinking this oppression exists, and, many of them, that the system of which it is the fruit, is unauthorized by the constitution.

Remember, too, that we have it from the authority of the President, and from the Head of the Treasury, and from the Committee of Ways and Means, that the revenue from the tariff of 1832 will exceed all the legitimate wants of the Government, estimated upon a liberal scale of expenditure, by six millions of dollars. And then let me ask if it is not enough to make the blood of every free-man boil with indignation, that this Government—this Congress—is called upon, in spite of the opinion and the wishes of the Executive Magistrate, and the Head of the Treasury, to persist in exacting millions from the people, and not to abate one jot or tittle, even at the hazard of drenching the fields of South Carolina with the blood of her sons. I beg gentlemen to reflect upon the consequences, and to hesitate before they take upon themselves so fearful a responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, the political student in this country, while investigating the origin and spirit of our institutions, is naturally led to examine those luminous and profound letters under the signature of Publius, written by Messrs. Madison, Hamilton, and Jay, for the purpose of recommending the adoption of the federal constitution. One of the leading sentiments inculcated in that sagacious work is, that the chief danger to confederacies is from anarchy among the members, rather than tyranny in the head. While we may not be prepared to admit this in all its latitude, none who have observed the operations and progress of the Government can fail to acknowledge that the whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania; the opposition and resistance to the embargo law of Mr. Jefferson's administration in the New England States; the Hartford Convention during the war; and the lowering storm that is now brewing in the South; all attest the truth that great danger is to be apprehended to the stability of the Government from the former source. While it is undoubtedly no less true, that the growing corruptions of this Government, the rapid and alarming increase of its patronage, and its continually manifested propensity, in all its departments, to strengthen and amplify its own powers, even to the extent of claiming authority to do every thing which it thinks will promote the common defence and general welfare—thus abrogating, at "one fell swoop," all constitutional restraints—give awful proof that there is at least equal danger to the liberties of the people and the rights of the States, from tyranny in the head. Let us, therefore, ever be mindful, and at this time especially, that there may be an excess both of jealousy and confidence in this Government; that the centripetal as well as centrifugal tendencies of our system are to be vigilantly watched and guarded against; that disunion and consolidation are evils alike to be avoided, and, perhaps, equally to be apprehended. Fully impressed with these sentiments, let us administer the powers confided to us under this constitution, according "to the plain sense and intention of the framers of it," neither enlarging them by constructive expansion, nor restricting them by constructive limitation. Thus administered, I believe that the great American system of free confederated republics here established, will be found sufficient, as it is indispensable, to the perpetuity, peace, and prosperity of this whole Union.

Let us cling to our Union as to the anchor of our political hopes. Let us revere this constitution as the political bark, which is freighted with a rich cargo of every thing most precious to us. Thus far, it has "borne the battle and the breeze," and moved on amidst the war of elements, in the full tide of successful experiment. God grant that it may yet be guided by wisdom, firmness, patriotism, and, above all, by a spirit of mutual forbearance and conciliation; and so continue its march prosperously, gloriously, triumphantly.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to strike out the enacting clause of the bill,

Mr. TAYLOR made a question of order as to the possibility of reporting a bill to the House with amendments, after the enacting clause had been stricken out.

The CHAIR decided the motion of Mr. ADAMS to be in order, and cited instances where bills had been reported in the like circumstances.

The question was accordingly put, and the vote taken by tellers stood as follows: Yeas 68, nays 86.

So the committee refused to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. APPELTON's amendment, proposing a square yard duty on cottons, next came up, and was rejected: Yeas 70, nays 80.

Mr. HOWARD moved another in a different form, leaving the ad valorem duty at 25, and next year at 20 per cent.; and adding a specific duty on plains of 25 cents per square yard, on unbleached thread, &c. 60 cents per lb., and colored yarn 75 cents.

After some discussion this amendment was negatived.

Mr. WICKLIFFE proposed to graduate the reduction on cottons, so as to put the duty at 35 per cent., then at 30, and then at 25 per cent. permanent.

This was negatived: Yeas 38, nays not counted.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to put the duty at 40 per cent., then 35, and leave it permanent at 30.

This also was negatived.

The question was then put on Mr. WHITE, of New York's amendment, which fixes the duty at 30 per cent., then at 35, and leaves it permanent, after 1836, at 20 per cent., and was carried by the casting vote of the chairman: Yeas 69, nays 69.

Mr. JENIFER moved to reduce all the duties on iron one-half. Negatived.

He then moved to strike out all the bill after the enacting clause, and substitute a provision that the existing duty on all articles should remain till March, 1834, after which they should suffer a gradual reduction at the rate of 10 per cent. annually until the revenue should be reduced to fifteen millions of dollars. This was negatived.

Mr. DENNY moved to reinstate the duties on iron in the bill of 1832. Negatived.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill in the section respecting tarred cordage, so as to leave the duty at four cents.

This amendment was agreed to: Yeas 77, nays 48.

He offered another, leaving untarred cordage at five cents, which was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL moved to put hemp at 38 dollars till 1834, and then at 30 dollars. Negatived.

Mr. JEWETT moved to strike out the section in relation to salt. Negatived.

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

[Feb. 6, 1833.]

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, moved to strike out the section in relation to olive oil. Agreed to: Yeas 86.

Mr. IHRIE moved to raise the duty on linseed, hempseed, and rapeseed, as by the act of 1832. Agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE moved to reduce the duty on molasses from four cents to one cent. Negatived.

Mr. ROOT moved to amend the duty on silks, by abolishing the discrimination between silks from India and those from the Mediterranean and France.

This motion gave rise to a considerable debate, in which Messrs. ROOT, INGERSOLL, WICKLIFFE, WILDE, ELLSWORTH, E. EVERETT, JARVIS, and CLAY, took part. The result was, that the duty in the bill was postponed until March, 1834.

Mr. JARVIS wished to put the duty on all silks at ten per cent. Negatived.

Mr. E. EVERETT moved to put India silks at ten per cent. and admit all others free. Negatived.

The motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, to strike out the whole section in relation to silks, finally prevailed: Yeas 75, nays 69.

The committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. IHRIE moved to lay a protecting duty upon slates. Negatived.

Mr. EVERETT moved a duty of two cents per pound on copperas; which was agreed to: Yeas 58, nays 55.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, offered an amendment restoring to paper of all kinds the same rate of duty as was imposed by the tariff of 1824.

After some remarks from Mr. VERPLANCK, in which he stated that it was his purpose to move a general provision covering the stocks now on hand, in this and other branches of manufacture,

The amendment was agreed to: Yeas 72, nays 66.

Mr. DENNY moved an amendment which went to restore to cut glass the duties of the tariff of 1824, viz. three cents a pound specific, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.

This motion was sustained a good deal at length by Mr. DENNY, Mr. E. EVERETT, and Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, who stated the rapid increase and prosperous state of the manufacture, and its need of protection against a British bounty.

Mr. CAMBRELENG denied that any such bounty existed. There was an allowance under that denomination, but the bounties granted in Great Britain were mere drawbacks of the imposed duties on raw materials, or of internal excise, direct and indirect, upon the manufacture. If there was any bounty beyond these imposts and excises, it had escaped the observation of those who had revised these laws in Parliament a few years since.

Mr. E. EVERETT insisted that the British statutes, as now existing, proved that the allowance (whether called bounty or drawback, or by whatever other name the gentleman preferred) did exceed the imposts and excise, and did in fact operate as a bounty on all glass exported.

The amendment was carried: Yeas 72, nays 60.

Mr. ASHLEY moved an amendment giving to lead the same protection it had received under the act of 1828.

He went into a history of the rise of this branch of business, and the decrease of price produced by the protecting duty.

The amendment was supported by Messrs. WATMOUGH, HORN, and WING; and opposed by Messrs. VERPLANCK and WILDE. It was then carried: Yeas 67, nays 49.

Mr. DENNY proposed a duty of five cents a pound on white lead; which was agreed to.

Mr. DENNY moved to restore to window glass the protection of the law of 1824; which was agreed to.

Mr. DENNY moved the same thing in respect to bottles, vials, and demijohns; which was agreed to.

Mr. VERPLANCK moved to amend the miscellaneous section of the bill, which provides that on articles not enumerated there shall be a specific or ad valorem duty, as at present, according as one or the other should be lowest, by deferring its operation until March, 1834; agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON moved to strike out the whole of this section, as embracing a multitude of branches of manufactures which would be injured by it.

Mr. E. EVERETT supported the motion with earnestness, as covering unknown ground, and certain of giving rise to endless litigation.

Mr. POLK replied, and defended the clause as being much like one in the act of last year: the committee had been told at the treasury that it would be attended with little or no difficulty.

Mr. H. EVERETT objected to voting in the dark: it had been to obviate the necessity of doing so that he had wished to get the information sought in his call upon the treasury, which had not been answered.

Mr. VINTON thought this provision of the bill unconstitutional, because it would occasion different duties in different parts of the Union on the same article.

The question being put, the yeas were 74, the nays 74.

The CHAIR voting in the negative, the section was not stricken out.

Mr. E. EVERETT introduced a proviso excepting from the operation of the bill a list of chemicals; which was carried: Yeas 75, nays 67.

Mr. HORN moved an amendment which went to repeal the duties laid by the act of 1832 on articles of hardware.

This motion gave rise to a debate, in which the amendment was advocated by Messrs. HORN, POLK, and DRAYTON; and opposed by Messrs. HUNTINGTON, DENNY, INGERSOLL, E. EVERETT, H. EVERETT, and WATMOUGH.

The amendment was finally negatived: Yeas 48, nays 59.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to protect the article of ready made clothing as by the act of 1828; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEMMES moved to exempt certain paints, manufactured extensively at Baltimore and elsewhere, from the effect of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. ROOT now moved to amend the duties on wool, so as to fix them at 50 per cent. till 1834; 40 per cent. till 1835; and then at 30 per cent. permanent duty.

This amendment was rejected: Yeas 47, nays 54. (No quorum having voted, the question was again put, and the vote stood: Yeas 58, nays 64.)

Mr. BEARDSLEY tried a different amendment on the same clause, putting the duty on wool at

40 per cent. till	-	-	1834
35 do	-	-	1835
30 do	-	-	1836
25 permanent.

This amendment was adopted: Yeas 74.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to strike out the clause which reduced the duty on cottons to 20 per cent. after 1824.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to amend the duties on woolens, so as to put them at

50 per cent. till	-	-	1834
45 do	-	-	1835
40 do	-	-	1836
35 permanent.

This was rejected.

FEB. 7, 1833.]

Explanatory Tariff Act.—The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HOWARD moved to put the duty on fossil salt at 5 cents till March, 1834, and then at 2 cents.

This gave rise to an animated debate, in which the quality of the salt made in Eastport, in Maine, (the only manufactory of the article,) was discussed, as also the extent of capital employed, and whether owned by British or American citizens: documents were quoted on both sides, and the policy of encouraging an article which competed with the salt made from water in various parts of the Union, was warmly argued.

The amendment was warmly resisted by Messrs. JARVIS, BATES, and ANDERSON, of Maine, and by Mr. McKENNAN, of Pennsylvania; and advocated by Messrs. HOWARD, ELLSWORTH, SUTHERLAND, and REED, of Massachusetts.

It was finally amended by Mr. REED so as to fix the duty on fossil salt at one-third that on other salt; and in this form it was agreed to: Yeas 66, nays 63.

Mr. WATMOUGH moved to restore the duty fixed by the act of 1832, on carpets, carpeting, flannels, bookings, and baizes; he briefly sustained the motion, which was further supported by Mr. ELLSWORTH, of Connecticut, and Mr. E. EVERETT. It was then carried: Yeas 64, nays 58.

Mr. WATMOUGH moved a further amendment, including in the bill "patent floor cloths, and oil cloths of every description" (under the duty of 40 per cent.)

This was also carried: Yeas 93, nays 63.

Mr. H. EVERETT now moved to strike from the bill the whole of the sections containing the duties on wool and woollens, and restoring the protection of 1832.

Mr. WILDE moved that the committee rise; but the motion failed: Yeas 55, nays 56.

The question was then taken on Mr. EVERETT's motion, and negatived: Yeas 66, nays 69.

Mr. WARDWELL, of New York, moved to raise the duties on spirits, as follows:

1st and 2d proof, from 18 cents, as in the bill, to 35 cents.

3d proof 21 to 40 cents.

5th 30 50

Over 5th proof 36 to 55 cents.

The amendment was negatived: Yeas 59, nays 62.

Mr. PENDLETON, of New York, moved to strike out "and worsted" from the 35 per cent. duty, and put on worsted yarn costing 40 cents a pound a duty of 10 per cent.

This was carried: Yeas 68, nays 52.

Mr. BARRINGER moved to put upon this article a duty of two cents a pound; which was agreed to.

Mr. WATMOUGH moved a duty of 25 per cent. on manufactures of marble.

Mr. H. EVERETT added "and marble."

Thus amended, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE now moved that the committee rise and report the bill, but the motion was pronounced out of order at present.

Mr. RUSSEL, of Ohio, moved to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert as a substitute, that the law of July, 1832, should be and continue in full force and virtue until the 3d of March, 1841.

Mr. INGERSOLL said this question was new and important; and, to allow time for its consideration, he moved that the committee rise. He withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. POLK, who urged the committee to bring the debate to a close, and report the bill.

The motion to rise was now renewed, and prevailed. And the House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

The bill to incorporate the Methodist Church of Georgetown, coming up,

Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, moved to strike out the first section of the bill, as he entertained constitutional objections to it.

After some conversation, in which Messrs. ELLSWORTH, WASHINGTON, SEMMES, ARNOLD, and VANCE took part, and an ineffectual motion to lay the bill upon the table, its consideration was postponed for one week.

EXPLANATORY TARIFF ACT.

The House now went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CRAWFORD in the chair, on the bill to explain the 8th section of the tariff law of 1832.

Mr. HOFFMAN put several queries to Mr. CAMBRELENG on the provision of the bill. In reply to which,

Mr. CAMBRELENG went into a history of the bill, and the circumstances in which it had its origin: he stated the different constructions of the bill it went to explain, and stated in substance that the object of the bill was to enable the holders of goods entitled to drawback under the law of 1828, to receive the difference of duty between the law of 1828, which they had paid, and 1832, which alone they would be now bound to pay, without laying them under the necessity of reshipping their goods. It extended this privilege beyond the original importer, to all who held the goods in the original packages.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought that the bill went further than this, or it need not be so long.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, and explained that the length of the bill had been occasioned by a desire to accommodate the officers of the customs. It granted no new privilege, but merely gave a facility in the exercise of the privilege already conferred by law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, further explained the nature of the bill, and argued to show that the treasury, instead of losing, would in reality gain by its passage: inasmuch as if the goods were allowed to be taken to the custom-house now, all the holder would get would be the difference of duty; whereas, if they should be reshipped, and returned to this country, he could claim a drawback of the whole duty paid.

The discussion of the bill was cut short by the expiration of the hour.

The House then went again into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

The question coming up on the amendment offered by Mr. RUSSEL, of Ohio, to reinstate the tariff law of 1832, and to continue it in force until 1841,

Mr. ELLSWORTH opposed the motion. He said that while it carried the appearance of settling the question of the tariff, it would not really settle it at all; and it seemed to imply that at the end of eight years the policy of the country should be abandoned. Sir, said Mr. E., the bill is now so altered and patched, that it cannot receive the support of any party in this House, nor will it be satisfactory to any portion of the country. It is the most incongruous thing that ever man beheld. It is made up of the tariffs of 1816, '18, '28, and '32, without the least regard to proportions or state of facts. Mr. E. said it was lost time to work upon this bill any longer; it cannot pass. If any thing could be done, we must start anew, and whatever is done must be permanent. This perpetual agitation of the question, and this annually making a new tariff, is what cannot be borne. He said he spoke only for himself; he knew not that any gentleman would agree with him, but he felt satisfied that if any thing could be done, to put this matter at rest, it must be a bill very gradually reducing duties down to a proper standard, through the course of many years, taking the bill of last July as the beginning. He believed that a bill might be brought into the House which would satisfy the North, and in some measure meet the demands of the most reasonable part of the South. If the present policy of the country could be settled and secured, and the duties gradually reduced so as to save the manufacturers, he was not ready to say he would not support such a bill; but then it would be a sine qua non with him, that such a bill should come into the House, and so be sustained here as to afford the fullest assurance that the tariff should not be again agitated. It must come from the South, and be sustained by Southern votes; and without this assurance, he would not take such a bill, come from where it might. He would not wish to see such a bill from Northern gentlemen, and forced upon the South; for then we should see next session just what we see now—a renewed and more determined attack on the tariff. The compulsory and silent compromise of last session had taught him to beware of such attempts. Let the South, oppressed as she says she is, (though he did not believe it,) come forward with a bill of very gradual reduction, of some ten years or more, and leaving at that time a clear protection in cash duties of twenty-five per cent., and he would very seriously think of such a scheme. But while the South hold to their present determination, to put down all protection, he would not attempt to meet them at all. His constituents would not yield a hair's breadth. If we must have war or a total abandonment of our present policy, let war come. Mr. E. said, here he would take his stand, and see how the people would bear him out. It is in vain, said Mr. E., to go on with this disjointed bill. He appealed to the South, if they supposed the representatives of the North could thus, session after session, suffer a policy to be insidiously attacked without any hope or even promise of a compromise. South Carolina has sworn we shall have no peace while we have a tariff of even incidental protection. Mr. E. said he was ready to swear, for one, that the present policy should never be abandoned, peace or war; and he would do nothing until he saw a returning sense of justice in the South, and a pledge that they would arrange a tariff that should protect the industry of the country, and leave the matter finally and fully settled.

Mr. RUSSEL, after some remarks, which were inaudible, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SPEIGHT moved that the committee rise and report; and, in supporting this motion, made a reply to the remarks of Mr. ELLSWORTH, professing himself and the South ready to accede to any reasonable arrangement which would quiet the public mind. He would consent to the law of 1832, if it was to be gradually reduced within any reasonable space of time, until the revenue should come down to the wants of the Government.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, moved to amend the bill by reinstating the law of 1832, and reducing it at the rate of twenty per cent. annually, until the revenue should amount to $15,000,000. Negated.

Mr. SEMMES, of Maryland, moved an amendment imposing a protecting duty of two cents a pound on alum; carried.

Mr. WARDWELL moved to amend the duty on spirits, so as to make it range, upon the several proofs, from thirty-five gradually to fifty-five cents. This was negated: Yeas 51, nays 59.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, moved to amend the duty on sugar, so as to extend the reduction below two cents, the first year to one and a half cents, and then at one cent. permanent.

Mr. THOMAS, of Louisiana, made a warm remonstrance against such a reduction, which must prove the ruin of all the sugar planters. He adverted to the great reduction in the price of sugar, which, when he first settled in Louisiana, was at twenty-five cents the pound, and now ranged from six down to two cents. The reduction of duty would have no effect on the market price, but a most destructive one on the growers.

The motion was negated without a count.

Mr. MARSHALL moved to restore the duties of 1828 to the spirits made from grain; negated.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, moved to add the articles of potatoes, beef, pork, and butter, on each of which he wished to fix a protecting duty; negated.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill on that part relating to hosiery, by inserting the word "cotton," and placing the duty thirty instead of twenty per cent., and striking out that section of the bill which places cotton hosiery, mits, &c., at twenty per cent.; negated.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to strike out the whole section in relation to coarse cloths, plains, kerseys, &c., costing thirty-five cents a yard, and blankets costing seventy-five cents; so as to leave those articles subject to a duty of forty per cent., gradually reduced to twenty, as on carpets, &c.; negated: Yeas 48, nays 56.

Mr. THOMAS, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by striking raw cotton from the list of free articles; and supported the motion by a short speech, in which he depicted the evils which must follow the inundation of cotton from Texas. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JARVIS, of Maine, moved to add a section providing generally for the allowance of drawback; agreed to.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, moved an additional section, allowing a drawback of one and one-third cents a pound on nails; the section is very fully guarded against frauds.

Mr. R. went into a number of statistical details in reference to this manufacture, its extent, its consumption of the coal of the South, and the peculiar kind of iron required for carrying it on.

The section was carried: Yeas 67, nays 52.

The bill having been gone through with,

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, moved that the committee rise and report it to the House as amended.

Before the question was taken,

Mr. ADAMS said that before the committee rose he would avail himself of the opportunity of making some reply to the misrepresentations (he presumed not intentional) of two gentlemen who had misapprehended his meaning, and then commented with some severity, not so much upon the opinions which he had expressed, as upon those which they had erroneously imputed to him.

The first was the gentleman from South Carolina over the way, who had totally mistaken, not only the purport of his [Mr. A.'s] observations, but also that of the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, which he had recently submitted to the House. The gentleman from South Carolina had read to the committee, not the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts themselves, but a sentence from a manuscript slip of paper furnished to the gentleman, Mr. A. knew not by whom; but the gentleman had alleged that it formed a part of the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, and charged it upon them as exhibiting a temporary violence quite equal to that of the ordinance of nullification; when, in fact, there was not one word of the sentence which he had read from the slip of paper, contained in the resolutions from Massachusetts. The gentleman from South Carolina had treated him much as he had treated the Legislature of the State, one of whose representatives he had the honor of being on this floor.

As to the language, however, contained in the report of the committee, and in the resolutions of the Massachusetts Legislature, the gentleman had made an explanation, and had acknowledged he had been in error. But the gentleman had not done the same justice to Mr. A.: on the contrary, after he had formally disclaimed the meaning given to his words, and the words themselves, the gentleman still persisted in imputing them to him.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

As to the courtesy of such a procedure, he should make no remark; courtesy depended very much on every gentleman's own view of what was due from gentlemen to each other. But the gentleman from South Carolina had charged Mr. A. with bringing a firebrand into the committee, and giving an entirely new turn to the debate. And what was the firebrand he had introduced? He had taken up what appeared to him to be the essence of the bill, and had spoken of it as being the commencement of a system of withdrawal of protection from some of the great interests of the country; interests secured to those concerned in them by the constitution and existing laws of the United States; interests in which his own constituents had a deep stake, and in which a large portion of this Union had a stake of still more portentous magnitude; he had stated the ground on which he should vote against this bill, or any other proceeding upon the same principles, at the present session. He had considered the bill as not adapted to effect its professed object, the reduction of the revenue, but as calculated to confirm the act of a convention held in South Carolina, declaring all the revenue laws of the United States, to be null and void within that State; and, in support of this view, he had referred to a declaration made by the same convention to the people of the other twenty-three States, in the most positive and solemn terms, that a protecting tariff should never more be executed in South Carolina. Now, was it he that had thrown this firebrand? The firebrand was to be found in this declaration of the convention of a part of the people of South Carolina; and that paper had been officially commended to the notice of Congress by the President of the United States. Were Mr. A.'s lips to be sealed by this act of a part of the citizens of South Carolina? and that when he considered the bill on which he was called to vote as having no other tendency than to increase the revenue of the United States; to take away the right of protection due to a large portion of the people of the Union; to ruin all the manufactures of the land; to ruin, yes, to ruin the free manufacturing and agricultural labor in his portion of this country, and to confirm the nullifying ordinance of South Carolina? These were the purposes of the bill. If a firebrand had been thrown into the House, it had not been by his hands. He had made no charge against South Carolina. He had read passages from the address of a convention, speaking in the name of the people of that State, to the people of all the other States in the Union, declaring that they had nullified within the limits of the State the existing laws of the United States, which protect the rights, and interests, and property of great multitudes of his [Mr. A.'s] constituents, and of a very large portion of the people of the Union. The South Carolina convention had passed a sentence of outlawry upon at least one-third part of the free population of the country; had declared them out of the protection of the existing laws of the land; and, with the most positive asseverations, had affirmed that the people of South Carolina never would submit to see that protection restored; that their determination to this effect was unalterable; that their purpose was to carry it into effect peaceably if they could, but that carry it into effect they would at all hazards; and that a protective tariff should never more be executed in South Carolina.

Mr. A. had declared his belief that this assurance of the South Carolina ordinance was sincere. That it was an issue tendered to the Government of the United States which it was the duty of that Government to meet, and not, by a bill like that before the committee, to blink or to evade; that it was an issue which must be met; that the protection to which the South Carolina convention declared that State would never more submit, was a right of the citizen which the Government of the Union had no right to withhold or to deny; that upon this issue one or the other of the parties must ultimately give way, and that there could never be a more favorable time for settling the question than now; that if the nullifiers should use, as they professed to intend, no other than peaceable means, no others would be needed, nor, as he believed, applied, to execute the laws: but that the laws must be executed, and that he was assured no superfluous force would, on the part of the Government of the United States, be applied; none beyond that indispensable for the execution of the laws. Was this bringing a firebrand into the House?

Mr. A. would now add that the gentleman from South Carolina was the last, the very last man in that House, from whom he should have expected an accusation of this character. If it had come from one of the gentleman's colleagues, from the commanders and abettors of the nullification ordinance, it would have been no more than he might have expected; but he had before said, and he now repeated the remark, that from what he had heard lately from Carolina, it was doubtful to him whether that gentleman, and those who thought and acted with him, would not, ere long, be compelled to call upon this Government to carry into effect that protection which the constitution of the United States secured to them. And if the gentleman and his friends should ever be placed in that situation, he pledged himself, so far as his vote would go, to give it to them. He believed they were entitled to it under the constitution. But, as respected the gentleman from South Carolina, (for whom Mr. A. entertained the highest respect, notwithstanding he did not think the gentleman had returned the courtesy to him,) he must say, if that was the friendship they were to receive in return for protection, he should, for one, prefer meeting one of the gentleman's nullifying colleagues; better an open and a candid foe, than a flinching or a treacherous friend.

Another gentleman, from another State, [Mr. FARROW, of Virginia,] had misunderstood and misrepresented his meaning, as much as the gentleman from South Carolina had done. That gentleman, in an elaborate answer of his, to the few observations Mr. A. had addressed to the committee on that occasion, had thought proper to indulge himself in many observations on the remarks he had made, and sometimes in personal allusions, of a very pointed nature, to himself. With respect to the latter, whether coming from that gentleman, or from any other member of the House, Mr. A. must ask permission to make no reply whatever. He should do, with regard to the gentleman, as was once done by a very distinguished officer in our army; a man of high military sensibility, of strong feeling, as to what was due to his own honor, and of great personal courtesy towards others. It happened that this gentleman had had a misunderstanding with one of his brother officers, which had proceeded to such lengths, that they were not upon speaking terms. As they were both walking, one day, in one of the avenues of this city, they chanced to pass each other so very closely, that it was scarcely possible they should not see each other. Seeing his enemy come so very near to him, he turned round, and taking off his hat, said, "sir, please to excuse my salute." Mr. A. would say the same to the gentleman from Virginia, and to all others who might be disposed to amuse themselves, or entertain the House with allusions to any thing that he was, had been, or ever might be; he must say to them, please to excuse my salute, or reply.

As to the gentleman's observations in reference to the bill, the gentleman had contested some of the positions Mr. A. had taken, and especially one which lay at the foundation, and formed a very important part of the controversy with South Carolina, having respect to the character of the nation itself. In the observations Mr. A. had made, he had said that the first words of the preamble to the constitution had settled the character of our Union, and had constituted the nation one people.

The Tariff Bill.

[FEB. 7, 1833.]

"The position assumed by Mr. A. had been, that the whole people of the Union were the authors of and parties to the constitution of the United States, as was explicitly declared by themselves in the very first words of its preamble; and as no compact can be dissolved but by the same power which created it, the people of no one State in the Union could either dissolve the compact by which they had bound themselves to the Union, or withdraw from it, or by counter-legislation annul its laws."

The gentleman from Virginia had disputed this position; and had quoted a number of authorities to maintain that this Union was nothing more than a confederation of sovereign States. The gentleman had said, that Mr. A. had adduced no authority in support of his doctrines, but merely those words, "we the people." It was very true that he had quoted no additional authority, because the words themselves were an authority which admitted of no answer. Mr. A. had thought so when he referred to them; nor did he think otherwise after he had heard all the observations of the gentleman, and all the authorities he had quoted.

But, if the gentleman must have authorities, he would refer him to some; they were not wanting.

The first he should mention, was George Washington, the President of the convention which issued the constitution to the people of the United States. In the Farewell Address of that Father of his country, were a multitude of passages which, in Mr. A.'s estimation, were authorities in support of the same position: and, indeed, that whole paper might be said to be in itself one entire, compact, sound, and unanswerable argument in favor of the principle. The address in which he declines a second re-election to that office, which he held so much to his own honor and to the glory and welfare of his country, was not directed, like that of the convention of South Carolina, to the people of the 17 or 18 States then in the Union; it was directed to "the people of the United States."

One paragraph in that address was in these words: "profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you—"to you"—to whom? to the people of the United States, "the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your Union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete," &c. Observe especially those words: "the free constitution which is the work of your hands." Shortly after, we find: "the unity of Government, which constitutes you one people, is also, now dear to you. It is justly so."

Yes, sir, said Mr. A. "the unity of Government which constitutes you one people," is justly dear to you.

Again: "citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of an American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations."

Further on we have the following paragraphs:

"In this sense it is, that your Union ought to be considered as the main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other." "Is there a doubt whether a common Government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorised to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of Governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment."

"Your Union"—the gentleman from Virginia said, the union of a people was an absurdity, but the union of States was a common and intelligible idea. If the gentleman would take the trouble of reading this address, he would find that the union of the people of the United States was no new or strange idea to President Washington.

The gentleman had said, (after the nullifiers of South Carolina,) that there was no such thing as a Government of the whole; that there was no American people. But what said this document?

"To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a Government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced."

Again: "The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of Government. But the constitution, which at any time exists until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish Government, presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established Government."

Observe the force of this last paragraph. It is the conclusion of an unanswerable argument to prove the sacred obligation incumbent upon every individual citizen to yield obedience to the constitution of the United States; and, having in express terms declared that constitution to have been the work of the hands of the whole people, he draws here the inference, explicit, logical, irresistible, that by the whole people can it alone be abrogated; that, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, it is sacredly obligatory upon all.

Mr. A. said he should read no further from that paper. He hoped the gentleman was now convinced, that if he had not read any authorities to the committee, it had not been because he had no authorities to read.

The gentleman had referred to the debates of the Virginia convention, upon the adoption of this constitution, and had read one or two paragraphs which seemed to countenance the doctrine he professed. There were more than twenty gentlemen in the Virginia convention who had made observations on those words in the preamble of the constitution, "We the people;" and there had not been one of them who did not admit that those words did explicitly and unequivocally declare that it was the people of the United States who made the constitution. Mr. Henry, that great and illustrious man, illustrious not only in Virginia, but throughout this whole country, whom Mr. A. felt as much pride in recognizing as a countryman as if he had been born in the next house to himself in Massachusetts, had been opposed to the adoption of the constitution, and had in fact proved himself the most strenuous and able opponent of that instrument in the Virginia convention. One ground of exception taken by him had been, that this phrase changed the nature of the Government. Mr. Henry had insisted that the General Convention which drew up the constitution had no right to speak thus, in the name of the people of the United States. And, had the constitution prepared by the convention been intended by them to become binding without being referred to the people themselves, the argument would have been unanswerable. It had only been the fact that the instrument would be of no effect until the people should have made the act their own, which justified the convention in employing such language.

What said Mr. Henry?

"And here I would make this inquiry of those worthy characters who composed a part of the late federal convention. I am sure they were fully impressed with the necessity of forming a great consolidated Government instead of a confederation. That this is a consolidated Government is demonstrably clear; and the danger of such a Government is, to my mind, very striking. I have the highest veneration for those gentlemen; but, sir, give me leave to demand what right had they to say we the people? My political curiosity, exclusive of my anxious solicitude for the public welfare, leads me to ask, who authorized them to speak the language of we the people, instead of we the States? States are the characteristics, and the soul of a confederation. If the States be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great consolidated national Government of the people of all the States."

I consider this as one of those authorities which the gentleman from Virginia demanded. The conclusions of Mr. Henry were, in this instance so far correct, that the words "we, the people" did entirely change the nature of the Government. This was not contested by any one member of the same convention.

The first answer given to this question of Mr. Henry, was by Governor Randolph, then the Governor of the commonwealth, and a member of the convention at Philadelphia. As a member of that convention, though he had taken a very active and leading part in drawing up the constitution, he had declined signing it; but now, as a member of the Virginia convention, was in favor of its adoption.

In answer to the inquiries of Mr. Henry, Governor Randolph said:

"The gentleman then proceeds and inquires why we assumed the language of 'we, the people?' I ask why not? The Government is for the people; and the misfortune was, that the people had no agency in the Government before. What harm is there in consulting the people on the construction of a Government by which they are to be bound? Is it unfair? Is it unjust? If the Government is to be binding on the people, are not the people the proper persons to examine its merits or defects?"

The Governor afterwards proceeded and enlarged on the imbecility of the old confederation.

Then came another great and illustrious man, as well in the Union as in his own State, Mr. Pendleton.

His reply to this objection of Mr. Henry was:

"But an objection is made to the form; the expression, we the people, is thought improper. Permit me to ask the gentleman who made this objection, who but the people can delegate powers? who but the people have a right to form Government? The expression is a common one, and a favorite one with me; the representatives of the people, by their authority, is a mode wholly inessential. If the objection be that the Union ought to be not of the people, but of the State Governments, then I think the choice of the former very happy and proper. What have the State Governments to do with it? Were they to determine, the people would not, in that case, be the judges upon what terms it was adopted."

Mr. Pendleton then went on to show that the convention had full power to propose whatsoever they might judge most for the general good, and that the voice of the people alone could give efficacy to their acts.

The next authority Mr. A. should quote, was Mr. Lee, of Westmoreland, a name well known, and advantageously known, in this community.

Replying to Mr. Henry's argument, he said:

"He, Mr. Henry, then adverted to the style of Government, and asked what authority they had to use the expression we the people, and not we the States? This expression was introduced into that paper with great propriety. This system is submitted to the people for their consideration, because on them it is to operate if adopted. It is not binding on the people until it becomes their act."

Mr. Madison had said, indeed, what the gentleman had referred to, but he had said a little more. Mr. A. would read to the House the conclusion to which Mr. Madison brought his argument;

"Give me leave," said Mr. Madison, "to say something of the nature of the Government, and to show that it is safe and just to vest it with the power of taxation. There are a number of opinions; but the principal question is, whether it be a federal or consolidated Government? In order to judge properly of the question before us, we must consider it minutely in its principal parts. I conceive myself that it is of a mixed nature: it is in a manner unprecedented; we cannot find one express example in the experience of the world. It stands by itself. In some respects it is a Government of a federal nature; in others it is of a consolidated nature. Even if we attend to the manner in which the constitution is investigated, ratified, and made the act of the people of America, I can say, notwithstanding what the honorable gentleman has alleged, that this Government is not completely consolidated, nor is it entirely federal. Who are parties to it? The people; not the people as composing one great body, but the people as composing thirteen sovereignties. Were it, as the gentleman asserts, a consolidated Government, the assent of a majority of the people would be sufficient for its establishment; and, as a majority have adopted it already, the remaining States would be bound by the act of the majority, even if they unanimously reprobated it. Were it such a Government as it is suggested, it would be now binding on the people of this State, without having had the privilege of deliberating upon it; but, sir, no State is bound by it, as it is, without its own consent. Should all the States adopt it, it will be then a Government established by the thirteen States of America—not through the intervention of the Legislatures, but by the people at large. In this particular respect the distinction between the existing and proposed Governments is very material. The existing system has been derived from the dependent derivative authority of the Legislatures of the States; whereas this is derived from the superior power of the people."

Mr. Madison says the Government is neither wholly federal, nor wholly a consolidated Government, but "of a mixed nature." So Mr. A. had always held it to be, and so he had said: To all these observations of Mr. Madison he could cheerfully subscribe. The suffrages of the people upon the constitution were collected in the several distinct communities which they had formed, and retained; and in that respect the constitution partook of the federative character. But it was only a mode of collecting the votes of the whole people, necessarily adopted from their existing condition, and because they could not be collected otherwise, without merging in the General Government the separate auxiliary subdivisions of which it was composed. It was not, as the nullifying doctrine alleges, the people of each State aggregated to the Union, through the medium of the State. It was, as Mr. Madison explicitly affirms—the States were aggregated to the Union, by the will and action of their people. Thus, Mr. Madison speaks, not of the States, but of the people, as composing thirteen sovereignties. Thus, Mr. Pendleton justly remarks, the people only can delegate powers. Hence the State, itself the creature of the people, and possessing itself only but delegated powers, was incompetent to confer the powers granted by the constitution to the Government of the United States. The people alone were competent to grant them; and the people of each State, in adopting the constitution, by one and the same act, made themselves and the State which they composed, parties to the General Government of the Union. And thus Mr. Madison came to the same conclusion with all the others, his colleagues, that this constitution was the act "of the people at large."

Mr. A. said he would add no more authorities. He hoped and trusted that if authorities were necessary, he had adduced sufficient to satisfy the committee. He had said that the words "We, the People of the United States," introducing the preamble to the constitution, conveyed to his mind an idea of the highest moral sublimity. This the gentleman from Virginia had considered as the fanciful imagination of a rhetorician or poet. Mr. A. had said at the time, and now repeated, that he was speaking to men of intelligence and to men of feeling. To their sympathies he appealed, and, in illustration of the idea that he had expressed, he would now take the liberty of reading a passage from the writings of an ancient Roman, not in their original language, but in words which he trusted would find their way to every bosom: "For there is nothing done upon earth more acceptable to that God who rules the universe, than in those assemblages and deliberations of men, rightfully associating together, and constituting governments for nations."

H. or R.]

The Thrift Bill.

This was the sentiment of the greatest orator, statesman, and moralist, that ever lived in the tide of times; and with this sentiment in his heart, Mr. A. now repeated that, short of divine inspiration, there was nothing in human language that ever conveyed to his mind an idea of loftier moral sublimity than this preamble to the constitution of the United States; than this one corporate body, this one people of thirteen distinct communities, this innumerable multitude in one, speaking in the first person, to the race of civilized man, and declaring the purpose of their speech, to constitute themselves as one people, and to establish that Government for a nation which is the most acceptable of all human action upon earth to the God who governs the Universe.

Mr. A. said that he had been charged, in substance, both by the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Virginia, with countenancing, himself, the idea of nullification, and resistance by force and violence. The gentleman from Virginia had said something about "heroes of the last disclosure," who could "look on blood and slaughter with composure;" and had said this in reference to expressions used by him. He disclaimed the use of any such expressions; he denied having uttered any thing like a reflection upon the State of South Carolina. When he spoke of the acts of a convention of a part of the people of that State, he hoped that he should always speak of them freely, as they were, or as they appeared to his own mind. He meant no disrespect to South Carolina, or to any part of the Union, in what he had addressed to the committee.

He had said that he could not vote for any bill that was considered as a confirmation of the nullifying ordinance of South Carolina, or as giving a pledge to the nation, that the great system of protection to the interests of agriculture and manufactures should be abandoned: to the abandonment of that system he had declared that he would never give his consent, because he considered it as a right belonging to his constituents: a right which pertained to them as being parties to the constitution: a right resulting from the allegiance due by them to the country: and by way of illustrating this sentiment, and to show that other portions of the Union, and other great interests of an exclusive nature, were protected by the constitution and the laws of the Union. He had adduced those provisions of the constitution which went directly to protect the great interests peculiar to the South. He had referred to the large sums expended for the support of our standing army. He had not said, as he had been represented to say, that this army was kept up exclusively for the benefit of the Southern States. He had, on the contrary, declared that there was another portion of the Union which had as great, if not a greater, interest in it, and had referred to the settlements on our Western frontier. To those who considered their own exclusive interests as the only interests to be provided for, he had said that the army was not of a cent's value either to the manufacturing or the agricultural interests. Had the gentleman refuted this statement? Had he shown that it was of one dollar's consideration to either of these interests? Not at all. Had Mr. A. objected to the maintenance of the army? Had he asked for a repeal of the law? No: nor should he ever do so. There were great interests at the South to which the constitution and the laws extended protection, and Mr. A. would never give his voice to have the appropriation for their protection reduced one cent, although to his own constituents the army which protected them was perfectly useless. They wanted no army. The manufacturers and agriculturists at the North were all submissive to the laws: they had neither domestic nor foreign enemies whom they feared. Mr. A. had further said that there were other great interests in the country, the interests of commerce and navigation: and he had been represented as saying, that these interests, too, were protected for the benefit of the South. He had said no such thing. He knew perfectly well, that the interests of commerce and navigation were not, as such, the interests of the South. They were interests to which many of his own constituents were no strangers, for the people of the district which he represented were commercial and navigating, as well as manufacturing and agricultural, the interests of which were immediately struck at by the bill before the committee. But he was sorry to see the countenance given by the representation of the commercial interest on this floor to this bill. It was supported by most of the representatives from the large commercial cities.

There was another interest which he was sorry to see. No doubt they acted on grounds satisfactory to themselves. It was indeed apparent that the immediate operations of the bill would be highly advantageous to the commercial interest, at the expense of those of agriculture and manufactures; and to that circumstance, doubtless, their support of it was to be attributed. This interest was to be protected by the navy. Happy had Mr. A. been to see in the Executive message a recommendation to persevere in the maintenance and increase of this arm of the national defence; although it was kept up at a great public expense their full portion of which was paid by the manufacturers and farmers, who derived, as such, no benefit from it whatever.

The gentleman had said that Virginia could not be charged with any great partiality for a standing army. He had not said that she could; and he was still further from charging her with any partiality for the navy. He was aware that the navy had, now, a friend in Virginia; and Mr. A. heartily rejoiced at it; but the time had been, when Virginia manifested the same objection to the protection of the navigating and commercial interests as she now did with regard to the manufactures. But when he spoke of Virginia, he wished to speak with great qualification, because he did not hold the opinions which the gentleman had given out to be the genuine doctrines of Virginia. He knew, indeed, that there was a school of politicians in that State who held these opinions; but he likewise remembered that George Washington and John Marshall were citizens and natives of Virginia, as well as those who held these notions. He took Virginia's opinion from those men, and could hardly say that he considered the others as genuine Virginia politicians. He would do justice to Virginia. He imputed to her none of the sentiments which distinguished a certain school, of which he regretted to perceive that the gentleman was one.

The argument which Mr. A. had submitted to the committee when up before, was this: The South Carolina convention, in their address to the people of all the other States, had declared that South Carolina would never more submit to the existing laws, which extend protection to the manufactures and free agriculture of the country; and the main reason which they assigned for this determination was, that this protection was enjoyed exclusively by the manufacturing interest, in which the South had no part, although the South bore in part the burden of its expense. To meet this declaration and argument, Mr. A. had contended that, if the principles assumed by the South Carolina convention could justly be applied to the protection enjoyed by the manufacturing and agricultural interest, it ought, in justice, to be applied in like manner to other great though partial interests protected by the constitution and the laws. He exemplified the great interests of the South, in the possession of the property peculiar to them:—protected by the immense advantage of representation upon this floor; protected by the stipulation in the constitution for the restitution of fugitive slaves; protected by the guaranty in the constitution to the owners of this species of property against domestic violence; protected by the establishment and maintenance of a standing army—all by means of laws burdensome to the manufacturing and free agricultural interest, which was nevertheless heavily taxed for their support. He exemplified the great interest of the new settlers of the West, protected, as well as the South, by the military establishment; protected also by laws and liberal appropriations from the treasury for defence against the Indian savages, of which we have had recent and memorable experience. He finally exemplified the great interest of commerce and navigation, protected by the establishment and support of the navy. The manufacturers and farmers, he observed, were all heavily taxed to support the burden of all these protective establishments; protective to interests which were not theirs; and they had just as good right to demand that the protection of the nation should be withdrawn from all those interests, as those whose interests were thus protected had to insist upon the withdrawal of the national protection from them.

Mr. A. said he was ashamed of detaining the committee so long; but he must be permitted to add one reason more why he should vote against this bill, and against its being reported to the House.

The bill had been partially amended in committee, and it was not, he confessed, quite so bad as when it came from the Committee of Ways and Means. But, still it could not be made palatable to him; and one reason for this was the injustice it contained toward one of the great interests of domestic industry, at the expense of another. Very special favor had been shown towards the article of iron, and, in vindication or apology, the committee told the House that iron was an article of prime necessity in time of war: on this ground they had assigned it a much higher rate of protection than was extended to woollens and cottons. This distinction, it was said, had come to the House with the recommendation of the President of the United States. But the ground assumed was totally fallacious.

Let it be remembered that the distinction was not made in favor of the instruments of war, but in favor of iron as a raw material. The only reason why special protection should be given to articles necessary in war was, that those articles could not, during a time of war, be obtained from abroad, as all articles of this description were pronounced by the law of nations to be contraband. All other articles might be imported, through the intervention of neutral flags, as freely during war as in peace; there was no necessary want of them. But articles contraband of war could not thus be transported under the protection of neutral flags, because they were liable to be captured by the belligerent parties. If our war should be with Great Britain, she might deprive us of these entirely, owing to her great power upon the ocean. This was the only reasonable ground on which a distinction could be made between this class of articles and others, in arranging a protective tariff. This was the reason why he had offered a resolution with a view to ascertain what were the articles which the President considered as entiled to exemption, as being of indispensable necessity in time of war. It had not, however, pleased the House to allow that question to be put to the Executive. The question, instead of being so simple a matter that every body could answer it, was as broad and wide as any question which could be proposed to the mind. The subject of contraband of war was one of perpetual disputation between Great Britain and the other nations of Europe, because she had a navy which gave her a preponderant power upon the ocean. Mr. A. asked, what are the articles contraband of war? We had two treaties which contained an enumeration of articles of this character, one of which gave the smallest list, and the other the most extensive which was recognised by the laws of nations. The first of these treaties was that with France, of the 6th of February, 1778, the first treaty to which the United States were ever a contracting party. The 24th article of this treaty contains the list of articles which the parties stipulated, in the event that either of them should thereafter be engaged in war, and the other neutral, to consider as contraband of war, and as such liable to be captured by the belligerent, when laden in the vessels of the neutral party. This list consists altogether of articles of immediate, and mostly of exclusive use in time of war, such as cannon, muskets, bombs, gunpowder, cannon and musket balls, and all other warlike instruments whatever. These are succeeded by a list of articles which the parties agreed should not be reckoned among contraband or prohibited goods, and this list, together with all manufactures woven of any wool, flax, silk, cotton, or any other materials, wearing apparel, and the stuffs whereof they are usually made, includes also gold and silver, coined or uncoined, tin, iron, &c.

Here the House would see that iron was declared to be not contraband of war.

Then we had another treaty with Great Britain, containing a much larger list of articles to be considered as contraband; it included many articles which were expressly excluded from the contraband list in the treaty with France. It was the treaty of the 19th of November, 1794, in the 10th article of which it was agreed that, under the denomination of contraband of war should be comprised all arms and implements serving for the purposes of war, by land or sea, such as cannon, muskets, mortars, &c.; also, timber for shipbuilding, hemp, cordage, and generally whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir planks only excepted. So that in our treaties with the two greatest maritime Powers of the world, in the largest and in the smallest list of contraband articles known among nations, iron is expressly excluded from that class. Why, then, should the committee have made a special provision for the protection of this article, leaving the duties upon it three or four times as great as those on cottons and woollens, on the ground that it was an article indispensable in war? Such a distinction had no foundation whatever in the principles on which it professed to be founded. Mr. A., however, had no desire to reduce the protection on this article. He hoped the gentleman from Georgia would not consider the remark as personal in its aim, when he said that it might have been possible that the bill was reported in this shape with the view of obtaining the vote and influence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GILMORE,] who, being himself on the committee, was in a position which rendered his vote indispensable to the bill being reported, and who had made a speech in support of it. But Mr. A. must beg that gentleman to understand that if he suffered this bill to pass, the favorite article of Pennsylvania would be no otherwise spared than as the Cyclops had promised to Ulysses—that he should be the last to be devoured.

One word more on the subject of the ordinance of South Carolina. He had said, and he said still, that this issue had been made by the convention of a part of the people of that State. They had declared to the people of the Union that they never would submit to the execution of a protective tariff. They had said this with solemn asseverations in the face of Heaven. Mr. A. gave full credit to their sincerity, and believed it to be an issue which the nation would have to meet. And if Congress should get rid of it now, it would come again hereafter. The question must be settled. One or other of the two parties must give way. The manufacturers and agriculturists must abandon the protective policy, or South Carolina must reconsider her determination never to submit to it. Mr. A. asked whether it was probable, should this bill pass, that South Carolina would be satisfied. Just so far as the pledge of protection was abandoned by it, just so far they would accept of it. But, what credit for concession will this Congress obtain with the nullifiers of the convention, even for the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, should they give it their sanction? This might readily be inferred from a speech which he had seen in the public papers, delivered very recently by a gentleman who, he believed, had himself been a member of the convention. He would take the liberty of reading to the committee a paragraph of that speech. It says:

The Tariff Bill.

"Thus a general convention is the only measure to which the Government (meaning the National Government) can resort. If South Carolina will but retain her position, this is the inevitable issue; already, indeed, the effect of our measures—[please to observe, Mr. Chairman]—the effect of our measures has been strongly felt. The protective system reels under our blows. Last summer, the fear of that resistance, which we had announced—[remark, Mr. Chairman, the appeal to the conscious recollections of the House]—the fear of that resistance, which we had announced, drove them into a reduction; a cheat, it is true, that benefits them, not us. Still, it was an attempt to appease us—[Indeed! what next? a compliment, Mr. Chairman, for the Committee of Ways and Means, and this their soothing conciliatory bill;] and now, before one tittle of the reduction has gone into effect, comes upon the back of our late proceedings another offer of six millions more. These are certainly not bad instalments," [very certainly, not bad instalments.] "Let us go on then, and we shall get the whole debt."

Mr. A. said he was assured beyond a doubt that all this was said in perfect sincerity and purity of heart; and that it indicated the spirit prevalent in the convention that issued the nullifying ordinance; the spirit ruling and domineering throughout the whole nullifying party. Was it on that account a reason with him for passing the bill? Certainly not: but directly the reverse.

There were some other topics touched upon by the gentleman from Virginia, upon which it had been Mr. A.'s intention to bestow some animadversions; but they were not very material, and the patience of the committee was very naturally wearing away. He would, therefore, refrain from any further remarks, and leave the bill at the disposal of the committee.

Mr. PATTON said he did not think that any thing had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts which demanded a particular reply from him, and certainly not in any spirit of recrimination. The gentleman has abstained from making any remarks personally offensive to me; and if he had not done so, I should probably have been disposed to adopt the course he has now pursued, and "begged him to excuse my salute." The remarks made by me the other day, which have given him personal offence, were, I thought, justified and called for by the character and spirit of his speech, to which they were intended to be a reply; but they were certainly not prompted by any sentiment of personal hostility to him.

There is one remark, however, that he has made, which it may be proper for me to notice. He seems to suppose that I undertake to represent the opinions of the State of Virginia upon all the interesting topics which recent events have brought into discussion. I indulge in no such presumption. I do not know that my opinions on these questions are those which are entertained by a majority of the people of Virginia. I do not even know that my opinions accord with those of my immediate constituents. In the absence of any distinct and precise knowledge of their opinions and wishes, I endeavor here to make up opinions for myself, and act on them deliberately, candidly, and independently.

I do not know that I belong to any "school of politics" in Virginia or elsewhere. I do not follow the dictation of any leader. My motto is—"nullius in verba magistri;" and I know that, in relation to some of the delicate and important questions which the present times have brought into debate, my opinions differ in some respects, not entirely unessential, from many of those with whom I in general agree in opinion, and with whom I am proud in general to act, and who are supposed to belong to the "school of politics" to which the gentleman has done me the honor to say he regrets to see that I belong.

There is one other remark made by the honorable gentleman, as to which I wish to say a word. He has thought proper to mention the name of Washington, as one of a "school of politics" in Virginia. No man can be prouder than I am that I am a citizen of that State which gave birth to "the Father of his country;" the first, the last, the only Washington. He, sir, belonged to no party. He was above them all. Let us cherish his memory, as furnishing at least one example of a pure, single-minded patriot. Let no man draw water from the muddy pool of party politics to sprinkle on the snowy mantle of his fame, which is yet without spot or blemish.

And John Marshall, too. Does the gentleman suppose that there is any man more ready than I am to award the homage of sincere respect for the illustrious Chief Justice? The purity and consistency of his life and character have extorted from almost all men of all parties a sentiment of admiration. His head is the pride of his country; his heart an ornament of human nature. He is elevated by his high station, not more than by his own lofty virtue, above the contaminating atmosphere of faction by which he is surrounded—

"Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful form, Swells from the vale and midway leaves the storm;
Though rolling clouds around its base are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

But let me tell the gentleman that I remember too, with pride and exultation, that my native State is the birth-place of Jefferson, the apostle of liberty and the friend of man; the author of the Declaration of Independence; whose principles will be admired wherever liberty has an asylum, or freedom a votary; and of Madison, the author of the Virginia resolutions and report of 1799; than whom a purer patriot or a better man has never lived; and long may he live, but yet not outlive that constitution of which he is the last surviving signer; that constitution over which he still watches with more than parental anxiety and solicitude for its preservation, pure and undeffiled.

As to the argument between the gentleman and myself, it is before the committee to judge between us. I will only remark as to the authorities now produced by the gentleman, that, as to most of them, particularly those taken from the debates in the Virginia convention, properly understood, they support my view of the subject; and, as to the rest, they depend upon the weight which is to be given to such general phrases as "the American people," "the whole people," "the people of the Union," &c. which may be found in abundance in every political treatise, essay, and fourth of July oration, when the attention of the author is not pointed to the particular question on which we are at issue. That question is, whether this constitution is a compact between sovereign States, or the constitution of a single Government, made by the people of all the States as one political community.

* One of the members from South Carolina inquired if this extract was from a speech of Mr. Preston; and upon being informed that it was, said that Mr. Preston had not been a member of the nullifying convention. He is, however, one of the most distinguished men of the party, and a member of the Legislature which enacted the nullifying laws.

I certainly never intended to deny that this Government acted, and had a right to act, upon the individual citizens of the States. On the contrary, I stated substantially, if not in terms, that, in the exercise of its powers, the Government was partly national and partly federal, but that in its origin it was wholly federal; which is precisely the character given to it by Mr. Madison, who, among those having any title to be considered political teachers, is the one with whose opinions I believe my own accord more nearly than with those of any other "master," though I do not "swear to all his words."

Mr. DRAYTON also made a few remarks in reply to Mr. ADAMS; after which,

The committee rose, and reported the bill to the House with all the amendments.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported "a bill more effectually providing for the execution of the revenue laws in certain cases, and for other purposes," accompanied by a report from the committee.

Mr. B. said he deemed it proper, in making this report, to state that the provisions of the bill, as well as many of the sentiments expressed in the report, had received the assent of a majority of the committee merely; the minority had agreed that the bill should be reported to the House, but did not think that its provisions went far enough to meet the exigency: they concurred in some of the sentiments expressed in the report accompanying the bill, but there were others to which they could not give their assent. The minority had it under consideration whether they should present to the House a counter report or not; in that matter they would of course act their pleasure.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said that the chairman had correctly stated the facts in relation to the minority of the committee. Mr. E. was one of the minority, and did not think that the bill was such as to meet the exigencies of the times.

Mr. BEARDSLEY agreed to the statement of the chairman, but was himself one of the minority who agreed to the bill.

The bill was read at the Clerk's table.

Mr. FOSTER stated that very great difficulty had been experienced in the committee in arriving at any bill at all which should meet the views of every member of it: that now reported came nearer to doing so than any they had had under consideration; and the majority had given their consent to its being reported, in order that the House might have some bill before it.

Mr. COULTER called for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD objected.

Mr. GORDON said that, while he had given his assent that the bill should be reported, he had reserved to himself, elsewhere and here, the liberty of going against any and all of its provisions. He considered legislation, in such a case, as a delicate and difficult task, and he could not give his assent to the measure proposed until he had time for more mature reflection, and had all the best light that he could obtain to guide him. He held the wisest mode of resistance to the spirit now prevailing in South Carolina was to meet it by a spirit of conciliation; to meet the crisis arising from the oppressions of the Government by showing a disposition to relieve them.

The report was read, and the bill and report were referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

MATTHEW LYON.

The House again took up the bill for the relief of the descendants of Matthew Lyon; and a debate, of much the same character as that heretofore reported, took place.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, that clause of the bill which contains an allowance of interest (on the sum paid by Mr. Lyon as a fine under the sedition law) was stricken out: Yeas 86.

Mr. SLADE, of Vermont, said he well remembered that the friends of Colonel Lyon assembled, in great numbers, at the prison, at the time of his discharge, with ample means to pay his fine, and with a determination to do it, if necessary; and that he had recently received a communication from a gentleman in his district, saying that it was the impression of the surviving democrats of 1798, in that quarter, that the fine was paid by Lyon's friends.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. SLADE, WICKLIFFE and DANIEL; when

Mr. VINTON moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to inquire into the facts respecting the payment of the money.

The motion failed: Yeas 59.

Mr. BARRINGER then went into a quotation of the proceedings had in the Senate relative to this claim, where memorials had been frequently presented, and even a bill reported, but the memorials had had no effect, and the bill had been laid on the table without a count.

Mr. THOMAS, of Louisiana, Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, and Mr. DRAPER, of Virginia, spoke in reply; when

The hour allotted to morning business expired, and the House passed to the consideration of the

TARIFF BILL.

With the amendments thereto reported by the Committee of the Whole yesterday.

Mr. H. EVERETT moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday next, and urged as a reason, that the comparative statements, showing the effects of the different tariff bills, had not yet been received from the Treasury Department in pursuance of the call upon it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE wished the House to be fuller before the vote on postponement was taken.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved a call of the House.

The House was called accordingly, and the yeas and nays were then taken on Mr. EVERETT's motion of postponement, and negatived: Yeas 51, nays 145.

The bill was then taken up; and the question being on the first amendment reported from the committee, viz. to strike out the word "worsted" before "twist and yarn" in the first section of the bill, which imposes a duty on raw wool and woollen yarn of forty per cent. ad valorem, and four cents a pound, (to be afterwards diminished.)

The amendment was opposed by Mr. HOFFMAN, Mr. ROOT, and Mr. H. EVERETT, and advocated by Mr. PENDLETON and Mr. DEARBORN, on the ground that this worsted yarn was useful in the making of stockings and bombasin, and could be made only from a species of wool not in this country.

The amendment was opposed as opening a door to the importation of English wool almost duty free, and as encouraging foreign in preference to American industry.

The amendment was rejected without a count.

Mr. ROOT now moved to amend the bill, so as to stop

H. OF R.]

The Tariff Bill.

[FEB. 8, 1833.]

the reduction of the duty on wool at the point of thirty per cent. ad valorem, and two cents per pound specific, (after March, in the year 1835.)

Mr. BEARDSLEY opposed the amendment, as destroying the just proportion between the duty on wool and woollens.

Mr. ROOT replied, and supported his amendment. If the ratio between wool and woollens should be disturbed by this change, there would be an opportunity to restore it when the House came to the next section on woollens.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, supported the amendment, and contended that there was no necessity of admitting foreign wool in any case.

Mr. WILDE said that the compound duty, as it now stood amended, would range through the different years as follows: fifty-four, forty-five and a half, thirty-seven, and twenty-eight and a half per cent. The present amendment omitted the last step in this series. Great Britain imported foreign wool, and ought not we?

Mr. BATES said no: as our wool was much finer than the English.

Mr. McKENNAN advocated the amendment, and referred to the duty fixed last year at between sixty and seventy per cent.

Mr. DAYAN was also in favor of it; though he insisted that any protection short of the bill of last year would be totally useless to the wool-growing interest.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, said he was himself a wool grower, and should blush to ask more duty than was proposed by the present amendment. Though he had produced so large an amount of domestic wool, two-thirds of it was consumed in household manufacture, and would not be affected by the duty one way or the other.

Mr. H. EVERETT was in favor of the amendment, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAIG went into some general reflections on the effect of great changes of policy, however salutary, as being always attended with present partial injury, and thought this answer applied generally to all the objections urged against lowering the tariff. If one interest was benefited by it, another must be depressed; nor was this depression confined to foreigners, but shared by part of our own people. He argued to show that it was impossible, under any circumstances, for any manufacture, which had been firmly established, to go down, even if all protection should be removed, because the capacity of the country to import would soon find its level, and then importation would cease.

Mr. BEARDSLEY observed that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McKENNAN] had remarked that the present Congress, by the law of last July, had expressed an opinion that four cents upon each pound, and forty per cent. on the value of imported wool, were but a proper rate of duty for that article, and he had asked, what evidence is now furnished to justify a change in that opinion? It should be kept in mind, said Mr. B., that the judgment of the House, as proved by the act referred to, was simply upon the proper rate of duty for the present year; it did not profess to fix the duty permanently at the rate indicated in that act. That act made no provision for a prospective and gradual reduction, as is contemplated by the amendment which he had submitted. The rate of duty was also fixed by the act of July, upon the supposition that that act would yield the amount of duties necessary for the actual wants of the Government, and no more. Yet the House had been advised by the Secretary of the Treasury, that, so far from reducing the duties down to what would be required for the legitimate and fair purposes of the Government, that act would in fact bring into the treasury an excess of six millions of dollars. He was not aware that this opinion of the Secretary had been seriously questioned in this House, or that its accuracy could well be doubted. The subject therefore seemed to him to be presented at this time in a new aspect; one which left the House uncommitted by the act of July; and it became necessary to inquire whether those who were favorable to the encouragement of American labor, could now reasonably expect to make the present rates of duty on protected articles permanent, or, on the other hand, whether they would not, one and all, admit the propriety of a gradual reduction upon these as well as every other description of imports.

He was decidedly adverse to making the rates of duty equal upon all imports: he had no constitutional difficulties in this respect, and would discriminate in favor of American labor and capital; but, in doing so, he would endeavor, while the system operated beneficially in one region of the country, that it should not be made to press unjustly upon another. The public debt was regarded as paid off; our trade and commerce were increasing; the aggregate amount of imports was greatly augmented, and would rise higher and higher, every year, while the aggregate of duties was at this time to be greatly diminished. The amendment he had proposed did not contemplate any reduction of the duty upon the article of wool during the present year. Reduction would not commence until March, 1834, and could not therefore essentially affect any business arrangements which had taken place since the act of July, and he did not believe that we could expect for a longer time to keep up the rates of protection secured by that act. He had not only proposed a gradual reduction upon wool, after the present year, but had offered similar amendments to the duty upon the manufactures of wool and cotton. These amendments, would in due time come up for the decision of the House.

An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] had said that there was no reason whatever for any reduction upon the raw article, as it might be produced to any extent in our own country. This remark, said Mr. B., applies with about equal force to every article which we produce and manufacture: to iron and cotton, as well as to wool. We have inexhaustible supplies of iron ore, and cotton may be produced in almost any quantity in this country. If the capacity to furnish a full domestic supply is alone a sufficient reason for continuing the present rates of duty, that reason will probably never cease to exist. That reason would carry us at once to prohibition. On this ground we might regard the present rates as permanent, and that without the least reference to the amount of duty which it may be necessary to impose for the purposes of Government. Mr. B. said he did not look upon the system as thus established. He was as desirous as any member of the House to preserve the manufacturing establishments of the country, and to encourage its agricultural interests. He had not given a vote in hostility to those interests, nor would he. He, however, regarded a competition with foreigners, under proper limitations, and with suitable advantages on the part of our own citizens, as perfectly compatible with a hearty devotion to domestic interests, and indeed as indispensable to the equal operation of the tariff system.

He did not design to occupy much of the time of the House, but, with permission, would proceed to make a few suggestions upon the remark of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts.

The more ardent supporters of a tariff for protection, said Mr. B., one and all, argue after this manner: Give adequate protection to American industry, and you invite capital to every occupation and pursuit thus encouraged. Capital employed to stimulate and reward labor, increases competition, until this competition amongst capitalists and laborers brings the price of the manufactured article down to the lowest point at which it can be afforded by the best efforts of industry and skill.

This argument, said Mr. B., appears to me just in its

FEB. 8, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

full extent, in its application amongst ourselves. We certainly can thus produce any manufactured article as low as it can be afforded by the most discreet employment of American capital and the highest efforts of American enterprise and ingenuity. But it by no means follows that we can thus reduce prices to those of the manufacturers of Europe. Indeed, while capital in Europe is plenty and cheap, and while labor is there very low in comparison with the wages paid here, it is certain that for most manufactures we must pay higher for the domestic article than we should have to pay for that imported from abroad, and subject to an ordinary revenue duty only. This remark is more or less just in its application, according to the amount of capital and manual labor which enters into the value of the manufactured article. Some articles, as ordinary cotton goods, it must be admitted, may be produced here, about as low as in any part of the world. The reason is obvious. The principal value of the article is the raw material: its manufacture is almost exclusively by machinery: manual labor enters very little into the price at which it can be afforded. Hence, this article, sir, might now probably defy all fair, foreign competition. It is exported from this country, and sold, as I understand, at a good profit in foreign markets. It is far otherwise, however, sir, with those manufactures in which manual labor is a principal part of the expense of the article. Competition, therefore, will not necessarily bring prices here to a level with those in Europe. We must pay more than is paid there, while wages and capital continue to be so much better rewarded in the United States than in Europe.

Mr. B. said he presumed no gentleman on this floor would ever desire to see American labor reduced in its reward to the low pittance which it receives in most foreign countries. He did not suppose that any such feeling existed in this House, or elsewhere. He was confident that he spoke the feeling of his constituents when he declared that they were, one and all, not only willing, but desirous, that honest industry, in any and every department and occupation of life, should receive its just reward—a reward, which shall enable every one, who is blessed with health and strength and ordinary sagacity and forecast, to enjoy that fair proportion of the good things of this life, which is proper for a mortal body and an immortal spirit. Thou shalt not wrong or oppress the poor. Honest labor should secure an honest and a plentiful reward.

Mr. B. said he did not doubt that such were the feelings of his countrymen in every section of the Union, yet he must admit that they might, with some reason, object to that State policy which imposed the necessity of engaging in employments which could only be successfully conducted by the exaction of high and disproportionate prices. For ourselves, we have a right to be generous: but for our constituents and our country, our first duty is to be just.

It must be admitted, sir, said Mr. B., that the manufacturing regions, the Northern and Middle States, are in the main highly prosperous under the operation of this system. Labor of every description commands a high price, and the productions of agriculture, in general, find ready and advantageous markets. In these respects, it is certain that the manufacturing regions enjoy great advantages when compared with other sections of our country. Hence the ability of these regions to pay the enhanced prices of domestic manufactures. Domestic labor of every description secures a higher compensation: and almost every production of the soil is at the same time advanced in value. The grower of wool sells the clippings of his flock at a better price: a price depending exclusively upon the home market. Wool is not exported: its value in the United States, therefore, depends very little upon the price of the article in other countries. In most, if not indeed in all foreign countries, it sells at a price considerably below what it commands here.

Such, sir, said Mr. B., is the effect of this system in the Northern and Middle regions of the Union. It stimulates, more or less, every species of labor; gives life and activity to every description of business, and, in insuring a higher reward to the products of agriculture, equalizes the operation of the system amongst all classes of persons. If it is not so; if indeed it adds only to the price of manufacturing labor and to the value of manufacturing capital; if these constitute the sum and substance of the system in the manufacturing regions, then it is thereby palpably unequal and unjust in its operation upon different classes of citizens. But he made no such charge against the system. If it enhanced the prices of the protected articles, it had a like effect upon the agricultural products and upon every description of labor. He believed that prices were so adjusted in these regions, that the system operated with reasonable equality and justice upon every description of persons.

Is such its effect at the South? This appears to me to be the important question. The staples of the South are cotton, rice, tobacco. These, amounting to about two-thirds of the full value of the exports of American products, are sent forth into the general market of the world to find purchasers. The domestic market for these products is not superior to the foreign. Mr. B. said he was not aware that they sell more advantageously at home than they do abroad. He did not perceive in what manner the manufacture in the United States of cotton, iron, or wool, had any considerable effect in augmenting the price of those productions of the South. It was true that the cultivation of sugar cane, and the manufacture of sugar, did give some encouragement to a particular species of Southern labor, and probably had some little effect upon the value of cotton. The sugar plantations were well adapted to the cultivation of that product. The employment of a part of the Southern labor and capital in the production of sugar, instead of devoting it exclusively to that of cotton, no doubt had an influence more or less beneficial in favor of the cotton planter. Yet, looking at the effect of the protective policy upon the various interests and sections of the Union, he was constrained to say that he believed its advantages were decidedly in favor of the Northern and Middle States.

To illustrate this idea, said Mr. B., let us suppose the duty on protected articles to be fifty per cent.; that we import twenty millions in value of such goods annually, and manufacture a like amount of similar articles at home. The duty of fifty per cent. on the amount imported, would carry ten millions of dollars into the treasury. Upon the old idea, and which he supposed to be correct, the ten millions of duty would be added to the twenty millions in value of these imports, and they would in fact sell to the consumers at thirty millions, exclusive of profits. But the domestic articles would also sell at the same advanced price: so that the twenty millions manufactured at home would in fact also sell for thirty millions. Thus, sir, these articles, the foreign and domestic, would be enhanced in price and value by the operation of this system, twenty millions of dollars. Of this twenty millions, one-half only would pass into the treasury; the remaining ten millions would be the amount of protection given to the industry and products of our own country. To be sure, said Mr. B., all this is erroneous, if the modern idea that the Southern producer of exports pays all the duties on imports into the United States: but if these duties are paid by the consumers, then he must insist that the view he had presented was substantially just.

The population of the Northern and Middle States do, unquestionably, consume their full proportion of all the productions of skill, of science, and the arts. So far, sir, they will pay their full share of the twenty millions which he had supposed to be the enhanced value of protected articles, under the operation of this system; and they are abundantly able to do so. The same policy which gives a higher compensation to the manufacturer, affords a like advantage to the farmer and mechanic, and indeed to every occupation and profession in the manufacturing States. But he could not discover what advantage, equivalent to the enhanced price of protected articles, is given to the Southern purchaser and consumer of this species of property. There are no manufactures at the South; at least none of any consequence. The mass of Southern labor is exerted in the production of cotton, rice, and tobacco. If these are not enhanced in value, then the system, while it imposes burdens, does not carry with it correspondent benefits. It must therefore be more or less unequal; if unequal, that inequality is so far unjust, and it should, as he thought, be the anxious desire, as he conceived it to be the imperative duty, of every member of the House to correct that inequality.

With this view, he had, at the last session, voted for the admission of certain descriptions of coarse woollen cloths at the very low rate of five per cent. duty upon the value. The House had then been told that these cloths were of general use for the clothing of a certain description of the Southern population. That provision, in the bill of last July, had been advocated and sustained as advantageous to the South. The North had not called for it: it was a discrimination then supposed to be favorable, more or less; he did not speak of the extent of the advantage, but it was supposed to be especially favorable to the agricultural interests at the South. He still hoped it would be found so; although some indications had recently been given in this hall, that its continuance was not desired by many of those who had, at the last session, given their support to the measure. Mr. B. said that, notwithstanding these indications, he believed that the low rate of duty upon coarse cloths could not fail to be beneficial to the planting interest. It would cheapen coarse clothing, an item of no trifling consequence to the owners of large estates. He could wish that there were other articles of general and peculiar demand at the South, and to which the same principle might be applied. The tendency would be to equalize the system. While the manufacturing region, as a whole, is improved and invigorated, these discriminations in favor of other sections of the Union would be but sheer justice. But he was not aware that there was any other imported article or commodity, which would fall within the reason of the rule that had been applied to coarse woollen cloths. We must, then, seek in some other measure to equalize the operation of this system. The Northern capitalists, the Northern farmers, and the Northern laborers, are too just and too generous to ask or receive profit at the expense of other regions. Equality is equity; they ask no more from the legislation of Congress. To industry, economy, and enterprise, with a firm reliance on Providence, they are willing to confide the rest.

It is scarcely to be credited, said Mr. B., that any system really equal in its operation should be so universally condemned as this is, south of the Potomac. It surely cannot conduce to their prosperity, as it does to ours. They have for years strongly and unitedly opposed it as unequal. So intense, so enduring, and so unanimous a judgment, and that not of the people of a single State, but of several contiguous States, cannot well be wholly destitute of foundation. We are at least bound to admit that, in the main, it is an opinion honestly formed, although doubtless greatly aggravated by the arts of ambitious and unprincipled demagogues. A whole people, however, cannot, without some actual injury, be goaded into so general an execration of any system. We might respect even honest prejudices, and should surely attempt to relieve every well-grounded cause of complaint. All this is due to the spirit of our institutions; and it is only by thus acting, in simplicity and truth, that we can hope to see these States united by that firmest of all ties, a general and common interest of the whole in the preservation of every part.

Mr. B. said he did not intend by these remarks to adopt or concur in the idea, that this system had reduced the South to that degree of wretchedness and poverty which its orators had ascribed to it. Very far from it: the picture was too highly colored: it could not, and did not command his assent. The unequal pressure of the system upon the two sections of our country he believed to exist, yet he also hoped and believed that the South was still substantially prosperous, and that it might ever remain so.

Mr. B. said that this inequality in the pressure of the system was with him cause enough for desiring that it should undergo some change. But he did not think that the condition of the country, looking at its different regions, and the actual state of existing establishments, would demand or justify any sudden and violent change in the protective policy. He desired, however, to see a change commenced within some short period. Make it gradual—slow—yet certain. He believed this might be done without essential injury to any section or interest in the Union. It might, to some moderate extent, reduce the profits of capital and the wages of labor. He, however, believed that its influence in these respects, under the operation of the proposed reduction, would scarcely be felt. If the price of domestic manufactures was thus reduced, the reduction would be very small in any one year. And we should bear in mind that if this reduction is felt as a loss to us, it is felt as a gain elsewhere. That thus we equalize the operation of an arbitrary system, making its burdens and its blessings felt as far as practicable in every region, and by every individual of this vast and diversified country.

A word, sir, as to South Carolina. We are advised not to pass any bill at this time, lest it should be supposed that Congress is coerced by her menacing attitude. Mr. B. said he would not concede any thing to the posture or the threats of that State; on the other hand, he would not thus be deterred from adopting a measure strictly proper of itself. South Carolina alone had assumed an attitude of force and defiance. But twenty-three States against one were "fearful odds." This body, he thought, might do its duty without the slightest ground to apprehend that improper motives would be imputed. The resistance to the laws, threatened by South Carolina, was a distinct question, and one which would probably secure the early, and, he trusted, the decided action of this House. He would add, that if there really was any cause to apprehend that the permanence of the Union was at this time endangered, it arose, in his judgment, not from the posture of South Carolina—that alone could not excite any such apprehension—but from a deep-rooted and general opinion at the South, that their interests are not identical with those of the North; that the policy, which is deemed by a majority to be of general utility, operates, in fact, in their region, as a burden rather than a relief. From this conviction, general as it now is, universal as it may become, and sharpened and exasperated in its progress, he would not deny that we had some ground to look, at no distant day, for formidable and portentous consequences. He would not anticipate or dwell upon them; he was, however, free to say, that they did not lessen his very sincere desire to see the whole subject adjusted in a manner which may satisfy honest public opinion, and do substantial justice to every interest and section of our common country.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, then rose, and said: It is worth our while, before we vote on this measure, as it is the first, and will be followed by others of like character, to understand what principles we act upon. The amendment proposes to reduce the duty on wool in three years to 25 per cent ad valorem; and the amendment to the amendment proposes to leave that duty at 30 per cent. He should, he thought, vote for both, not because he approved of them, or considered them as suitable acts of legislation for this Government to adopt, but because he considered them more favorable to the great agricultural interests of the country than the bill; and this was the only reason why he should give them his support, if he gave it at all.

He would, while up, take the occasion to say that probably few members on the floor felt more anxious than he had to see this all-stirring subject settled; to see national harmony restored, and the jarring opinions, if possible, reconciled. He had from the outset entertained this sentiment; and while all around him seemed to concur in it, and seemed anxious to allay excitement, and to cherish better feeling, it gave him pain to observe that the House, after more than four weeks of intense labor, had approximated little towards it; indeed, he said, the signs of the times were such that he despaired of any reasonable adjustment.

He saw the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means execrated throughout the country as a measure unsuitable to be the basis of future revenue. He used no harsher language than facts justified, for it gives satisfaction nowhere in the portions of the Union attached to the protection of our industry; and he was equally confident it was reprobated where he supposed it was designed to give contentment. We had now had it under consideration a month, had endeavored to amend, alter, adjust, and bring it into an acceptable form. We had labored early and late, and what had it all come to? Would any one say we are now apparently any nearer to the object of desire than when we commenced? Every motion, every proposition to modify this bill, unsatisfactory as its provisions are, has been steadily and resolutely resisted by the South, and we have this painful evidence that no better propositions, no terms more just and beneficial to the country, are to be offered to us. The bill, therefore, and nothing else, has the approbation of those opposed to the tariff. We have, therefore, he observed, no alternative left, but to resist a measure so unjust and injurious; and this, for one, he should do to the last, if it were not improved.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts must confine his remarks to the amendment.

MR. D. inquired if it was not in order for him to argue that the proposed decrease of duty was impolitic, and bad legislation.

THE SPEAKER assented to this.

MR. D. observed he believed he had confined himself within the strictest rules of order, and should continue so to do. He had spoken at large, on a preceding day, of the injurious policy of reducing wages, and of the pernicious tendency it had to make a poor, ignorant, and miserable population, like that of Europe. He had said that duties could not be reduced on protected articles without producing this effect to an extent proportioned to the reduction; and this would not reach manufacturers alone, but all laborers in the country. He had, therefore, said a question of reduction was one of serious import, and should be well considered. And he would now inquire if the avowed object of this bill was not a reduction of revenue, because there would be a surplus in the treasury. He did not concur with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] that we had any evidence before us of such an excess of revenue. The Secretary of the Treasury proved to us last summer, if the bill then passed, which did become a law, that it would raise only a revenue of $12,000,000; but he now alleges, only a few months having elapsed, that it will produce $18,000,000.

It is not easy to understand his reasons for this change of estimates; nor is it easy to settle which opinion is entitled to most consideration. If it will raise no more than $12,000,000, the Government will need that sum, and there is no occasion for further reduction. The Secretary, however, does not pretend that even if the sum of $18,000,000 is raised, that there would be any surplus this year, for the whole will be absorbed by the demands of the Government. No excess can accrue, therefore, before the close of the year 1834, and it is by his statement problematical whether there will be any then. Why should we be pressed so urgently on this subject now, as if it was a matter of certainty, when it is only a contingent? Why should we be forced to go forward blindfold—to grope along a path which the Secretary himself seems not able to point out with any certain knowledge? Yet this reduction is alleged to be the main object of the bill, and we are urged to act here as if we knew that the laws would place in the treasury six millions of surplus revenue in 1834; and this is the reason pressed unceasingly upon us to pass the bill.

Such matters, he said, as came properly before us, he was willing to consider. The public debt was nearly paid off, and we shall consequently have less occasion for money; we must therefore raise less than we hitherto have done; but we had not been unmindful of this event, and had prepared for it by lessening the revenue ten or twelve millions in a short period. He admitted that the argument against an accumulating surplus in the treasury was sound, and did not deny that the Government must be limited in its income to its necessary expenditures; but the enemies of American industry insist on lessening the protection of the laborer, on the ground of a surplus. He desired assurance of the existence of such surplus; before he acted on this question, he wished to be made reasonably certain that hostility to our industry did not outrun all other considerations.

In voting, he said he should keep these considerations steadily in view, and would reiterate that he should support no bill that abandoned the principle of protection. In reducing the revenue, let us, he said, understand what we do, and upon what principles we act. It seems to be assumed here; that the only mode of reducing revenue is to reduce all duties on imports equally. He protested against this, as a false, unsound theory, designed to destroy, by its insidious action, the protective doctrine, without accomplishing the object it professed to have in view. The bill before us, which is recommended because it is alleged to be necessary to reduce revenue, contains items that by this process will increase, instead of diminishing revenue. Take, for example, ardent spirits, the duty on which is perhaps one hundred and fifty per cent., and suppose this duty reduced to seventy-five per cent., will not the importations which are now restrained by the very high duty be so increased as to increase the revenue? The Committee of Ways and Means, he said he believed, admitted that this would be the result. The same may be said of other articles.

MR. WILDE rose, and inquired if it was in order to discuss the whole subject.

THE SPEAKER said, no; the argument must be confined to the amendment.

MR. DAVIS desired to be informed if it was not in order to show the impolicy of reducing duties on wool in the manner proposed.

THE SPEAKER replied, yes. [There was a cry from different quarters, "go on—go on."] The argument he had used was to that point. The general proposition is to reduce the revenue, and to accomplish this object the amendment proposes to reduce the duty on wool. To this, he, in the form in which it stood, was opposed, and his argument he considered direct and legitimate for this purpose. [The SPEAKER nodded assent.] Certain and fixed principles, he said, ought to govern us in this and all votes, that we give on this and all other propositions for reduction; and at the head should stand constantly the principle of protecting American industry; no measure should meet with countenance that aims to abolish this.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] said the only wise way to reduce is to do it gradually. With that gentleman, he said, he concurred thus far; but we ought to look as well at what we had done as to what we were called on to do. In July last, Congress considered this matter with the most anxious and deliberate attention, and lowered the duty greatly, and this should not escape observation, as any attempt to descend further may be attended with great peril, and may be followed by grievous calamity. Notwithstanding this, he observed, greater reductions were demanded to compose the irritated state of feeling which is alleged to exist in the country; and how can it be done? If done at all, it can be accomplished in but one way, without violence to private rights, and great private suffering. It must be gradual—very gradual—and a long time, and arranged with great judgment and discretion. There is an immense interest at stake, and the prosperity, nay, almost the existence of a vast population involved in it, and it should be approached with caution, and changes affecting it made with sound judgment. What, he said, he would repeat, do you propose to do? Last July a great change was made, but the law goes into operation in March next; that change which was a reduction of 20 per cent. of the present duties on wool is still future, and will Congress add to it the present proposed reduction of 15 per cent. of the duties of 1832? Can the country bear this? for it is to be followed up on woollens and other articles. Will the wool grower be satisfied to have his property made thus the sport of this body? But this is not all, for this reduction is to continue for three years after the same rate. This is not gradual, but rapid—very rapid—and full of hazard. The time is not long enough, especially for men in debt. The descent should be slow; the annual reduction so small, that, by increased skill and economy, men may not only exert themselves, but may succeed in meeting it. If, he said, you descend 16 or 20 per cent. in a year, they will sit down in despair, being unable to grapple with it. Men should have time to prepare for changes in their business. This proposition of the gentleman from New York goes by long strides; it is very hurried; and though, said he, the principle is the right one, yet the details are objectionable.

He said he had occupied the attention of the House much longer than he intended when he rose. He would not, in conclusion, say the wool growers or the manufacturers would bear any change from the bill of '32, without hard pressure and suffering. He believed they would not, but hoped they would willingly make great sacrifices for repose. They were wearied with this endless warfare. And, believing such to be their feelings, he should, for one, take the responsibility of voting a judicious and gradual reduction, if the discontented would sit down and be at peace under it; otherwise, he would not lift his finger to carry any measure through. He rose to express these general views, that his course on this, and the measures which will succeed, might be understood. He did not propose, at present, to introduce any measure, but hoped, if the South desired, as they had often expressed themselves, to save our manufactures, and, at the same time, to compose all controversy, that some gentleman from that quarter would offer something besides this bill, which no man in favor of protection can support.

The question was now taken, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 100, nays 87.

So Mr. Root's amendment was carried,

Mr. STEWART now moved further to amend, so as to leave the duty on wool as by the law of 1832, viz. 40 per cent. ad valorem, and 4 cents per pound specific, and supported his motion by a short speech, insisting that, should the bill stand without further amendment, the importation of wool would be doubled.

Mr. WILDE considered the vote last taken as an index of what was to be the ultimate fate of the bill. Yet he would notice some of the steps in the process of its gradual rejection. He then went into a calculation to show what were the profits of the wool growers of the North, the result of which was, that at the price of 35 cents for wool they make a profit of 18 or 19 per cent.

Mr. PENDLETON scouted these calculations as wholly erroneous, three sheep having been taken as the average to an acre, whereas the average was less than two. The gentleman had allowed $30 for the expense of keeping 100 sheep for a year; while the hay alone they consumed in winter was worth $75.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, said he was in the habit of paying $1 50 a piece for the keeping of his sheep, so that 100 would cost 150 instead of 30 dollars.

Mr. SLADE said the gentleman had allowed nothing for the loss by disease.

The question was now taken on Mr. STEWART's amendment, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 85, nays 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question was then put on the amendment reported by the committee as amended, on motion of Mr. ROOT, and decided by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Allison, Arnold, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, Barber, Barstow, Isaac C. Bates, Briggs, Brodhead, Bucher, Bullard, Burd, Cahoon, Chandler, Choate, Collier, Condit, Condit, E. The Naval Service.

[H. OF R.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

THE NAVAL SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WARD in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1833.

Various amendments were proposed and adopted.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said the time had arrived when it had become necessary to limit the discretionary power of appointing midshipmen, which was now exercised by the Secretary of the Navy. It appeared by the navy register that the present number was upwards of 450, which might be indefinitely increased at the discretion of the head of the Navy Department. No limitation existed as to the number excepting the amount of the appropriations. Within the last two years it appeared that a large number of appointments had been made. He moved an amendment to the bill providing that the number of midshipmen should not be increased until otherwise ordered by law.

Mr. ANDERSON was not prepared to support such an amendment until the facts to which it related were laid before the House. If the gentleman would move a resolution calling for those facts, he should have his vote in favor of the call. There might be too great a number of midshipmen in the navy; but there were many circumstances relative to their number which should be taken into view before it was definitely fixed by law. It was a fact well known to all acquainted with the naval service, that a considerable proportion of the midshipmen who were appointed, after going to sea and ascertaining the nature and hardships of the duties imposed upon them, had left the service, and gone into other pursuits more congenial to their tastes or their constitutions. Others, after going to sea for the period required by the rules of the department, were not found to be qualified to pass the rigid examination to which they were subjected before they could receive promotion, and either resigned or were dismissed from the service. The precise number of midshipmen which might be required he was unable to fix without information from the department. He could not vote for the amendment until the necessary facts should be laid before the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE did not propose to diminish the present number of midshipmen by the amendment, or restrain the head of the department from filling up such vacancies as might occur from the causes suggested by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. ANDERSON.] If gentlemen were disposed to wait until an answer to a call for information should be obtained, and a bill founded upon such information could be carried through both Houses of Congress, they would probably wait a considerable period. He regarded the present as a proper occasion to provide against the further increase of this class of officers: while we were reducing the number of vessels in commission, he could perceive no propriety in adding to the number of officers.

Mr. DEARBORN said the House would not presume that the power which had, ever since the establishment of the navy, been placed in the head of the department, would now be wantonly abused or improperly exercised. At least there was no testimony that would lead the House to act upon such a presumption. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] thinks that too many appointments have been made, or that any had been improperly made, the usual course of proceedings was to call for information on the subject. The House would not act upon the ground that power hitherto lodged in an officer of the Government had been abused, without some facts to sustain it. He hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. HOFFMAN had occasion to examine this subject heretofore, and was satisfied that the number of naval officers now in service exceeded the wants of the navy in time of peace. But he could inform the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] that it would be extremely difficult to limit the number in any other mode than that by which it was now limited by law. No plan is proposed for removing the unnecessary officers. This was an essential requisite. The number had always been limited by the amount of the appropriation for their pay and subsistence. It was already provided by law that the expenditure under that head should in no case exceed the amount of the appropriation. The precise number of officers to be employed in the various grades under the present system could not be limited without great inconvenience in any other way. It would be found impossible for the House to determine beforehand how many officers ought to be employed in the several grades. He regarded the proposed amendment as entirely useless, though he was satisfied that midshipmen were too numerous as well as the officers in other grades. This he inferred from the great number who were kept waiting orders.

Mr. WICKLIFFE inquired how many officers were in that situation.

Mr. HOFFMAN was not able to state the number. After a full examination of the subject, he had come to the conclusion that the power of Congress over the number of officers was most properly exercised in limiting the amount of the pay and emoluments which they might receive. If the number was to be reduced, the mode in which the reduction was to be made should be pointed out.

Mr. VANCE did not know what number of midshipmen were necessary for the naval service, but he thought it high time that some check was placed upon the power of appointment. By reference to the navy register, he found that the State of Ohio has twelve midshipmen out of 450, and that forty or fifty had been appointed since the commencement of 1832. While Ohio has but twelve upon the list of midshipmen, he had been endeavoring for three years to get one appointed from his district. It was time that provision be made by law that these appointments be properly distributed among the several States. He had no hesitation in saying, if the present unequal mode of distributing these appointments was continued, the effect would be injurious to the navy among the people of the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON was sorry the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] had been disappointed in the gratification of his wishes. He would, however, state, for the information of that gentleman and of the House, after what had been said, that the rule of the department was to distribute these appointments of midshipmen among the several States in the same manner as those of cadets at the Military Academy. This rule was a fair and reasonable one, and had been, as he believed, constantly adhered to. But on looking over the navy register, inequalities between the number of midshipmen apportioned to the several States, compared with the present population, might undoubtedly be found. This was not owing to an unfairness in the original distribution, but to the different ratio in which the population of the States had lately increased. The new States of the West probably had not at this time so many midshipmen as they would be entitled to were the distribution to be now made for the first time. His own State was in a similar situation, in consequence of its having increased in population more than some other States: although it probably had more seamen among its citizens than any other State in the Union, in proportion to its population, it had not at this time its due proportion of officers of the navy. But whenever appointments of midshipmen had been made, the rule had been rigidly adhered to, so far as he had been informed. As to officers kept waiting orders, that must always exist to a certain extent. It would be found impossible to keep all the officers of the navy on board ship, or on duty at the navy yards. Were the numbers in the several grades reduced to the wants of the service, still a portion of the officers would be kept waiting orders. Before he could give his assent to any reduction or restriction as to the number of officers in any grade, he must have further information.

Mr. BRANCH rose, and addressed the Chair, but the conversation among the spectators around the reporter's seat was so loud and constant, that the purport of his remarks was very imperfectly understood; indeed, this was the case with regard to much of this debate. Mr. B. was understood to say that 450, the number of midshipmen now in the service, was as many as the wants of the navy required. There could be no sound objection to limiting the number to that amount. While he had held the office of Secretary of the Navy, he had made very few appointments, having been satisfied that the appointment of supernumerary officers of that grade was only calculated to place the most promising young men in a state of idleness, with nothing to do but to range about the country, acquiring bad habits to which youth were unfortunately but too prone. He was not prepared to say that so high a number as 450 was required. According to his information of the wants of the service, he would rather reduce than increase the number. Under these views, he felt it his duty to support the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment, which was lost: Yeas 59, nays 62.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill and amendments to the House.

In the House all the amendments made to the bill in committee were concurred in without debate, except that respecting the pay.

To this item Mr. WICKLIFFE proposed to add a proviso, that the number of midshipmen should not be further increased unless authorized by law.

Mr. W., in support of this proviso, would barely call the attention of the House to the statement of his friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BRANCH,] whose acquaintance with the subject would be admitted on all hands, that some restriction upon the prevailing practice of appointing midshipmen was necessary to make them efficient officers, and prevent them from indulging in idleness and dissipation. The House had been told that the number had been largely increased within the last two years. Under these circumstances, he considered the proposed restriction necessary. He intended no reflection upon the head of the Navy Department; on the other hand, he had no doubt but that officer would be glad to be relieved from the constant pressure to which he was subjected for new appointments. Should the proviso be adopted, he could then say that the limited number was filled up, and he had no power of adding to it. If any gentleman would state that the number now in the service was not sufficient, he was willing to fix upon such number as might be thought necessary; but he was convinced that some restriction upon the discretion of the Secretary as to the increase of these officers was indispensable.

Mr. BRANCH would vote for the proposition, not only because he thought it right in itself, but out of respect to the present head of the Navy Department. He was able to judge, from his own experience, of the continual solicitations to which that officer was exposed in consequence of the unlimited discretion with which he was now invested, as to the number of midshipmen. He had strong reasons for believing that the Secretary of the Navy would be glad to have the number reduced to 400. For himself he was satisfied that 380 was a sufficient number. Circumstances might render the appointment of a few more proper. He had made this statement, that it might be distinctly understood that his vote in favor of the proposition was not intended as casting any censure whatever upon the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. DEARBORN regretted that the motion had been made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] before any measures had been taken to procure the necessary information. He still more regretted that any gentleman should have taken this occasion to assail the characters of the young gentlemen who composed a most important part of the naval service. He had enjoyed an opportunity of personal acquaintance with many of them, and felt bound to testify in favor of their general good character and gentlemanly deportment. It certainly was not necessary to make a sweeping denunciation of all the midshipmen in the navy because a few individuals among them, as among all other bodies of men, might not have conducted themselves with propriety. They were the future officers of our navy; of that arm of the public service to which this country was so much indebted for its security, prosperity, and glory. In the event of a future war, it was to them we must look for the discharge of the high duty of sustaining the brilliant reputation which the American navy now enjoyed throughout the civilized world. He was unwilling to see this essential portion of the naval service assailed without information or specific charge. With quite as much propriety we might limit or reduce the number of post captains, masters commandant, or lieutenants. For one, he was unwilling to interfere with any of them, without distinct information.

Mr. WATMOUGH said the ground on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] appeared to be disposed to place his amendment was, that some of the midshipmen of the navy passed their time in idleness, and were consequently exposed to dissipation. He would suggest to the gentleman that he would have an opportunity of obviating all evils of that kind by supporting a bill reported from the Naval Committee for establishing a naval school for their instruction.

Mr. CAMBRELENG did not rise for the purpose of going into the discussion, but to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] the propriety of bringing forward his views upon the subject in another form. The subject before the House was an appropriation bill; we were not providing for the organization of the navy. It certainly was not proper to engraft a distinct measure upon such a bill. If the gentleman would withdraw his amendment, an opportunity would be afforded him for bringing it forward in the proper shape. The bill before the House only proposed to provide for the navy as it now exists, without reference to any new arrangement of the officers.

Mr. BRANCH had not been apprised of the intention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] to offer the amendment. The proposition was entirely new to him when it was made by that gentleman. Under a strong conviction that the proposed limitation of the number of midshipmen would have a salutary effect, he had given it his approbation. He regretted that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEARBORN,] and Pennsylvania, [Mr. WATMOUGH,] should have so entirely mistaken the purport of his remarks as to the impolicy of appointing supernumerary officers. If any inference could be drawn from his remarks like what had been stated by those gentlemen, it was distant from his intention. If any description of officers were generally more meritorious than the midshipmen of the navy, he was not aware of it. They were not only in general very intelligent and respectable, but many of them were young gentlemen of the very first order and talent in the country. He would be the last man to sanction any measure which might cast any reproach upon them. He did not consider this such a measure. He was desirous as far as possible to prevent that a great number of young men of fourteen, fifteen, or sixteen years old should be waiting orders year after year without employment, and for this purpose only should vote in favor of the amendment.

The Naval Service.

Mr. SEMMES was in favor of the amendment, because he fully concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEARBORN,] in the high character he had given to the midshipmen of the navy. The tendency of the present system would ruin the finest young men in the world. There were now nearly 500 midshipmen warranted. Only about half that number were actually employed in the service. Of those who were not in actual service, a portion had no parents or other friends to live with, and they were obliged to live in taverns and boarding houses, where they were exposed to the influence of improper examples. He could perceive no objection to the proposed limitation of their number. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DEARBORN] has said that it would be equally proper to reduce the number of post captains, masters commandant, or lieutenants. But that gentleman should consider that officers of those grades had acquired fixed habits, and were not exposed like boys furnished with money, driving about the country from tavern to tavern. Such a system was better calculated to destroy the finest young men in the country, than any other that could be devised.

Mr. DEARBORN observed that the statement on which Mr. D. had before remarked, had been repeated, and gentlemen had spoken of the young gentlemen of our navy as constantly to be found wandering about the country, or wasting their time as idlers in taverns and boarding houses, where they contracted evil habits, deleterious alike to their constitution and morals, and ultimately led to their ruin. Mr. D. said that he had seen nothing of this declared profligacy, this reckless and reprehensible conduct; and that it was in direct violation of the regulations prescribed for their government, both on the land and on the ocean.

The midshipmen, under orders for duty, were either attached to the ships afloat, or to the navy yards, where they were subject to the constant surveillance of their superior officers, while the others were left entirely to the guidance of their parents or friends. If the latter portion of these young men were to be found strolling over the Union, as had been represented, it was not owing to their position in the navy, or to any deficiency in the rules which have been prescribed for their government, nor was it the fault of the department. The Executive, so far from countenancing idleness and dissoluteness of deportment, expected and required that every midshipman, not in actual service, should be either cultivating his mind, under the parental roof, or in some seminary of learning. Would the proposed amendment have any tendency to obviate the imagined improprieties? Could a reduction of the number, in any manner, superinduce a reformation, even if that was as imperious as had been intimated? Certainly not; while it might essentially impair the efficiency of the navy, not merely in the time of peace, but in the event of war, how were their places to be filled? They were a class of officers whose services were of the first consequence in every situation in which our fleets may be placed, in the elemental storms as well as of those of battle; but to give them the ability to discharge their duties in a manner creditable to themselves and their country, their intellects must be cultivated, discipline must be familiar, and they must be expert navigators and seamen. This requires time and much practical drilling. Skill in all their multifarious duties must be the result of experience; and is it wise, is it politic, is it safe, to so diminish the number of midshipmen as to endanger the service, and jeopardize the honor of the flag and the glory of the republic, merely because some irregularities may possibly exist, or that a pitiful reduction may be made in our public expenditures? Neither prudence nor economy warrant such a measure. Should we not then pause until we have definite and exact information as to the number which may be deemed indispensable for the best interests of our naval establishment. This can only be obtained by a reference to the Navy Department. Let us have the opinion of the Secretary and Board of Commissioners. At present there are no facts before us by which we can justly decide whether the power of the Executive has been properly exercised or not: but the presumption is, that no more midshipmen have been appointed than are deemed requisite for the public service. But if doubts are entertained on this subject, let an inquiry be instituted in the usual mode. That is the proper course to be pursued; and if abuses have been practised, a remedy can be applied by limiting the number in future. To this there can be no possible objection; but it certainly cannot be respectful to the Executive, nor is it in conformity to the usual practice of this House, to decide on any important subject until a thorough investigation has been made, especially when involving the character of the Executive, as well as the efficiency of one of the most powerful arms of national defence. When the desired information has been obtained, we may diminish or augment the number of these officers, as circumstances may require. To proceed in the summary mode proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, strikes at the stability, the very existence of the navy. As well might we prescribe, instantly, the number of post captains, masters commandant, and lieutenants, by an amendment to this appropriation bill, as the warrant officers. We have not sufficient intelligence to act in either case; and it is to be presumed that the House will not be precipitated into the adoption of a measure, which may be fraught with the most serious consequences to the great interests of our national ships, as well as our commercial fleets.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SEMMES] had not only confirmed the statements of the gentleman from North Carolina, but had even gone beyond him; but he [Mr. DEARBORN] was inclined to believe that his worthy friend's reminiscences were of distant by-gone days, and not a correct estimate of the existing condition of the navy. What he had stated might, perhaps, once have been a true picture of the fact; but an essential, radical, and most salutary change had taken place since the last war, and no such disgraceful state of things now existed, as was possibly the case some thirty-five years since.

Under the existing regulations, no young officer could heedlessly roam the country, or squander his days in the dissipation of our cities, without the compunctious whisperings of self-rebuke for the hazards he was running of being dismissed the service, and the conscious certainty of never rising in the profession of his choice.

The system of examinations which at present prevails, requires that the midshipmen should not only serve three years, become accomplished seamen, skilful navigators, and able tacticians, but maintain an unimpeachable moral reputation. This was an indispensable prerequisite, without which no young gentleman could pass the board of officers selected as examiners. This qualification was paramount to, and rode over all others. Nothing could be substituted or compensated for the want of it. No matter how gifted with natural endowments; no matter how richly his mind might be stored with the lore of science, and the embellishments of letters; no matter how adroit in the execution of his various duties; no matter how active, how adventurous, and how ambitious for eminence in his honorable vocation; no matter how distinguished for his valor on the deep, without that priceless gem, moral rectitude of deportment, he never could be advanced; it was utterly impossible that he should obtain a commission; his career in the naval service would be closed forever. What a motive was here to counteract the seductions of idleness, the allurements of dissipation, and the withering and blasting influence of vicious habits. Did the ingenuous bosom of youth beat with one glowing throb of generous ambition; did he aspire to rank and honors; was there an ardent aspiration to hear his name hailed with triumph, and his chivalric deeds applauded by his exulting countrymen, that could, for a moment, indulge in a course of profligacy; that would forego all the glories of the future for the brief enjoyment of unmanly and ruinous indulgences? Had he a father, mother, or friend, who could stand idly by, blind to his follies, and indifferent to his prosperity, when they beheld the pride of their hearts rushing to destruction? Mr. D. trusted not. Before him all was gilded with hope; the prospect was cheering; the prize of merit was certain, and, the noblest passions of the soul being roused, it would be pursued with zealous and untiring assiduity.

One thing was certain; it was beyond all doubt or dispute, there was not, at this hour, nor ever had been, a naval service known, where all the officers had been so uniformly correct in their deportment, whose morale was so commendable and lofty; none where so severe an application was directed to the studies, and the infinite duties of the profession. No man who had visited foreign climes, and had seen one of his country's ships lying by the side of a vessel of any other nation, whose heart had not swelled with pride at witnessing the universal suffrage by which the palm of excellence was every where awarded to the ships, the officers, the crews, and the discipline of the American navy. This had been verified, again and again, in the Atlantic ports of Europe, in Southern America, in the Mediterranean and the Levant, where the fleets of all the maritime kingdoms of the globe were exhibited in comparison and contrast, and those of the United States had been pronounced superior to all.

From these considerations, Mr. D. said that he could not sit quietly in his place, and hear the élite of the American navy aspersed as idle and dissolute young men, when the very reverse was notoriously the fact. If there was a single latent spark of emulation or of exalted virtue in their breasts, it was kindled into a flame by our admirable system of instruction, discipline, and police; and all who wore the uniform of the republic were taught to believe, and with truth, that they could participate in that glory which irradiated the brows of so many of our illustrious commanders. Let us not, then, hastily legislate in such a manner as may prove disastrous to our fleets in peace and in war, and possibly tend to break down our flourishing and glorious naval establishment; but reject the proposed amendment until better and more fully instructed on the subject.

Mr. CARSON said, if he regarded the present as a proper occasion for bestowing eulogy upon the officers of the navy, he should express himself in terms as strong as the gentleman who had just taken his seat. The question was whether the number of midshipmen should be limited, or left discretionary with the head of the department. He had no fear that the discretion would be abused; but, under the information that the proposed restriction would relieve the department from the pressure of continual application for appointments, he was inclined to afford it this relief. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBLESSE] had suggested a strong argument against the amendment, that this was not the proper mode of making the limitation; but it was not conclusive. All that was proposed by the amendment, was to express the opinion of Congress that the present number should not be increased.

Mr. VANCE had looked through the names of midshipmen in the navy register since he had made his former statement, and had found that since the commencement of 1832, instead of forty or fifty, as he had stated, seventy-two midshipmen had been appointed. What he complained of, was, that for three years he had been unable to get one appointed from Ohio. Ohio was entitled to nineteen members in this House. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBLESSE], he had only to say that he regarded the present as the most proper and favorable opportunity for imposing the limitation upon the power of appointment, which he regarded as necessary.

Mr. HUBBARD did not profess to be at all conversant with the subject now under debate; but, from the relation in which he stood to the Secretary of the Navy as a friend, belonging to the same State, it was due that officer to say, after the representation which had been made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE], that of the midshipmen who had been appointed since the Secretary had held his present situation, two only were from New Hampshire. By such examination of the navy register as he had been able to make since the subject had been before the House, he had been able to find but sixty-two appointments in the year 1832. Within the same period, the number of vacancies, by death and resignation, had been thirty-eight. The number actually increased was, therefore, only twenty-four. In looking back to a period before the present Secretary came into office, he had observed that, in 1829, one hundred and two appointments had been made. He would repeat that the subject was one to which he had not turned his attention; and, in this respect, he presumed his situation was similar to that of a great portion of the members of the House. Whether the present number of midshipmen was greater or less than was necessary, he was totally unable to decide without information. If a substantive measure should be brought forward, in the usual course, opportunity would be afforded for the necessary examination; but he was opposed to any change in the present system introduced on the spur of the moment without any means of determining as to its propriety.

Mr. GRENNELL could not support the amendment. The subject was now for the first time started in the House. He had understood that the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which the subject belonged, had taken up the general new organization of the navy; but no report had yet been made at the present session. Whenever such a report should be laid before the House, he would prepare himself to act upon it. He would ask gentlemen if this was the proper mode to effect a change in the organization of the navy. Having great confidence in the present head of the Navy Department, he was perfectly willing to entrust him with the same discretion on this subject as has been exercised by his predecessors, until further light as to the necessity for change be cast upon it.

Mr. SPEIGHT rose, not for the purpose of going into the debate, but to give notice to gentlemen that if it was not speedily brought to a close he should move that the House proceed to the order of the day.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said the objection to the amendment which had been suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBLESSE], that this was not the proper place for restricting the number of midshipmen, was the argument which had been always used against every attempt to limit the discretion of the Executive. He had enjoyed an opportunity for some little experience in this matter. He had the last session introduced a resolution having in view the reduction of the number of cadets at the Military Academy. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which had reported a bill which was now in the calendar. No one could foresee when the subject would be acted on by the House. He considered the present the most favorable occasion which would offer for declaring the views of the House on this subject. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WARMEYER], that the objections to the appointment of supernumerary midshipmen would be obviated by the establishment of a naval school, on the contrary, the present evils would be increased by such an establishment in a ten-fold degree. Such a school would present an additional inducement for applications for these appointments.

The Naval Service.

Where there was one application for the appointment of midshipman, there were now at least twenty for that of cadet, because they were thoroughly educated at the public expense. Establish a similar system of education for midshipmen, and where there is now one application for a warrant there would then be a hundred. He would appeal to those gentlemen who were members of the House in 1829, to say whether the number of the officers either of the army or navy was a matter which ought to be left to Executive discretion. He did not propose to occupy the time of the House by further debates upon the subject, but would barely ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS could not but regret that an amendment of the character of that before the House should have been offered to an appropriation bill. It was an improper place for the provision now sought to be established. He felt this the more sensibly after the very cogent reasons which had been stated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] for taking up this bill in preference to the other business before the House. It appeared that the interests of the naval service were now suffering for want of the appropriations contained in this bill. The subject which had been introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had nothing whatever to do with the subject before the House. The object of the bill was to provide the means for paying money already due, or which may be due, during the current year upon the various branches of the naval service. Was this a proper occasion for tacking a proviso to the bill, introducing a new principle upon the propriety of which no facts had been obtained through the usual channel, and which might give rise to a week's debate? He would confidently appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky to say whether this amendment was the most proper mode of accomplishing his views. The introduction of this amendment had given an opportunity for introducing other matters equally remote from the subject properly before the House. Gentlemen had embraced the occasion on the one hand to assail, and on the other to defend the moral character and the habitual occupations of a certain class of officers of the navy. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] had seized the opportunity for introducing another topic. Because that gentleman had not been able to obtain an appointment for one of his friends, he appears to consider that a sufficient reason for restricting the power of appointment. In order, he presumed, that all other applications may share the same fate. He was unable to perceive any other reason for introducing that topic; for he supposed that the taking away the power of appointment would not procure the office which the gentleman had been so anxious to obtain. For one, he was unwilling to come to any decision upon that topic of accusation, or to discuss the argument that had been drawn from it, until he had heard the explanation of the head of the department. If the Secretary of the Navy was not able to assign a sufficient reason for disappointing the wishes of the gentleman from Ohio, that would afford a proper ground of censure against that officer. He would do nothing which would imply that the House had hearkened to such an accusation, until an opportunity had been given to the Secretary for making his defence. He did not stand here for the purpose of defending the head of the Navy Department against the charge of the gentleman from Ohio; but it must strike every fair and candid mind as extremely unjust to act upon such a charge, or upon any argument that might be drawn from it, without first allowing the head of the Navy Department to explain the conduct which had been made the ground of exception. He was particularly anxious to hear what the Secretary of the Navy has to say in answer to the charge made against him by the gentleman from Ohio, for he had been greatly surprised by such an incul-pation. So far as his knowledge of the course of proceeding in that department went, it had always been glad to receive applications for the appointments in question from the States in the interior. There was always a great abundance of such applications from the Atlantic States; but, upon the rules by which these appointments had been distributed, it had been generally found difficult to find suitable candidates who were willing to receive them from the States in the interior of the country. In addition to his wish to hear the vindication of the Secretary from the censure of the gentleman from Ohio, before he received this charge as the basis of action in the House, he had another reason for opposing the amendment. He was not satisfied that the limitation to the Executive power, proposed in this instance, would be useful. He would not say but a proposition of this nature might not be put in such a shape that he should vote for it; but he would say that he could not give it his support in the absence of all information as to its expediency and its consequences. Several gentlemen who had advocated this amendment, had expressly disavowed any intention of reflecting censure upon the head of the Navy Department; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] could not make this disavowal. That gentleman had stated on this floor a distinct charge against the Secretary of the Navy, and through that officer, whose official conduct was under the control of the President, had cast an implied censure upon the head of the Government. He would not undertake to say that the censure was not well founded, for he was not acquainted with the facts. But if the amendment should be adopted upon the arguments drawn from such a charge, the House would adopt the censure upon the Executive, implied by the charge. Before he was willing to give his vote in affirmance of this censure, he should choose to hear what the other party had to say in his defence.

Mr. VANCE said he had not censured the head of the Navy Department, nor would he disavow the intention of censuring that officer. He had barely stated the facts, and the Secretary could construe them as he thought proper. He presumed that officer had good reasons for refusing to give a midshipman's warrant to a candidate from Ohio in compliance with the recommendation of the united delegation from that State. Whether this fact implied censure or not, he should not undertake to state; but it was true.

Mr. HOWARD had been able to understand the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] but very indistinctly. He understood him as complaining that the State of Ohio had been denied her proportion of the appointments of midshipmen. He was not the apologist of the Secretary of the Navy: that officer was undoubtedly able to defend his own conduct. Within a few minutes he had looked a little into what might be called the statistics of the subject, and was satisfied that the State of Ohio had received her full share of the appointment of midshipmen. He held in his hand the navy register, by which it appeared that within two years there had been one hundred and twenty midshipmen appointed. He had not been able to go further back in the short period during which he had turned his attention to the subject. According to the representation of Ohio on this floor, which has been the usual ratio of distribution, that State would be entitled to receive of these appointments, made within two years, eight and a small fraction. Now, it appears by the register that within two years seven midshipmen had been actually appointed from the State of Ohio. What had become of the eighth he was not able to say, but he presumed, if opportunity had been given to have traced these appointments further back, it would appear that this one was accounted for by a previous appointment. Mr. H. then went into some general remarks as to the impropriety of restricting the appointment by the proposed amendment, which were very indistinctly heard. He was understood to say that probably the principal reason why so many appointments had been made in 1831 and 1832, compared with 1830, was, that during the two last years ninety-four midshipmen had passed examination, leaving vacancies in the lower class to be filled up. He regarded it as altogether improper to adopt the proposed amendment without having information upon the subject.

The Enforcement Bill.

Mr. VANCE said the State of Ohio was entitled to thirteen midshipmen instead of eight, according to the calculation of the gentleman from Maryland, whose State had a great many more than Ohio in proportion to her population: without reckoning the District of Columbia, Maryland had nearly two to one at the present time.

Mr. HOFFMAN would barely suggest, that besides the disproportionate increase of the population of the Western States compared with those on the Atlantic, which would probably account for the principal differences in their present respective shares of these officers, there was another cause which had probably operated in a greater or less degree. Officers of the navy who had resided in the West at the time of their original appointment, would naturally remove and establish their families on the seaboard. It would be a great hardship upon those brave and meritorious men to exclude their children from all participation in these appointments; which, from their early habits and associations, they were so peculiarly calculated to fill to advantage. Possibly some share of the inequality of distribution, which had occasionally been the subject of complaint, had arisen from this source.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said the discussion upon this bill appeared to enlarge as it proceeded; he felt compelled to move that it be postponed to Monday.

Mr. BRANCH said, rather than the bill should be postponed; he would vote against the amendment. He wished to make a single remark in explanation of his former statement.

The SPEAKER said the question before the House was upon the postponement of the bill. Any remarks upon the amendment were not in order.

Mr. THOMPSON withdrew the motion.

Mr. BRANCH only wished to remark, in support of his statement, that the Secretary of the Navy would not regard this amendment as an imputation upon his course; but, on the other hand, was in favor of a resolution upon the number of midshipmen: that, at the last session, a bill had been prepared under the sanction and with the express approbation of that officer for the organization of the navy, in which it was proposed to limit the number of midshipmen to four hundred. He felt it proper to make this statement after the observations which had been made as to the censure which the amendment might imply upon the Secretary of the Navy; which was most distant from his intention in giving it his support.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, which was lost: Yeas 88, nays 102.

Mr. WATMOUGH again pressed his amendment, providing to fill up the two vacancies which had occurred in the number of post captains, but without success.

The remaining amendments reported by the committee were then concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

THE ENFORCEMENT BILL.

A resolution moved yesterday by Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, for the printing of 25,000 extra copies of the report from the Judiciary Committee, accompanying the bill reported by them for enforcing the revenue laws, coming up for consideration,

Mr. BELL (chairman of the Judiciary Committee) expressed his regret that he felt it his duty to oppose the motion. The House had not yet had an opportunity of expressing its sentiments on the subject treated of in the report, because no decision had yet been had as to an important measure recommended in the report. If, in the meanwhile, the House should order the printing of so large an extra number of copies of the report, such an act would be considered by the public as partly the sanction of the House in the positions taken by the report. Under this view, he should close his remarks, by moving to lay the resolution on the table until the House should have acted on the bill now before it: after that time, he should have no objection to the measure, because, then, the House would be in circumstances to give a fair expression of opinion.

Mr. BELL then moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said that he was perfectly indifferent how this question should go, but he had risen to express his surprise at the reason advanced by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] for opposing the resolution. Did the House sanction the doctrines contained in every paper it might order to be printed? He remembered that, at the last session, a report from the Indian Committee (to which that gentleman had belonged) had been made, and an extra number of copies of it ordered to be printed, although the report had very few advocates on that floor. The only object of passing such orders, was to give the public information. Twenty-five thousand copies of the President's proclamation had been printed by order of the House, yet every body knew that many members of this House were far from approving of every thing contained in it. So an extra number of the message had been printed. Was that giving the sanction of the House to the doctrines of that paper? Mr. F. protested against all such construction.

Mr. DANIEL said that the argument and the reasons of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. BELL,] were the most extraordinary he had ever heard: and he presumed that no gentleman, in future, would urge the same against the printing of any paper whatever. Mr. D. had voted to print an extra number of the late proclamation, though he did not, he was sure, approve a single principle contained in it from beginning to end. There was another reason, however, which probably operated much more strongly on the gentleman.

If this document should be published, as proposed, it might receive the approbation of the people of the United States, who had the right to decide upon its merits. He desired the people might see this report. They were the proper judges whether the document was on the proper democratic principles or not. Why was the gentleman so very tenacious? Mr. D. was not one of those who held the doctrine that the sovereignty of the United States resided in Congress, the President, and the Judiciary. That House had a master. The people, and the people alone, were the sovereigns. Such an objection came with a very bad grace from a gentleman who had voted to print 25,000 copies of the President's message. Did the gentleman approve of all the sentiments in that document? If he did, Mr. D. did not.

Mr. ARNOLD, of Tennessee, said that the gentleman from Kentucky had observed that many gentlemen who had voted an extra number of copies of the President's message now opposed the printing of this report. Now he believed he could satisfy gentlemen, yes, even the gentleman from Kentucky himself, (who was designated by many as "a whole hog" nullifier,) that there was no need of printing so many copies of this report. The gentleman had very gravely reminded the House that 25,000 copies had been printed, both of the proclamation and the message; but the gentleman had taken care to forget to tell the House that 25,000 copies had been printed of that primer of nullification which he held in his hand. The document contained 41 pages of what might be called Union documents, and 71 pages of what were clearly nullification documents.

Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky was not satisfied that 71 pages of nullification were too light to weigh down 41 pages of Union, it was making a confession which certainly had not been expected. The House was now called upon to print 25,000 copies of this thing, (holding up the report)—and for what purpose? Did the nullifiers expect that this production would have more effect than the report of a committee of twenty-one of the South Carolina Legislature? than the nullifying ordinance? than the address of the people of South Carolina? and all the other matters and things of the same kind in that book, which contained the very muscle and blood (if there was any) of nullification—papers drawn up by the master spirits of the nullifiers, and embodying all their high soul, and all their mighty talents? Mr. A. had voted to send out the messages of Governor Hamilton and Governor Hayne to the South Carolina Legislature; and were not these nullification? Would the gentleman get up and tell that House that this petty farthing rushlight must be sent out in pursuit of such documents as he had named? Mr. A. had voted for all this body of matters nullificatory; and was it inconsistent that he should refuse to vote to print this tail of the animal? He objected to it mainly on the ground of the expense. He could have no objection to its going to the people. The more they saw of it, the more they would loathe it; the more heartily they would depise, the more decidedly they would reprobate it. But he did not, knowing this, want to saddle them with the expense of printing it. The only reason for which the motion could have been made was, that this document was to eclipse the President. But really, in the light of all the nullifying documents he held in his hand, he doubted whether it could be seen. He should as soon think of bringing a glowworm beside a patent lamp; of holding up a candle to the sun.

Mr. ELLSWORTH observed that it ought not to be forgotten that this report would go forth without the sanction of a majority of the committee in its favor. It ought to be understood that, in fact, it had the opinions of but two of the members of the Judiciary Committee in its favor. Mr. E. was not now referring to what had passed in the committee; he knew it was not in order to refer to that; he referred to what had passed on that floor, in the face of the House. The minority of the committee had freely expressed their disapprobation of the bill; and two of the remaining members had said that it did not meet their views, and that they had reserved themselves in consenting to having it reported, that they should not thereby be committed to vote for it; so that it was not fully approved of by more than two of the committee, [Mr. DANIEL and Mr. COULTER.] The report was therefore in support of a bill which did not even unite a majority of the very committee that reported it. Mr. E. moved to lay the resolution for printing upon the table; but consented to withdraw the motion, at the request of

Mr. STEWART, who said that he had voted to print the nullifying documents, for the reasons already stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ANNOLD,] but he should vote against the present proposition, because it would be received, should it prevail, as an expression of the sentiments of the House in favor of nullification, whereas he did not believe there were ten gentlemen on that floor who, should the distinct question be put on sanctioning those doctrines, as professed by South Carolina, would record their names in favor of them. He ventured this opinion, there, in his place; and if gentlemen doubted its correctness, let them test it by yeas and nays: he doubted if more than six members could be found who would vote ay. Now, this report did, virtually, contain the doctrine of nullification. He would read a clause to show this.

[Here Mr. S. was called to order by Mr. BELL; but the CHAIR decided that the motion to print opened the whole subject.]

Mr. S. then read the following clause:

Was not this nullification, in all its length and breadth? If not, what was it? A State was to be the judge of the law, and if she determined to resist it, that was to be taken as evidence of its injustice, and so the Government was bound further to modify the law! i. e. to knuckle and submit. Mr. S. never would vote to sanction in any way such doctrine as this. Moreover, the report declared that the President had recommended the House to pass a law authorizing him to exercise unconstitutional powers: i. e. the President had advised Congress to violate the constitution. This he denied. The President had done no such thing; and Mr. S. would not send out any such assertion. And further, the report declared that the proper remedy for nullification was to repeal the tariff: to pass the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. S. was against this, and therefore against the resolution in toto. He demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. COULTER said that it was a matter of perfect indifference to him whether the resolution should or should not be adopted. Indeed, so far as his own views and feelings were concerned, he had rather it had not been introduced. The report (such as it was) was within so convenient a compass that it could reach, through the papers, the public ear, and the public mind. If that public should approve of the doctrines it contained, if they should give the report their sanction, then no matter what might be the jibes and jeers to which it might be exposed within these walls, the public voice would give it a weight and a force that would make it tell. But if the public should not approve it, then no sanction which that House could affix to the paper, could give it the smallest effect: nor could the high thoughts any gentleman might entertain with regard to the importance of his own opinion, give it the least value. On account, however, of what had been said in relation to this document, Mr. C. would ask leave to trouble the House with some few observations.

The members of the Judiciary Committee, placed as they were upon that committee, not by their own choice, but by the disposition of the presiding officer of the House, found themselves charged with duties of great magnitude and very high responsibility. To the task required from them they had brought all the talent they could; they had given the subject all the consideration which their time allowed; and they had exercised their best judgment in deciding upon the manner of its discharge. The result was before the House. The committee might regret that they had not brought to the duty more wisdom, (for the country had reached a crisis which demanded all the wisdom it could call to its aid,) more knowledge, and greater aptitude to make their report more acceptable to the House than it appeared to be: but they had obeyed the best dictates of their judgment; and the report they had submitted to the House ought to have received the language of courtesy, or at least of decency, from members on that floor. Gentlemen standing safe in the Senate House, might utter what contained neither argument, wit, nor even common sense: but such egotations, such epithets, would not be regarded by others, though they might be regarded as of primary importance by those who had uttered them. Mr. C. could not forget that in the French Assembly, during the more furious periods of the revolution, any member who brought forward a proposition tending to peace, and calculated to tranquillize the public mind or reconcile conflicting opinions, did it at much hazard; the hazard, at first, of abusive language from bullies and braggadocios, until at length the danger was augmented by the appearance of drawn daggers in the hall of legislation, and it became common, because it was indispensable, that members should keep daggers in the desks where they sat.

Mr. C. said that the humble duty devolved upon him should be discharged in defiance of the vulgarisms that might be uttered in that hall, or of any other menaces that might be resorted to.

Now, as to the doctrine contained in the report, so far as it had been attacked by any thing like argument, he should treat the objections to it with all respect. The arguments of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. AARON,] he thought, had been already answered. No gentleman would be committed by voting for the resolution to print. The practice of the House had abundantly established the contrary. The House was constantly in the habit of printing reports on all subjects, and on all sides of every subject, provided the language in which they were contained was decent and respectful. The object of this was to inform the public of what their representatives were doing.

But his colleague [Mr. STEWART] had told the House that this paper contained the principles of nullification; the very essence of nullification. Mr. C. was not to be deterred from any course he deemed right by a mere name. He was aware that with some minds names were things; but it was not so with him: he looked at the substance of a measure, and was not to be driven from it by the circumstance that this man or that man called it "nullification." He should neither adopt nor forsake any course of action because it should be called "nullification," "National Republicanism," or "Jacksonism." But what was the point of the objection? The committee had given it as their opinion, that when a law was so oppressive in its effects that a great section of the country was resolved to resist it at all hazards, such a fact was evidence to a prudent Government that the measure was a mistaken one, and that, instead of enforcing, they ought to modify it. Mr. C. considered this as a just sentiment. It was an opinion that had been adopted by very great men—the light of whose minds would, he trusted, shine upon the darkness of our present prospects, and cheer the impending gloom.

He would recall the recollection of the House to a former crisis in the history of this country. He referred to the times of the embargo law. That law had been very obnoxious to a great part of the population of this country; so much so, that it had been found impossible to carry the law into execution. The juries of the country, yes, the juries, (who were the ultimate legislators under our system,) refused to execute the law. We had then at the head of the Government a man who possessed as much civil greatness and statesmanlike power of mind as the individual who now occupied the Executive chair, (from whose merits Mr. C. had no purpose to derogate,) and what had been the result? On representations being made to him, on which he could rely, that the law was very obnoxious to a large part of the country, had he declared that it would be unwise to repeal it? Had he declared that it must be enforced? No. Like a true patriot, and a wise statesman, he had recommended to Congress that the law be repealed. The action stood applauded, and would so stand forever on the page of our history. Yet, for this sentiment, the Judiciary Committee had been censured and condemned by the enlightened and sagacious mind of his colleague. When that law had been repealed, a gentleman distinguished for virtue, for talent, for consistency, and, indeed, for every other quality that added dignity to the character of a legislator, (he referred to Mr. Bayard, of Delaware,) had advocated the repeal, and, in doing so, had advanced the very same sentiment expressed in the report, and had adorned it by all the beauty and richness of his own magnificent mind. And what was the sentiment? That when a large section of the country believed that a law was grinding them to the dust, and had remonstrated for years and years, both in their primary assemblies and in their Legislature, if the Government should refuse to hearken to their voice, so long, so loudly, so deeply uttered, then ours was no longer a Government of opinion, but was at once assimilated to the despotisms of the old world; it became, in fact, the same sort of Government as was exercised by Russia over Poland, or by England over Ireland. Gentlemen were for exercising, on the part of the United States, a Government like this, over a free and sovereign State which had been remonstrating for years against an oppressive and intolerable law. He did not care whether the resistance of such a State should be called nullification, secession, treason, or rebellion. Rebellion was with him a sacred word. When rebellion was put down, in the overthrow often perished honor, talent, virtue, patriotism, liberty itself.

The sentiment in the report was uttered modestly. Mr. C. was willing to take the responsibility of uttering it. He did not set up to be a great man. His course in that House had, he trusted, evinced no lofty pretensions. He was not to be deterred from the discharge of his duty by hard names. He was willing to take the responsibility which belonged to his station; and for his conduct in it, he was prepared to answer to his constituents, to his country, to his own conscience, and, he did not consider the appeal too serious to add—to his God.

Mr. CAMBRELENG regretted that any opposition had been made to the printing of the report. He should vote for any printing which might be deemed important by gentlemen on either side. He now moved the orders of the day.

Mr. BELL said that, if the gentleman would withdraw his motion, he would withdraw his opposition to the resolution.

Mr. CAMBRELENG having complied,

Mr. BELL resumed, and said that he had not intended to convey the sentiments attributed to him. He should think he had some reason to complain of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FOSTER,] did he not believe that the gentleman had misapprehended the bearing of his remarks. [Mr. B. here repeated what he had said.] The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] had imputed to him a fear that the report should be seen by the people. Such an imputation was highly unjust. The report had already found its way to the public; but if, at this stage of the matter, the House should order so large an extra number printed, it would convey an erroneous impression. The gentleman from Pennsylvania last up [Mr. COVETON] seemed to consider the report as merely opposing violent proceedings recommended to the House by the President. That was one reason why leave should first be allowed for an expression of sentiment on that subject. Many might think the proceeding not violent at all—it could not be long before the subject would be before the House, and when a direct expression of sentiment could be given: Mr. B. would then be in favor of printing any number of copies gentlemen might wish: he should not, however, oppose the resolution, and he hoped the question would be taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, moved the orders of the day, and

The Tariff Bill.—The Enforcement Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The bill to remit a fine to the heirs of Matthew Lyon came up as the unfinished business.

Mr. DRAPER having delivered his sentiments in opposition to the bill,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. DRAYTON, who moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till Friday next.

The motion was opposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, and negatived.

Mr. DRAYTON then commenced a speech in opposition to the bill, and had proceeded a short time, when

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON observed that the hour of one had arrived.

Whereupon the House passed to the consideration of the tariff bill.

[At a subsequent period of the day, the House resumed the bill to refund M. Lyon's fine; and after it had been discussed by Messrs. DRAYTON, CRAIG, R. M. JOHNSON, HAWES, PEARCE, CLAYTON, MITCHELL, and SUTHERLAND, it was ordered to its third reading: Yeas 77, nays 63.]

The House having taken up

THE TARIFF BILL,

On motion of Mr. H. EVERETT, the words "made of combed wool" were inserted after "yarn," in that part of the bill respecting woollens.

Mr. DEARBORN now rose, and said that, after a laborious discussion of five weeks, it had become evident that the bill could not be put into any shape that would adapt it to the wishes of a majority of the House: and he therefore moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HOFFMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. POLK moved a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the House having been called, it appeared that 12 members were absent.

The call was then suspended, and the question taken on laying the bill upon the table, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 84, nays 115.

So the House refused to lay the tariff bill upon the table.

Mr. DRAYTON observed that it must be obvious that the present bill, with all its numerous amendments, could not be gotten through with in time to go to the Senate, and he therefore moved that it be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill continuing the act of 1832 in force until the 2d March, 1834, and then to reduce the duties one-third.

Mr. DRAYTON briefly explained, and supported his motion as going to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, and at the same time injuring as little as possible the interests of the manufacturer.

Mr. CRAIG supported the motion.

Mr. WICKLIFFE offered an amendment to it, instructing the committee to report a bill continuing the bill of 1832 to the 2d of March, 1834, and thereafter reducing the duties in such manner that, by the year 1840, they should have reached 20 per cent., the reduction to be equally distributed through the intervening years.

Mr. IRVIN moved to amend Mr. DRAYTON's resolution before it should be stricken out, so as to reduce the duties, after 1834, 10 per cent. annually, until the revenue should be reduced to the wants of the Government.

Mr. WAYNE, after some introductory remarks as to the necessity of further consultation, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. WARDWELL gave notice that he should move an amendment, reducing the duties 5 per cent. annually, until they reached 20 per cent.

Mr. WAYNE's motion prevailed, and the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

THE ENFORCEMENT BILL.

The resolution offered by Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, as modified, for the printing of 25,000 extra copies of the report from the Judiciary Committee, accompanying a bill "more effectually providing for the execution of the revenue laws in certain cases, and for other purposes," coming up for consideration,

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said that his only object, in again addressing the House on this motion, was to reply to some remarks which had been made by several gentlemen who had taken a part in the discussion yesterday. He repeated his perfect indifference at the fate of the pending motion. Whether the additional number of the report of the Judiciary Committee were ordered, as proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOULDIN,] or not, was a matter of no concern with him. But the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] complained yesterday at the aspect which he [Mr. F.] had given to his [Mr. B.'s] argument. Mr. F. certainly regretted any misunderstanding. He understood the gentleman from Tennessee to oppose the motion to print, on the ground that, if the House adopted the motion, it would be giving its sanction to the principles embraced in the report. The gentleman explains, and says he only argued that the effect of acceding to this proposition might be to create the impression on the public mind that the House acquiesces in the views and principles which the report contains. Mr. F. accepted the explanation, but still regarded the argument as extraordinary. He had not supposed that it had ever occurred to any man, either in the House or out of it, that the order of the House to print a document, pledged, in the slightest degree, those who voted for the printing, for the correctness or support of its doctrines. We are every day receiving petitions, resolutions, and remonstrances, of various kinds, which were almost uniformly ordered to be printed; yet, did gentlemen consider themselves as having thus sanctioned whatever was set forth in these papers?

Mr. F. had yesterday referred to the able and interesting report made three years ago, (and not last year, as erroneously reported in a morning paper,) by the Hon. gentleman from Tennessee, when at the head of the Committee on Indian Affairs. On a motion to print 10,000 copies of it, some opposition was made, but the motion was carried by two to one. And yet when the bill, carrying out the principles of the report, came up for consideration, it was passed by a bare majority; many members who voted for the printing, voted against the bill.

But, Mr. F. said, there had been several reports made at the last session, and the printing of a very large number of copies ordered without opposition; and yet it did not appear afterwards that the principles embraced in them received the sanction of the House. He instanced the report of the Hon. gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] from the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of the tariff. Had the views and recommendations of that report been adopted and carried out by the House, the agitations of the South had long since been quieted. But they were denounced and repudiated in unmeasured terms. At a subsequent period of the session a report was made from the Committee on Manufactures, by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and on a proposition to print 10,000 copies, not a voice was raised against it. Surely the gentleman from Tennessee did not consider his acquiescence in that proposition as authorizing the presumption that he would support its doctrines; and if the tariff gentlemen flattered themselves that they had thus obtained a pledge, they must have been greatly disappointed at the gentleman's subsequent eloquent and powerful speech against their favorite system. So much, then, for the reasoning of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. F. had a word or two to say to the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, one of his associates on the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. ELLSWORTH.] That gentleman had yesterday attempted, as he had heretofore done elsewhere as well as here, to taunt the majority of the committee with the differences of opinion which existed among them, as regards the bill which had been reported. He affects to doubt whether the report contains the opinions of a majority of the committee, because, he says, a majority of the committee are not in favor of the bill. Mr. F. here repeated what he had stated to the House when the bill was reported, that such was the contrariety of opinion among the members of the committee as to the details of a law to meet the emergency, it was difficult to frame one that would receive the sanction of a majority. The bill reported approximated more nearly to it than any which had been proposed; but, Mr. F. had, both in committee and in the House, reserved to himself the right to propose amendments, and even to vote against it, if it were not amended to suit his views. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GORDON,] while assenting to the report of the bill, had especially protested against that assent being construed into a pledge to vote for any bill on the subject. But, said Mr. F., the report is not made to sustain the provisions of the bill, but to show the reasons why the committee could not adopt the recommendations of the President. In this respect, the gentleman from Connecticut well knew, and in all fairness should have stated, that the majority were entirely agreed. There was not the slightest dissent on the part of any of them from either the principles or reasoning contained in the report. The majority had treated their associates who did not concur with them, with the utmost respect; and whilst they did not ask any unusual courtesy from them, they had a right to expect common justice. Mr. F. repeated, however, that the majority were not to be affected by the taunts and insinuations which had been thrown out, and he had hoped that the gentleman from Connecticut would have been satisfied with his previous experiment, and with the notice which he had then received, and that he would not have again attempted the same game here.

But the printing of this report is resisted, continued Mr. F., on the ground that it contains "the very essence of nullification." That the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEWART] should have made this discovery, was a matter of no surprise. He is so sensitive and suspicious with regard to his favorite hobby, the tariff, that his imagination easily converts any and every thing like opposition to it, into this monster, nullification, of which he expresses so much horror. But Mr. F. confessed his utter surprise to hear other gentlemen around him expressing a similar opinion. He could say for himself, in perfect candor, and he hazarded nothing in making a similar declaration for the other gentlemen with whom he acted on this occasion, that when the report was drafted and concurred in, so far from intending to support or justify the doctrine which is so offensive to some gentlemen, and which has produced so much excitement, it was not for a moment conceived that the most minute scrutiny, not even the eye of an Argus, could detect in any clause of the report any expression which could be tortured into such support or justification. Mr. F. here read the sentence which had been so strongly, and, he might add, strangely, objected to, as follows:

"When, therefore, a law is made by the Government so oppressive and destructive to the interests of the people of one of these States as to determine them to resist it at every hazard, it is evidence of the justice of their complaints, which should not be disregarded; and it is the bounden duty of the Legislature, instead of devising rigorous means to enforce it, to modify the obnoxious law."

This, then, is the clause which has given so much offence; and instead of urging any argument or explanation of his own, Mr. F. would beg leave to refer to the speech to which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COULTER] yesterday adverted, which was delivered many years ago by the late lamented Mr. Bayard, the proud boast of the old federal party, and one of the purest patriots, as well as one of the brightest ornaments of the day in which he lived. This speech was made in favor of a repeal of the embargo laws, and from it Mr. F. read the following extract:

"We all know that the opposition to the embargo in the Eastern States is not the opposition of a political party, or of a few discontented men, but the resistance of the people to a measure which they feel as oppressive and ruinous. The people of this country are not to be governed by force, but by affection and confidence. It is for them we legislate; and if they do not like our laws, it is our duty to repeal them. It is madness to talk of forcing submission, when there is general dissatisfaction." Here, said Mr. F., are the very sentiments contained in the report, only, as Marlow says in the play, "infinitely better expressed;" and so appropriate were they to the present crisis, that, had this speech met the eye of the committee before the report had been drafted, they would no doubt have adopted this extract instead of their own language. Mr. F. hoped, therefore, that while gentlemen were so anxiously endeavoring to fix the broad brand of nullification on the majority of the Judiciary Committee, they would remember to what peril they were exposing the fame and memory of the eminent and distinguished statesman to whom he had just alluded.

As to the principles of the report, Mr. F. said he should not now go into a defence of them. At a proper time, should it become necessary, he might do so, and felt no fears but that he should be able to sustain them. For the present he would only say that, as one of the majority of the committee, he was perfectly content to bear any responsibility which the report might involve. That responsibility he would meet before his constituents, to whom alone he acknowledged himself accountable for his conduct here.

Mr. STEWART said that, when he had addressed the House yesterday, he had had no opportunity to examine the report, having, but a few moments before, cast his eyes upon it. He knew not at that time who was the author of the report, nor did he know that it met the approbation of his worthy colleague, [Mr. COULTER;] nor had he been aware of the fact, that the bill had the approbation of only two members of the committee, who reported it, viz. the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DANIEL,] and his colleague, [Mr. COULTER.]

[Here Mr. ELLSWORTH interposed, and explained. In what he had said yesterday, he had not asserted that the four members of the committee who had presented the bill and report to the House, did not agree to the report, but that only two fully approved of the bill.]

Mr. DANIEL said that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. ELLSWORTH] had been mistaken as to what Mr. D. had said. All the committee approved of the bill, with the exception of three or four, [the committee contains seven members,] but some thought that it did not go far enough.]

Mr. STEWART resumed. He was very sorry, on looking into the report, to learn that his colleague [Mr. COULTER] gave it his entire approbation. A revision of this document had only confirmed the impression he had before expressed, that it contained the essence of nullification, the essence of anti-tariffism, and the very quintessence of anti-Jacksonism. If the language of that report was true, the President had not only recommended to Congress to violate the constitution, but had himself violated it. [Here Mr. S. quoted the report.] Now, if it was unconstitutional even to recommend that the location of the custom-house in Charleston should be changed, then had the President himself actually violated the constitution, for the custom-house had been removed, and, upon their own principles, the committee, instead of a bill, should have reported an impeachment; but he entirely dissented from the doctrine of the report.

Mr. McDUFFIE here interposed, and inquired of Mr. STEWART whether he was authorized by the President of the United States to say that the custom-house at Charleston had been removed.

Mr. STEWART replied that he was not. He made the statement merely from what he read in the newspapers, and it had not been contradicted.

With regard to his course in that House, he was as responsible as his colleague, both there and elsewhere. His colleague seemed to think that he attached too much importance to names. Now Mr. S. was utterly ignorant upon what evidence his colleague had made this assertion. Mr. S. was unconscious of ever having followed names: he had followed principles, and principles only. The gentleman knew that nearly three-fourths of the people of Mr. S.'s district were in favor of an individual whom Mr. S. had never supported. General Jackson had received, at the last election, a majority in his district of 2,600 votes. The gentleman, he hoped, would not charge him with being at home a Jackson-man, and here an opponent of Jackson. He was at home what he was here. He would support General Jackson's measures (as he did this) when he thought them right, and oppose them when he thought them wrong. He entertained great respect for the character and talents of his colleague: he made no pretension to the same sagacity, or to as enlightened a mind as that gentleman possessed, but he would not submit to have it imputed to him that he attached too much importance to names. His course in the House, and out of it, was his most effectual vindication from such a charge. He was governed by measures, and measures only.

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, said he did not approve of all the matters contained in the report, but he was nevertheless in favor of the resolution to print, because he thought it proper, at all times, to give the people information, especially on a great subject like this. It was their right to be informed. Mr. C.'s constituents ought to have an opportunity of revising the errors he might commit, and of putting, if they thought proper, another in his place.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, referring to the preciousness of the time of the House, moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded: Yeas 59.

The previous question was then put and carried; and the main question, on adopting the resolution, was agreed to: Yeas 74.

So the House ordered the printing of 25,000 copies of the bill and report.

FLORIDA CLAIMS.

A bill for the relief of certain inhabitants of East Florida coming up, as reported from a Committee of the Whole, with an amendment, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill,

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, observed that the bill had been defeated in committee by a majority of four or five votes, owing to erroneous representations, and to the committee's being unacquainted with the facts of the case—the chairman of the committee which had reported the bill not having been permitted to go into the explanations which were necessary. As he had no wish to detain the House at this time, by going into a discussion of the bill, he would move that the House do not concur in the report of the committee, (recommending that the enacting clause be stricken out,) and, if this motion should prevail, he would immediately follow it up by a motion to lay the bill upon the table. This would lay the whole subject over till next session: but, if this course should be refused, he must then, however reluctantly, enter into a full explanation of the facts on which the claims of his constituents were founded.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he thought he could suggest a better course. He was opposed to having the House refuse its concurrence to the committee's report, because, when the bill should come up hereafter, that fact would be pleaded with great effect in favor of the bill. He did not wish to have a decision on it at this moment; and, as a middle course, he would therefore move to recommit the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR was about to explain in reply to the remark of Mr. WHITE, that the bill had been defeated in committee by indirect means; when

Mr. WHITE interposed, and assured the gentleman that his allusion had not been directed to him. The bill had been defeated, as Mr. W. had afterwards learned, owing to the statements of individuals behind him, insidiously made while he was addressing the Committee of the Whole House, and insinuating that the claims provided for in this bill had been twice paid already.

Mr. WICKLIFFE here rose, and said—That remark refers to me: and if the Delegate from Florida means to say that I made any representations in reference to this bill, other than such as I was warranted to make, I say that he misrepresents me. It is true that I did ask the gentleman who negotiated the treaty of 1819, [Mr. ADAMS,] whether any such claim as that now to be satisfied had been adjusted, and that gentleman said that no such thing had been thought of. The Delegate had then stated that the claims settled by that treaty were those which arose in West, and not in East Florida.

Mr. WHITE said that it had been stated to him, by a gentleman who had voted against the bill, that he had been told, on the authority of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that the claims in the bill had been twice paid already. Mr. W. had then inquired of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he had said this, and the gentleman had replied that he had not. Mr. W. was then told that it had been the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] who had said that the claims had been twice paid. There was not the slightest shade of truth in the assertion. The gentleman from Massachusetts had referred to the claim of the Kemper's, in another province.

Mr. ADAMS said that it was very true that he had said to the gentleman from Kentucky that he thought that these claims had been twice paid; and he had said so, understanding this to be the same claim as had formerly been urged upon Congress by an individual by the name of Kemper, who appeared here as the agent of individuals in East or West Florida, and he did not remember which. But the gentleman from Florida had since assured him that the claims in this bill were wholly distinct from that which Kemper had urged. Kemper's claim was founded on something like an insurrection in one of the Floridas, which the United States was charged by Spain with having improperly countenanced, inasmuch that a General Mathews and certain troops of the United States had there been engaged in some military operations, from which the claimants had suffered, as they alleged, great loss and injury. Mr. A. had said that, in the treaty of 1819, no claims, under the operations of any army of the United States, previous to what was usually known by the name of the Seminole war, were provided for.

Mr. MARDIS said he presumed he was one of the individuals referred to by the gentleman from Florida, as having been engaged in an "insidious" course in relation to this bill. Mr. M. had been asked by Mr. W. why he had voted against the bill; and had replied that it was because he had understood that the claims had been twice paid already. On being pressed as to who had given him such information, he had stated (as he supposed himself warranted to do, the communication not having been made to him under any seal of confidence or secrecy) that it was the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE.]

Mr. ARCHER said that the bill before the House did not contemplate any claims in West Florida: it was to these only that the gentleman from Massachusetts referred; but these claims had not been paid twice, or once; they had never been paid; and satisfactory evidence of their justness had been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. [Mr. A. is the chairman of that committee.] The claims did not arise under the treaty of 1819, but rested on other grounds.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said he must claim the indulgence of the House to make a short explanation in answer to the statements of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] It now appears, said Mr. W., that this bill was lost in the Committee of the Whole, by the misapprehension of that gentleman, and the publicity given to it by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE.] He stated, upon the highly respectable authority of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that these claims had been paid, and this passed around this hall by a sort of under-current, which is generally more injurious than open argument. I acquit the gentleman of any misrepresentation; and yet this is a remedy discovered after the patient is dead. The gentleman would have done those claimants more justice by stating from his place what he had to say, where it could have been met and refuted, as I am now ready to expose it. I now say, sir, that any statement, from any quarter, that these claims have ever been paid by Spain, or the United States, is entirely destitute of any foundation in fact. They never have been paid, and I am ready to prove it by documents I hold in my hands.

The insurrection of Kemper, in West Florida, was in that district of country claimed to have been ceded to Spain, by the treaty of San Ildefonso to France, and by France to the United States in the treaty of 1803, which cession was denied by both France and Spain. The United States stimulated that insurrection, and took possession of the country avowedly to suppress it. The Kempers were paid. This was an invasion of East Florida at a time of profound peace, at a moment when the King of Spain was in duress. It was an invasion which the gentleman may well say was in pursuance of some secret policy of the Government. It is a part of our history, on which no American who cherishes with pride the honor of his country, can recur to with pleasure or satisfaction; and it is better not to remember much of it. This was an invasion of the province of an ally, and the military occupation of the province of a friendly Power for eighteen months, to the great injury of the inhabitants of the province. These people have been transferred to us, with a solemn assurance that their losses were to be indemnified. We are now told that this treaty was intended to indemnify the Spanish inhabitants for General Jackson's invasion. Sir, I have a great respect for the opinions of the gentleman from Massachusetts; I know he states what he believes, and is incapable of stating any thing else.

I hold myself ready to prove by the documents, the correspondence, the treaty, and protocol of conference, that these claims were embraced by the treaty; and I will prove, under the hand of the gentleman himself—[Mr. W. was proceeding to read from the treaty, when the

SPEAKER reminded him that, on a motion to recommit, it was out of order.]

Mr. W. said he was in favor of recommitment to the Committee of the Whole, that he might do justice to these much injured people. It is apparent that the first section of this bill was stricken out by a lean vote, under a misapprehension. The House owes it to itself to place it in the same situation, that justice may be done. The Committee on Foreign Affairs ought to be heard, and I intend myself to be heard in vindication of its provisions.

Mr. THOMAS, of Louisiana, said that he knew all about the claim of the Kempers. There were several of them, and they had got into a fight about their claims to a certain tract of land in what was then West Florida. In consequence, a number of men were raised, and Mr. T. was the officer who had commanded them. They had taken a fort from the Spanish authorities, and established themselves in it. They were, in fact, a third power. They had had a convention, and had legislated under its authority, and so the United States had found them when it got possession of the province. They had delivered up the fort to the United States officers.

The question being now put, the bill was recommitted.

THE TARIFF LAW OF 1832.

The bill explaining the 18th section of the tariff law of 1832, coming up as the unfinished business of yesterday morning,

Mr. DAVIS, of Mass., said this was a measure of considerable importance, as he would attempt to show, and ought to be acted upon definitively, without further delay. He would, in what he had to say, endeavor not to repeat what had been urged by the gentleman from New York on his right, [Mr. CAMBRELENG], and would correct the erroneous, very erroneous reasoning of the gentleman from the same State, on his left, [Mr. HOFFMAN.] In July, 1832, Congress passed a law making material reductions in the revenue, by reducing the duties on many articles of merchandise, and by authorizing the importation of others free of duty. The 18th section was inserted in this law to prevent its unjust operation upon merchants who had imported goods subject to the old rate of duties, for it was foreseen, if an article had been charged with 100 per cent. duty, and was at once let in free, those who should happen to have it on hand at the time of the change would be great sufferers. The law of 1832 was enacted to go into operation on the 3d of March, 1833, and the 18th section provides that all persons holding goods in the original package, whether imported before or after the passage of the law, might deposit them in the custom-house stores at any time before the 3d of March, 1833, and be thereby entitled to receive from the United States money, or a credit, if the duty bonds were not paid, equal to the difference of duties imposed on the merchandise by the two acts. If, for example, said he, a merchant has imported a cargo of pepper, which is now subject to a heavy duty, and gives his bonds payable in 9, 12, and 18 months, he will, if he deposit the pepper in the custom-house stores, be entitled to have his bonds cancelled, and, if he has paid any thing upon them, to have that restored, because pepper is made free; and this is indispensable to place him upon as favorable a footing as those who import after the 3d of March, as he should by and by show.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] rises here, and with great gravity makes a significant inquiry of his colleague. He desires to know what amount of money this will take out of the treasury; as if the act of 1832 was to be interpreted by that rule. He contended, the amount, be it more or less, was wholly immaterial; first, because we had determined, by the law of 1832, that it should be refunded, and it would be to a great extent, whether this explanatory act were passed or not, unless the 18th section were repealed. And, secondly, because most of the goods embraced by this section were entitled to debenture, and it was past the ingenuity of the gentleman to prevent the merchants from exporting them, landing them in a foreign country, and importing and entering them a second time under the law of 1832. This he could not do, unless he repealed the debenture law, and he believed the Government was not quite ready for that. It seemed to him that some gentlemen in the House were horror-struck lest the revenue laws should make the treasury overflow; but whenever there was money in it, none sit so like an incubus upon it. None were so unwilling it should go out, even to satisfy the most just and reasonable claims. The gentleman says, because he thinks the sum will be great, he would not let it go out. He [Mr. D.] would tell him what the merchants would do when that decision was made; when you grow so unjust as to deny to them the benefit of a law you have passed, when you veto the 18th section, they will export their goods under the general laws authorizing it at any time within three years from the time of importation, and return them into the country again as they have a right to do, draw the whole duty accruing under the first entry from the treasury, and take the credit allowed by law on the second entry for the new duties. Thus, the scheme of the gentleman, instead of relieving the treasury, would embarrass it; instead of drawing out the difference of duties imposed by the two laws, it would draw out the whole of the old duty, and defer the payment of the new the usual term of credit allowed by law.

This would be the effect of attempting to evade your own legislation for the purpose of injuring, and he declared he had almost said defrauding, your citizens. You would subject the holders of these goods to very heavy and needless expense in freight and charges, and very obviously embarrass the treasury. He hoped by this time the gentleman from New York was convinced that little benefit would arise in any way from attempting to embarrass the merchants whose goods are entitled to debenture.

[Here the time assigned for the consideration of other business arrived, and this bill was deferred until the next day, when the subject was again brought before the House, and Mr. D. resumed his argument.]

He said he had, when up before, disposed of that part of the subject which related to goods entitled to debenture. It was now necessary to state why there was any cause whatever for legislation. This he would do in a few minutes. The 18th section of the act of 1832 was perhaps a little ambiguous in its phraseology. Yet, on reading it over, the mind cannot by any fair inference, he thought, arrive satisfactorily at but one conclusion.

1. It allows goods imported before, as well as those imported after its passage, to be stored for the return of duty.

2. "And if the duties, or any part thereof, on the articles deposited as aforesaid, shall have been paid previous to the said third day of March, the amount so paid shall be refunded."

Is it not clear, said he, that goods imported before the passage of the law are as well provided for as those imported after?

Is it not equally clear that those on which all the duties were paid were as well provided for, as clearly embraced by the bill, as those under bond?

He said it seemed to him these positions were undeniable; but if the language of the section needed extraneous support to give to it meaning, then he asked the gentlemen of this House what they meant when they voted for it. They intended to return duties to somebody—who was it? The act says, to all who held the goods in the original package—and did we mean to make invidious discriminations? Did we intend that one man who held goods in the original package should have the benefit of it, and another should not? He would say for one that he did not so understand the matter; he had no such purpose, but meant to measure out justice to all alike.

Yet it is the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury crossing these obvious views that calls for this legislation. The act of 1832 gives him power to make rules and regulations for carrying it into effect, and it seemed to him the Secretary had, under this provision, exercised power enough to almost nullify the act.

He had, in the first place, decided that none but the original importers should have the benefit of the act. Yet the act says the goods may be deposited under the bond of the importer or owner. What is the meaning of the word owner? If, Mr. Chairman, you were put to choose a word from the English language, by which you would convey distinctly the meaning that the proprietor of the goods should have the benefit of the law, what word would so aptly, so explicitly convey the exact meaning as owner? None; none can be found so appropriate, and yet the Secretary makes it mean nothing, or gives to it an unheard of definition, making it synonymous with importer.

What is the effect of such a decision? It lets the importer into the benefit of the act, but shuts out all other owners. The consequence is, that if A imports a cargo of pepper, and sells one-half to B, A can place his in the custom-house, and bring it into the market without paying a cent of duty, while B must pay the whole duty, which is, he thought, 100 per cent. or more, and then sell his goods for the same that A does, though they are in exactly the same condition as A's. Did this House, he said, ever imagine it had or could give its sanction to a law, with such unjust and absurd provisions as this? On what principle can such a decision be sustained? It ought certainly to have the clear and decisive provisions of law in its favor. Nothing else can justify it. Such partiality and favoritism, if sanctioned by this House, should appear to be sustained by very unequivocal language. Yet, for one, he could find nothing in the act which seemed to justify such an inference. Others might see and think differently: he could only speak of his own impressions.

This decision, of course, had created great sensation, and well it might: for no one can pretend, for a moment, that things should be so. If the law calls for such a decision, then the law is unwise and unjust, and should be altered at once: for it is a reproach to those who made it. If the law is right, and the decision is wrong, then we are as imperatively urged to overrule that decision, by an explanatory act, as the only effectual remedy for the evil.

But this is not all: the Secretary has decided further, "that the right conferred by that section [18th] is to be confined to such goods as have been heretofore imported, on which the full amount of duties has not been paid, and such as may hereafter be imported." This circular is dated the 20th of August. The amount of this decision is, that no importer who did not, on the 20th of August, 1832, owe the United States on his bonds for duties, could have the benefit of the act. The importer who paid cash for the duties, was denied the privilege of the act, while he who took the term of credit allowed by law, even if it had expired, and a balance was still due, was entitled to a return of duty.

Thus, one who made prompt payments in cash was punished as if he had offended against the Government, while he who violated his contract by non-payment was rewarded as a benefactor. This decision could not stand; it was, therefore, on the 11th of September, modified so that all goods on which the usual term of credit for duties had not expired before the passage of the act were declared to be entitled to the benefit of it, although the duties had actually been paid.

H. or R.]

The Tariff Law of 1832.

These two decisions uprooted all the salutary provisions of the act. What was intended to be general was made special, favoring a few individuals, instead of bearing equally upon the public. The act says not a word about the term of credit allowed by law, and yet the Secretary says its operations shall be limited to that term.

What is the effect of this? In the first place, all who own goods which have been imported more than eighteen months, the longest period of credit, must be driven to the expense of exporting them, if they are entitled to debenture. And those who hold goods which have been imported more than three years are shovelled entirely on one side, and denied the benefit of all participation in a return of duties. Yet the act provides as well for all goods imported before its passage as after; and as well for those on which all duties are paid, as for those on which the duties are wholly unpaid, or only paid in part. The holders of goods in the original package, which have been in the country more than three years, will under any circumstances probably be the greatest sufferers. Such goods, it is obvious, hang heavily on hand; they are not saleable; the holders find them a drag; and yet the Secretary insists they shall not have the benefit of drawback in any form, but shall sacrifice out of their own pockets the difference of duties between the old and new law, while he would allow a more recent importer to draw that difference out of the treasury. Is there any justice, any equity, any reason, in allowing this privilege to him who has a cargo, and denying it to him who happens to have a single bale, merely because he has not been able to sell that bale within three years? He could not be reconciled, he said, to such an administration of the law as this. It looked too much like a forced attempt to retain money in the treasury, right or wrong.

He invited the attention of the House to another view of the matter. The credits allowed by law on duties were unequal. On goods imported from beyond the equator at nine, twelve, and eighteen months: on goods from Europe eight, ten, and twelve months: on goods from the West Indies six and nine months. The decision of the Secretary is, that if the term of credit had expired before the passage of the law, the importer cannot deposit his goods for drawback. Now mark the effect: a cargo of coffee coming from Cuba, which is north of the equator, could not be deposited for drawback if it had been in the country nine months before the passage of the law, while one brought from Brazil, if it had been in the country short of — months, could be deposited, and the whole duty drawn out of the treasury. Did any gentleman here, when he voted for the law, suppose he was authorizing such an odious distinction? That he was relieving the merchant trading to Brazil, and denying the like privilege to him who trades to Cuba? He did not hesitate to declare that the House was never actuated by any such motive; that it never intended to give just cause for reproaching it with acting partially and in the spirit of favoritism.

He said he rose merely to lay before the committee these objections to the course pursued by the Secretary, and to show how necessary it was for this House to exercise its authority in giving a just construction to its own legislation. He would detain the committee but a few minutes longer. These decisions had restrained the operations of the 18th section of the act of '32 in such manner as to make the law unjust, inequitable, and much less beneficial than he thought it was designed to be.

1. None but importers were allowed the benefit of it.
2. And only such of these as had imported their goods within the time of credit allowed by law at the passage of the act.

The people of the United States complained loudly of the injustice; they appealed to this House, and he trusted they would not appeal in vain.

It had been said by the gentleman on his right [Mr. CAMBRELENG] that he should sustain an amendment to cut off all holders of goods not entitled to debenture. Mr. D. said he should do no such thing; he should make no such offensive discrimination, but should consider the trader who held one bale in the original package as much entitled to the justice of this Government as he who held a cargo. He could not accede to the doctrine of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE], that because a man had but a crate of ware, he was to be shovelled on one side, as not worth regarding. He should oppose such an amendment, though he feared, from the support it seemed to have, it would be carried. The 3d of March, 1833, was at hand; and if any thing was done, it should be done quickly, that the merchants might be able to understand how to act.

Mr. WICKLIFFE disclaimed all wish to subject the merchants to the trouble and expense of reshipping and bringing back their goods, in order to avail themselves of the benefit which this bill would secure to them. But believing it to be too extensive in its range, he would move to amend it, by adding a proviso, declaring that none should be entitled to the benefits of drawback under this bill, who would not have been under the former law.

Mr. CAMBRELENG concurred with the gentleman from Kentucky, in thinking that the act of last year went beyond the true line. He thought the gentleman from Massachusetts had done some injustice to the Secretary of the Treasury. The whole difficulty in interpreting this eighteenth section of the bill, had grown out of an amendment introduced in the Senate by a very distinguished member of that body from Kentucky: the words of the bill, as it went from this House, were, "the importer or owner;" the words inserted by the Senate were, "any person importing and depositing" the goods in the public stores. The House had intended to grant the benefit of debenture to all, whether importer or not; the amendments of the Senate gave the bill a different operation; and the Secretary had been embarrassed between the two passages.

Mr. C. then moved an amendment to the bill, [which we have not been able to procure.]

Mr. DAVIS was not aware that he had done any injustice to the Secretary: he had not pretended to arraign the motives of that officer. Mr. D. entirely dissented from the proviso offered by the gentleman from Kentucky: it went to curtail the effect of the eighteenth section of the bill, and restricts its benefits in an unjust manner.

Mr. HOFFMAN insisted that his colleague [Mr. CAMBRELENG] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] had not touched the material question involved in the bill. They seemed to consider it as sufficient to show that the merchants could get the same benefit as the bill conferred, by going to the trouble of exporting their goods and bringing them back into the country. Mr. H. did not deny this. But he was not satisfied that other holders of goods could get the same advantage if the goods held by the merchants remained in the country, as they would if the merchants should export them. When gentlemen told the House that, if the bill should pass, the treasury would have to pay less than if the merchants reshipped their goods, and bringing them back claimed a drawback of the whole duty, they were under a mistake; because, if they should be thus reshipped, they must on their return bring into the treasury just as much as they would leave in it should the bill pass.

The eighteenth section ought, in his opinion, never to have been in the act at all. The Secretary's construction of the law had been justified by some of the best lawyers in the country. Besides, the partiality of which the gentleman complained would be just as great under this bill as under the law it explained. Why should a man who owned an unbroken package of goods be entitled to more privilege than he who had been obliged to open his package? This was in many cases indispensable: it was so in many branches of manufacture, as well as in the case of retail dealers: ought the holders of all the original packages to be benefited at the expense of these less favored individuals? So the bill would operate. Mr. H. thought the construction of the Secretary was as wide as it ought to have been. Supposing large quantities of these goods in the original packages should be destroyed by fire, would the House restore the duties? He believed former decisions had been to the contrary. Wherever the duty was refunded, it was on the principle that the goods were in the process of consumption. Another objection to the bill was the swearing that it would occasion. No wise legislator would seek to multiply oaths. It was said that the merchants could avail themselves of the right of exportation. This was very true: and it was precisely what Mr. H. desired. Let them take the goods out of the country: and the sooner the better; he hoped they would never return: and if not, the country would be in so much better condition. He knew that there were many who would not re-export, but would avail themselves of the market at home. Mr. H. was as willing to see prices go down as any individual in the House, but he wished them to do so in the natural course of things. He was in favor of the restriction proposed by the gentleman, [Mr. WICKLIFFE.] Should this bill pass, it would be considered as settling the general principle that whenever duties were reduced the Government was to remit the difference of duty. Petitions and remonstrances would be poured in upon the House, and it would be impossible to resist them. What would be the consequence of passing such a bill and establishing such a principle? All would import as much as they possibly could; they would sell what they could, and for the rest they would get the duty returned. The bill would be an invitation to glut the market with foreign goods: it was an invitation to the importers to do as much injury as possible to those who were not favored in the like manner, though they were as worthy of the regard and protection of the Government as themselves.

Mr. CRAIG now moved that the committee rise. The yeas were 56, nays 36. No quorum having voted, it was moved that the committee rise, and report the fact: another count was had, when it still appearing that there was no quorum,

The committee rose, and reported to the House that no quorum was present.

The Sergeant at Arms was thereupon despatched by the SPEAKER to invite members from other parts of the building.

A number of members having come in, and a quorum being present, the SPEAKER left the chair, the committee resumed its sitting, and Mr. CRAIG renewed his motion for its rising.

The motion prevailed: Yeas 83, nays 37.

The committee thereupon rose, and reported progress.

Mr. DRAYTON moved that the House now take up the

TARIFF BILL.

The motion prevailed, and the House resumed the consideration of that bill, and the motion to recommit it with instructions:

Mr. DRAYTON now modified the instructions he had proposed as follows.

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the 3d day of March, 1834, the rates of duty then payable by law on the following goods, wares, and merchandise, to wit: on wool and woollens of all kinds; on iron, or manufactures of iron or steel of all kinds; on cotton, and manufactures of cotton; on hemp, and manufactures of hemp; on sugar and sirup of all kinds; on glass of all kinds; on leather, and manufactures of leather of all kinds; on ready-made clothing of all kinds; on manufactures of wood of all kinds; on manufactures of tin, brass, copper, lead, or pewter, japanned wares, gilt and plated wares, cabinet wares, saddlery, bridle bits, paper and paper hangings, hats of all kinds, side and firearms, muskets, rifles, slates of all kinds, cotton bagging, oil cloths of all kinds, brushes of all kinds, molasses, flax, candles, cheese, soap, beef and pork, indigo, gunpowder; lead, white or red, dry or ground in oil; sugar of lead, bar lead, shot, cordage, twine and pack thread of all kinds, litharge, corks, alum, copperas, salt, coal; shoes and slippers, and boots and booties of all kinds; salts, butter, glue, oils of all kinds, subject to an ad valorem or specific duty, excepting where the rate thereof shall not exceed twenty per centum, shall be reduced annually five per centum; and that the rates of duty on all other articles, then liable to an ad valorem rate of duty, shall be reduced annually ten per centum; and on all other articles subject to a specific duty, in a like proportion, until the nett amount of duty received therefrom shall not exceed the sum which may be required for the authorized expenditures of the Government: Provided, That if the nett amount of revenue aforesaid shall only be equal to, or shall fall below such expenditures, before the rate of duty on the articles herein particularly enumerated and described be reduced to the rate of twenty per centum, in the manner aforesaid, the said annual reduction upon the articles enumerated in the first paragraph of this section shall continue; and the rate of duty upon all other articles, as aforesaid, shall be thereafter annually increased in the same proportion, provided such increase shall in no instance exceed the rate of duty payable thereon on the 3d of March, 1834: And provided, That, when any rate of duty shall be less than twenty-five per centum, such reduction only shall be made as will not reduce the same below twenty per centum.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause such instructions to be given, and to prescribe such rules and regulations, as shall be necessary to carry this act into effect.

Mr. DRAYTON said that, after hearing the instructions proposed yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARDWELL,] he had become convinced that there were serious defects in those which he had himself proposed; and what he now offered consisted, in part, of his former motion, in part of that of the gentleman from New York, and in part of original matter.

It must be obvious to all who attended to the signs of the times, that the impulse, formerly so strong in favor of a system of high protection, had subsided. In 1816, which might, by way of distinction, be called the era of protection, the people of the Union had strongly desired the adoption and continuance of that policy. This state of the public mind had continued, as was manifest from the successive laws of 1818, 1824, and 1828. In 1830, there had been symptoms of a change. An attempt had been made, in 1830, in reference to the articles of salt and molasses, to change the policy. Since then, that change had been going on without intermission. In many of the States where, formerly, the people were unanimously in favor of the protective policy, large masses of the inhabitants were now diametrically opposed to it; and two entire States had, in this respect, changed their character.

In the meanwhile, the friends of free trade had proportionably increased. None could now shut their eyes to the fact that the Legislature was called to prepare a law adapted to this changed attitude of the public mind: and all the friends of protection ought to combine in order to save the system from the effects of too great a reaction. The public debt would soon have been paid, and the people never would consent to have their money taken out of their pockets to produce a surplus revenue, to become a source of perpetual wrangling on that floor. Had no revenue been raised beyond the actual wants of the Government, the country would never have been agitated by disputes about the tariff.

Three great objects were to be kept in view when passing a bill at this time: 1. To reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government; 2. To save the interests of the manufacturers from injury by a reduction too sudden and violent; and, 3. To equalize duties.

Mr. D. briefly remarked on each of these objects, and explained the instructions he now proposed, as going to effect all of them as far as practicable.

The instructions, thus modified, being before the House, The CHAIR inquired whether the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] who had proposed an amendment to them, as presented yesterday, still continued his amendment to the instructions as now modified.

Mr. WICKLIFFE not being in the House to answer,

The CHAIR said it would be presumed that the amendment was still before the House.

Mr. WARDWELL now withdrew the instructions he had yesterday proposed.

Mr. BOULDIN said that every object he had in view was, he knew, desired by the gentleman from South Carolina; and if there were any difference between them, it could only have respect to the mode of getting at the end they both had in view, which was none other than the settlement of this vexed question on the most fair and equitable grounds. The time had gone by, he was aware, for the making of tariff or anti-tariff speeches on that floor; he would, therefore, offer but a few words to the House. Frequent asseverations had been made by gentlemen coming from that part of the country most interested in the policy of protection, that they had had no distinct proposition presented to them to which Southern gentlemen were prepared to commit themselves, so that, should they be embraced, the others might have reasonable ground to expect that they should not again be interrupted on the ground of future calculations. Mr. B. had now brought forward a proposition which he was ready to pledge himself to abide by, now and for aye.

Mr. B. then offered the following:

"To recommit, with instructions to report a bill—

"1st. Increasing the list of free goods, as far as that may be done without detriment to the home producer.

"2d. To reduce the duties now called protecting duties, commencing on the 1st day of January next, taking from the rates of duty provided by the act of 1832 one-eighth part of the sum or rate which the said duties exceed twenty per cent., and so proceeding annually to abate one-eighth of the original excess, so that on the 1st day of January, 1841, the said protecting duties shall be twenty per cent., and no more. And, in so reducing the said duties, the specific and square yard duties, provided by the act of 1832, shall be retained, and in that form the said duties to be regarded as equivalent to ad valorem duties, bearing the same proportion to the foreign cost or value that the said specific rates bore to the average cost of the articles to which they apply, of the import of 1831, to be annually reduced, upon the foregoing principles, until the specific or square yard duty allowed shall be equal to twenty per cent.

"3d. To guard against a deficiency of the revenue by replacing moderate and rising duties on coffee, tea, wines, silks, spices, jewelry, and other luxuries, commencing when it appears probable that the revenue will become deficient from the gradual reduction of the protecting duties."

Mr. B. said that he should greatly have preferred to have ad valorem duties on all articles whatever, and should have insisted on this, but from conversations with gentlemen connected with the manufacturing interests, and who had exhibited something like feeling for the situation of the Southern States, that it was necessary to save the manufacturers from severe injury, to substitute specific duties on those articles now protected by duties of that kind. The plan of the gentleman from South Carolina did not embrace all the ground covered by Mr. B.'s proposition, particularly that portion of it which provided, in case of a deficit of revenue, to advance the duties on coffee, tea, wines, silks, jewelry, and other articles of luxury. Mr. B. consented that some goods should be duty free; he was willing that the fall on the protecting duties should be very gradual, and that, in case of need, there should be a corresponding rise on articles not protected.

The proposition of Mr. B., though not in order at present, was read at the Clerk's table.

The question being on Mr. WICKLIFFE's amendment, viz. to amend the instructions proposed by Mr. DRAITON, by striking out all after the words "report a bill," and inserting as follows:

"To modify the existing laws imposing duties on imports, as follows:

"The act of July 14, 1832, to be taken as the basis, and that the duties be so reduced, that, by the 4th day of March, in the year 1840, the amount of duty imposed upon imported articles shall be reduced to a sum not exceeding twenty per centum, and that the reduction be apportioned on the respective years between the 3d of March, 1833, and said 4th of March, 1840, inclusive, in equal proportions."

Mr. ARNOLD inquired whether the question was not divisible. He wanted to ascertain whether the House was willing that, after weeks of laborious discussion, the bill should be sent back to the committee from which it came.

The CHAIR replied that the question was divisible, but nothing would be gained by dividing it, as, if the House agreed to recommit, instructions could immediately be offered, and, if they refused, no instructions would take effect.

Mr. IRVIN, of OHIO, now gave notice that he should offer the following draught as instruction to the committee:

Be it enacted, &c. That the duties now required by law to be paid upon the goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, on and after the 4th day of March next, shall be reduced twenty-five cents on every dollar of such duty, by five annual reductions, of five cents in the dollar for five successive years; the first of said reductions of five cents to take place on the 1st day of March, 1834, and the like reduction of five cents on the 4th day of March of each succeeding four years. And if the revenue then shall exceed the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, then the same grade of reduction shall be continued until the revenue be reduced to that sum."

Mr. IRVIN said that he could not give his assent to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] because it commenced on the protected articles only, and left the others as under the law of 1832; this was doing injury without any compensating good. The plan Mr. I. proposed had a different basis; it presumed that in a bill so fully considered and matured as that of the last session, the scale of duties was justly arranged as to the comparative protection on different articles: he wished to preserve the proportion then fixed, and to reduce the whole on articles protected and unprotected, at the same rate. He was in favor of reduction; but of reduction so conducted that the manufacturing interest should suffer as little as possible. He wished to protect the North and to satisfy the South, so far as the two purposes could be unitedly effected. He was one of those who held that the consumer paid the duty; and if so, what matter was it on what articles the revenue was collected, provided they were articles in general use.

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed that there was a radical defect in the plan of the gentleman from South Carolina. He was never willing, where the rate of duty admitted of being specifically fixed, of leaving it unsettled. He was much pleased with the proposals of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DRAYTON,] and his colleague, [Mr. WARDWELL.] If carefully regulated, he thought either of those schemes might be made to meet the approbation of a majority of the House. Much as he was opposed to the policy of protection, he was for graduating the reduction of duties on a scale as moderate as possible. Mr. C. never had believed that the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means could have been acceptable without great modification. It would have produced a rush of importation that could not but have been attended with the most injurious effects. The provisions of that bill, especially as regarded the article of spirits, must have produced a scene of speculation altogether unparalleled in the history of this country. He knew that all propositions coming from those who thought with him on the subject of free trade would be received with great jealousy by the friends of protection; and therefore he had made none. He approved the principles of the two propositions he had referred to. He could not consent, however, to go as far as to 1841: he thought the object could be accomplished short of that date by a semi-annual reduction of two and a half per cent. He would not, however, have this take place at the two periods of business, in the spring and fall, but at midsummer and in midwinter: and if there should be any deficit in the revenue, there was the whole circle of non-protected articles, on which the duties could either be raised or diminished as circumstances should require. It was not their duty to perform the task which belonged to a future Congress. He was willing to meet the question on the ground upon which it had been put by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARDWELL.] He liked their proposition, but he wished the duties to be fixed, so that nothing should be left to treasury legislation. The gentleman from Kentucky and himself did not differ in principle. Mr. C. entreated the friends of protection, for their own sakes, to come into this proposal. They were now offered five, six, seven, and eight years as the period to which reduction was to extend. And they might rely upon it as the truth, that better terms were offered to them now than they would be able to obtain next year. While Mr. C. wished for a bill on this principle, it was obvious that no such bill could be framed by discussions in that House. Its details could nowhere be arranged but in a committee.

Mr. WAYNE said that, before he proceeded to give an explanation of the proposition which had been offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DRAYTON,] he should be glad if the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] would tell the House in what respects that proposition differed from the plan proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARDWELL.] The gentleman had said that he agreed to the principle of the proposition, but not to its details. The alteration which had been made in it was in conformity to the policy of reducing the revenue to the wants of the Government. Mr. W. then went into an explanation in detail of the several features of Mr. DRAYTON's plan. Its basis was the act of 1832; and its object was so to apportion the reduction, that the manufacturers of the country should not be reduced to ruin; and that if the small reduction of five per cent. annually should bring the revenue below the standard he had mentioned, or should leave it excessive, then the duty on the unprotected articles was to rise or fall accordingly. The reduction at this rate must occupy at least seven years. It was impossible that in a shorter period the interests of the manufacturers should be menaced. He knew that those gentlemen objected not only to a sudden reduction, but to any scheme which should bring down the revenue to twenty per cent. The plan now offered did indeed ultimately reach that point. But if gentlemen would look at the length of time in which this was to take place, they would see no cause of alarm. Mr. W. asked whether it could be wise, when they were offered entire security for seven years to come, to put this in jeopardy, and all the intervening protection together, with the guaranty that the reduction should never go below twenty per cent. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had said that there was a radical objection to the scheme, because it left the power of legislation to the Secretary of the Treasury. He was at a loss to know what the gentleman could mean, or how the plan would have such an effect. It referred to a bill already passed, and it fixed the ratio of reduction. There might, to be sure, be a dispute as to what amount of revenue should be needed to meet the wants of the Government, but on that point Congress would be able to judge, as they had an annual exposé of the state of the finances, furnished, according to law, from the treasury. He invited the attention of gentlemen to one feature of this proposition. The whole list of articles now protected, the duty on which did not exceed twenty per cent., would be left untouched, together with all others not enumerated; many of which were such as entered into the daily consumption of the country. None of these were to be touched at all. Another advantage would be, that when the revenue should fall, there would be no reduction in the decrease of five per cent. annually, and the increase would only be on the unprotected articles. The general and ultimate object aimed at was a uniform tariff of thirty per cent. In those parts of the country where the great hostility to the protecting system was grounded on its real or supposed inequality, they of the South would have an experience of six or seven years to correct any erroneous impression into which they might have fallen, and to confirm such as were founded in truth. It was the earnest desire of the anti-tariff party that this proposition might be the beginning of some conciliatory system; but if it was to be embarrassed by an endless succession of amendments, it was very plain that nothing could be done. Facts which had transpired in the House indicated a strong desire that something should be effected. The House, by a very decisive vote, had refused to destroy the bill. If any compromise could be effected by giving time, the opponents of protection were ready to meet its friends. And, admitting that the Committee of Ways and Means should be permitted to bring in a bill in conformity with the instructions proposed, nobody would be committed. The House would not at last be bound to take the bill. The impression seemed to be general, that nothing effectual could be done with the present bill. Why, then, refuse to recommit? Or why embarrass the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina? Would not a bill on the proposed basis be more acceptable than that which the committee had reported to the House? The amendments tended only to embarrass the House. Mr. W. did not mean to complain, but expressed his hope that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] would relieve the friends of conciliation, by withdrawing the amendment he had offered.

Mr. W. said he had endeavored to watch the operation of different interests on the minds of gentlemen in that House, and he perceived that there were three distinct considerations which were in operation. There was one class which desired to continue a high tariff, which should bring a large surplus into the treasury, over and above the wants of Government, to be spent in accomplishing plans and views which he would not denominate profligate, because he was aware that the friends of internal improvement could, and did show too many strong reasons in support of their views to justify any one in applying to them harsh or disparaging epithets. But the feelings and sentiments of the people of this country never would allow large accumulations in the treasury, because it was against the genius and principles of republican Government. The first principle of a free Government was, that when any plan was proposed, of a public nature, the people should be asked whether they were willing to bear the taxation necessary for carrying it into effect. Why should this rule be now departed from? Mr. W. could see no necessity for it. And he was very sure the people would never submit to it. There was a second class who wished to get rid of the public lands; while others were as much opposed to such a project, and had gone against the bill, because such a scheme seemed to be taken for granted in adopting it; while a third party would vote for no system which had for its basis an obligation on the Government to sell its bank stock. Now, the proposition advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina avoided all these several projects. It neither accumulated money for internal improvement, nor required the sale of the public lands, nor contemplated the sacrifice of the bank stock. In the full conviction that, while the proposition avoided all these agitating topics, it essentially secured the great interests of the country, and the rights of all its citizens, Mr. W. should give it his hearty support.

Mr. BELL said it was evidently impracticable for the House to agree upon the details of any bill, the instructions for which were to be sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. He felt a deep anxiety that the question should be settled, and settled during the present session of Congress. Yet difficulties seemed to accumulate on their hands, while but a short portion of the session remained. In the meanwhile they were expending hour after hour, and day after day, in fruitless effort to agree upon details which never could be settled any where but in a committee. He thought the best plan would be to recommit the bill, with all the amendments, and all the instructions proposed, to the Committee of Ways and Means. Let them look at the whole ground, and after having heard the four or five weeks' discussion which had already taken place, let them present a bill such as they judged most likely to meet with the approbation of a majority of the House. He trusted that twenty-four or forty-eight hours would be sufficient to accomplish this object.

The CHAIR said this was not strictly in order, and could only be done by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. CARSON suggested that the bill might be recommitted with this understanding, without any formal vote.

Mr. WICKLIFFE would say to the gentleman from Tennessee, that if he really desired the speedy action of the House on this subject, the very best mode to prevent it would be to adopt the course he had proposed. A new bill would have to be reported to the House. The House must then go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider it; and when once the bill got there, Heaven only could tell when it would get out again: not, he feared, during this session. Mr. W. not wishing to contribute any thing to the embarrassment of the House, would for the present withdraw his amendment. Let a vote be taken upon the plan now before the House, and if it should be rejected, he would then offer his own.

Mr. CARSON said that the course before the House was now easy; and he moved to recommit the bill without instructions.

The CHAIR pronounced the motion not to be in order, as the motion before the House was to recommit with instructions.

Mr. CARSON then demanded a division of the question.

The SPEAKER repeated the explanation he had before given, as to the effect of a division.

Mr. ARNOLD insisted upon a division of the question.

He had seen many strange things upon that floor; but, at an hour like this, to recommit the present bill would certainly be the strangest of all. He could not believe that the House seriously intended any such thing, and he wished the question to come up, that a decision might at once be had upon it. A bill had been reported to the House on the 27th of December; the House had gone into committee upon it on the glorious 8th of January; they had got the bill out of committee on the 9th of February, and now, in the midst of a full gallop, and the calling of yeas and nays, they had, all of a sudden, come to a dead halt; even the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMERON,] whom he supposed he was to consider as the head of the great free trade party of this country, had just put his veto on the bill. What did all this mean? What had they been doing the days and weeks past? Had they been at play? Had they been in a grand frolic on the people's money, and under the people's eye? It would seem so. He insisted on a division of the question. He was opposed to recommitting. He had predicted that the whole project would go off in fumo, and his prophecy was fast coming to pass. Really they had got to a pretty pass. That the interests of this Union, of all the thirteen millions of people whom they represented, were to be committed into the hands of two or three political jugglers. Yet could any one deny that it had come to this? What had brought the House to the dead halt? The case was plain enough. Gentlemen were afraid the others would get the start in the glorious work of compromise. He was for no such doings. He was not willing that the concerns of this country should be arranged and settled by the conflicting claims of two or three leading men. They were the representatives of the people, and not the followers or tools of any man. Let the House go on in the work in which it was engaged, and let the people know, by the records of yeas and nays, who and what they were.

Mr. ISACKS said he should vote to recommit the bill at large. He was about to proceed, but yielded the floor at the request of Mr. DRAYTON, who withdrew his motion for instructions.

Mr. CARSON said he hoped the suggestion he had made would not be misunderstood. We ardently desired to see this question adjusted; and with the hope of more speedily accomplishing that object, he had wished to see the bill recommitted. The gentleman from Tennessee had said that he would not consent to put the affairs of the country in the hands of four or five political jugglers, neither would Mr. C., if the gentleman from Tennessee was to be one of them.

The CHAIR called Mr. CARSON to order; no personal allusions could be permitted. The gentleman from Tennessee had not reflected upon the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ARNOLD said that the gentleman from North Carolina had not even been in his thoughts when he was speaking of the great interests of this country; but if the gentleman chose to take any part of what had been said to himself, he had Mr. A.'s most devoted consent.

Mr. CARSON said he had considered the gentleman as alluding to the Committee of Ways and Means,

Mr. A. said he intended no such reference.

Mr. IRVIN inquired of the CHAIR whether the withdrawal of Mr. DRAYTON's motion for instructions carried with it those which Mr. I. had offered as an amendment.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. I. did not think it was quite fair in gentlemen to speak of those who had offered amendments as "embarrassing" the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. Had that gentleman any greater right to propose plans of action to that House than any other members on that floor? If he had, Mr. I. was not aware of it, and it would be quite as fair to accuse the gentleman from South Carolina of embarrassing the propositions of others. Mr. I. had had no intention of embarrassing the proceedings of the House. He had offered such a proposition as it was his right and privilege to offer. He had been moved by the hand of no political juggler. He knew of none such to whom the members of that House were subject. He had proposed the instructions he had submitted, because he had believed their operation would be better than that of those submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina; but, since that gentleman's had been withdrawn, Mr. I. should submit his, in the form of instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means.

FEB. 12, 1833.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that he was not aware that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. INVIN] had any more reason to complain, if his instructions should not be sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, than other gentlemen had. The time remaining for the action of the House was very short; and, under the impression that the motion he was about to make would cut off all amendments, and bring the House to the simple question of recommitment, he should move the previous question; but he wished to know whether its effect would be what he had mentioned.

The CHAIR replied that the effect of the previous question would be to cut off not only the instructions, but the motion to recommit, together with all the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole, and to bring back the House to vote upon the original bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CLAY said that, if that would be its effect, he should not move it at that time.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that he presumed, of course, that the bill would be committed. He wished to be indulged in a few words of explanation, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WAYNE], as to what he had said on the subject of treasury legislation. It was a principal feature in the plan which that gentleman had so warmly advocated, that the duties were to be regulated according to the wants of the treasury, and were to go up one year and down the next, according as the treasury should be empty or full. Now, it would be the Secretary of the Treasury who would have to decide whether these duties were wanting or not, according to his own balance sheet. And he would, of course, issue his instructions accordingly. This was what Mr. C. had meant by the phrase treasury legislation.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman from New York that the proposition to which his remarks applied was not now before the House. The question now was on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DRAYTON] to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the instructions moved by way of amendment, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. INVIN].

The question was now put, and decided in the negative. So Mr. INVIN's instructions were rejected.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that to recommit the bill without any instructions, would be inevitable death to all hope of legislation on the tariff by this Congress. Before so grave a question was determined, he wanted a fuller House.

[A great many members were absent in the Senate chamber, where Mr. Clay's bill was under discussion.]

Mr. WAYNE said he was fully satisfied that it would be perfectly useless to send the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, without instructions. The House would get no nearer to the object it sought, and, in the meanwhile, the conciliatory disposition which seemed now so happily to prevail, might be dissipated. Mr. W. had all confidence in that committee. But past experience had shown that they had been very unfortunate, since they had presented to the House a bill which neither its friends nor its enemies could approve.

Mr. W. concluded by renewing the proposition for instructions which had been withdrawn by Mr. DRAYTON.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said he thought there would be little wisdom in recommitting the bill without instructions. The House had evidently settled during the day a great and embarrassing question without a vote. It was suddenly rendered obvious that a bill which had employed its anxious and laborious attention for five weeks, a bill which had been modelled, remodelled, altered, amended, and most earnestly debated, could not pass. This seemed now as plain as if a majority of votes were recorded against it; and he must confess he was rejoiced to see this evidence of a disposition not to throw overboard a policy which had rendered the country prosperous and happy.

He said, if he did not mistake the course of things, the question now pending was more important than it was esteemed to be in the House. Why should we recommit? What is the object? Is it not to have a bill brought in which will be acceptable to the House? But how can the committee know or understand the sentiments of the House unless they are expressed? Will any one here undertake to say he understands well enough the sentiments of a majority to frame a bill in conformity with them? Is the committee more gifted than the rest of us? Have they the attributes of prescience or of omniscience? If they have, they cast but a little way into the future when they offered us this bill. If the subject goes to them without instructions, this action upon it must be only experimental, and it is more than probable that in the end we should find ourselves just where we now are.

The proposition now is to commit with instructions, and he had hinted that this was not a matter for light, hasty, or inconsiderate decision. If instructions are given, then the committee merely frame a bill according to those instructions: voting, therefore, upon instructions, is much the same as voting upon the final passage of a bill, for members would hardly consider it as indicating a consistent, wise, and manly course, to vote one way upon instructions, and another upon a bill framed in conformity with those instructions. Instructions must be taken to be the judgment, and the deliberate judgment too, of a majority of the House. He therefore entreated all who wished to act understandingly upon this matter, to commit themselves to no instructions which they were not willing should take the form of law. Mr. D. did not concur in the instructions first offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DRAYTON], and now by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WAYNE]. He never should consent to any project which proposed as an ultimate standard of duties 20 per cent. on all imports. For one, he was very willing his views should be understood. He had expressed his anxious desire for compromise; he had more than once announced his entire willingness to meet gentlemen on fair ground, and to adjust the controversy; he had said he would incur the hazard of great sacrifices to accomplish so desirable an object, and he still was ready and willing to do all this; but there was one thing he never would do until all his views of public policy were changed; he would not vote an abandonment of the right to protect American labor; he would not yield the right to countervail foreign regulations which bear upon and oppress the labor of this country; and if this was expected as a compromise, it would never be yielded, for it was not compromise, but abject, unqualified submission. He said an equalization of duties, or the imposing the same rate of duties on all imports, be it 20 per cent. or any other amount, was an abandonment of the right to discriminate—it was tearing away the very foundations of protection—it was yielding up the feature of the constitution most valuable to the laboring freeman; and whenever such a doctrine was sanctioned here, the labor of this country might consider itself as abandoned by its own Government, and left to grapple as it may with the legislation of foreign countries; with laws made to oppress them, and to favor their competitors. He would therefore sustain no bill in which the right of regulating foreign trade so as to protect our own labor was denied. If gentlemen carried such a proposition, it would not be by his vote, and he considered any bill which looked to an ultimate equalization of duties tantamount to this.

He considered the theory that duties ought to be equal or of the same amount on all imports, as false and unsound, both in finance and public policy. Yet such a doctrine seemed to have crept into different parts of the House, and to be treated with some respect, though it had not the sanction of the experience of any nation under heaven. The country had arrived at a crisis in its affairs when it was necessary to diminish the revenue, because the public debt was paid. It had been reduced some 10,000,000 dollars, but it was said it must be reduced more; and the doctrine on one side of the House was, that, in adjusting it, we had no right to discriminate, by putting a higher duty on one article of import more than on another, but the duty must all be alike. It was against this doctrine, which was full of evil, that he protested. The avowed object, in passing the present bill, is to reduce the revenue. Now, he said, look at the operation. There is a duty of thirty per cent. or thereabouts, on shoes, boots, leather, hats, cabinet ware, and a vast number of other articles made by our mechanics. From these articles no revenue is derived, because none or next to none are imported. The business is now in the hands of a great body of worthy, industrious citizens, who supply the demand of the country, and furnish the goods much cheaper than we should find them if we depended entirely on foreign supply. If this duty is reduced to twenty per cent., is it for the purpose of reducing the revenue? You cannot reduce nothing: the reduction of the duty is not therefore reducing revenue. But it is an experiment, to see if you cannot introduce the foreign articles, and thus increase the revenue, to the injury of your own labor, and fill the treasury, when you profess to desire to empty it. If gentlemen are desirous in assuming this as a principle, and it produces an effect exactly opposite to what is designed, it ought to be abandoned as absurd.

If a bill is brought in to reduce revenue, he wished some reasonable assurance that if it became a law it would accomplish the purpose for which it was made. The instructions of the gentleman from South Carolina proposed to bring all duties, without discrimination, to twenty per cent., and this, in order to get rid of revenue. He called on the House to understand the matter before they voted upon it. It was an insidious attack upon the mechanics and laborers of the country. If, by running the duties down, you succeed in introducing foreign hats, boots, shoes, hoes, spades, shovels, axes, &c. then your own workmen are displaced from their business; the revenue, which is already too abundant, is increased, and there must be a further reduction of duties to deplete the treasury again; and this course will be pursued until the experiment shifts our workshops to foreign countries. This mode of reducing revenue is false, insidious, treacherous, and better calculated to reduce laborers to poverty than to reduce the revenue; and he protested against it as a theory unsound in finance and unwise in public policy.

He said he should give his support to no bill which reduced the duties to a level of twenty per cent., because that with a foreign valuation would afford no adequate protection; nor would any measure which abandoned the principle of discrimination in levying duties obtain his support, because that would be an abandonment of the principle of protection. He would, therefore, express an earnest hope that the House would look with care to this new theory of equalization of duties, before they give it any countenance, either in finance or as a measure of public policy. Whoever adopts it will find, by abandoning discrimination, he gives up the exercise of his own understanding, yields his country to foreign regulation, and adopts a doctrine that, both in increasing and diminishing revenue by an increase or decrease of duties, will produce a result exactly the opposite of what is designed on many articles subject to duty. He would only add one word: Is any truth more obvious to the minds of all men than that some articles of taxation can and ought to bear a heavier burden than others?

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that, from some observations which fell from the gentleman from Kentucky, he supposed that it was the opinion of that gentleman that if this bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions, the report of that committee would not necessarily be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If such were the fact, he certainly should be in favor of sending the bill to the committee with instructions; but he believed that it made no manner of difference in that respect, whether this bill went to the committee with or without instructions. The report of that committee, under the rules of this House, would necessarily have to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But he said there was no good reason for committing the bill at all; he should much prefer to have the various amendments which had been adopted in the Committee of the Whole to this bill, read, considered, and disposed of—either adopted or rejected; and after the bill had been gone through, then, if any gentleman could propose some definite measure as a substitute, it would be in order for its consideration. He felt somewhat astonished that any gentleman should offer a resolution for the commitment of this bill with instructions, without having well matured and well considered those instructions in principle and in detail. What possible benefit, he would ask, could result by committing this bill with loose and indefinite instructions? He greatly preferred, if it was to be again committed, that the commitment should be entirely untrammelled with any instructions. The Committee of Ways and Means would have the benefit of the discussions and the debates which have taken place upon the bill which emanated from them. They would have the benefit of the propositions which have been submitted in committee and out of committee; and they would undoubtedly be profited by those suggestions in their further deliberation upon the subject. But he was entirely opposed, at this time, and in this House, now to settle on the specific instruction to be given to the Committee of Ways and Means. He was aware that there would be left no time for action; that so much time would be unavoidably occupied in fixing upon the character of the instructions, that it would be impossible for this House to have sufficient time left for the necessary action upon the bill which might be prepared by the committee, to have it reach the Senate in season to be considered in that branch of the Government. He, for one, believed that the vote of the House yesterday, upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to lay this bill on the table, gave the fullest evidence that there was a decided majority in favor of a proper modification of the tariff at the present session of Congress. He most sincerely desired to have this disturbing question put at rest, and that at the present time. Under all circumstances, he should vote against committing the bill with any instructions; and as it seemed to be the wish of his friends to send it again to the Committee of Ways and Means, in the belief that they could report a bill which would better accord with the public expectation and popular feeling, he would not oppose such a reference, if the whole subject can go to the committee unembarrassed with instructions.

Mr. ISACKS said he regretted that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WAYNE] had renewed the motion for instructing the committee. He should vote against it. And he should do so from the desire that the House might have one argument instead of having two. They were the clearest indications, as well from the various amendments which had been proposed, as from the remarks with which they had been accompanied, that the House was likely to spend quite as much time in discussing what the instructions should be, as they had in discussing the bill; and even more: because the previous question could not be put, without removing the instructions altogether. And thus they were likely to spend what little space of time remained, after learning who was to be President, and deciding who was to be printer, without coming to any conclusion. He was for leaving the committee untrammelled. Let them give the House a bill, and then it would have but one argument, instead of two, and thereby save just one-half the time.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WILDE congratulated the House, and himself, on the very sudden change which had recently taken place. On Saturday, the members of the Committee of Ways and Means had been invited to bring forward some proposition of compromise, but had given no response to the call: not from any reluctance in presenting their views, nor from any want of courtesy, but for a very obvious reason, viz. the intrinsic difficulty of the subject itself. Last year the House had had a project from the Secretary of the Treasury, and then a report from the Committee of Ways and Means. These had met with no favor. Next came a report from the Committee on Manufactures, which was so modified as at length to be not satisfactory even to the gentleman himself, who had reported it. At the present session, the bill had been reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, which seemed to be much disapproved of, and was likely to be more so before the session was over. Now there was a proposition to recommit, and, thereupon, a flood of different projects, in the form of instructions, none of which, as yet, seemed to be satisfactory to the House. He hoped, however, that one of them would be adopted. It should certainly receive his most zealous support. What was to be done? Proceeding in this manner did but waste time. It certainly would not be agreeable to him, nor, as he presumed, to his colleagues on the committee, to be bound to seek out among all the speeches, and arguments, and propositions of gentlemen, what were the actual sentiments and wishes of the House. It was plainly impossible for the committee to ascertain what the bill of the House was; and that for a very good reason, viz. that the House did not seem exactly to know what its own mind was. A committee who could discover, from such a scene as was now exhibited, what this House desired them to do, must possess powers far more extraordinary than any to which he or his colleague laid claim.

But as to the bill as amended, and as it stood at that moment, with all its modifications, Mr. W. did not know that he could devise a bill more honestly intended, or that would more certainly effect the reduction of the revenue, and the peace and harmony of the whole country. He earnestly hoped that, by mutual sacrifices of prejudices on both sides, the House would that day be able to come to some satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. E. EVERETT inquired of the Chair whether the recommitment of the bill, without instructions, would not completely, and at once, undo all that had been done by the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR replied, certainly it would.

Mr. E. said he could then readily conceive that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] would heartily approve of such a proposition. It got rid, by a very summary process, of all the amendments which had been made to his bill; and returning it to the committee in its naked shape, they could so model it as to render it more acceptable, and give it a greater prospect of passing. There was no difficulty of comprehending this.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that this House had got itself into a very singular predicament. They seemed unanimously to have agreed that the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means was not such as any body could approve. And it was now proposed to send again to the same committee to make another bill, that the House might go over the same ground again. And even admitting that the instructions now proposed should be adopted, they would be no nearer the object they sought; for if a bill should be reported, as proposed, it would be just as liable to opposition and amendment as that which the committee had reported before. Mr. H., for one, should certainly oppose it stoutly. And so, if any other of the plans of instruction should be adopted, they would still be in the same situation. He entirely agreed with his friend from Massachusetts, in being very happy that the House had not taken the bill. But where would be the use of recommitting it without instructions? It would be utterly impossible for the Committee of Ways and Means, or indeed any body else, to discover what was the will of the House at that moment. He hoped that the motion to recommit with instructions would not prevail.

Mr. WAYNE observed that the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] seemed to have created a very general impression that if gentlemen voted to commit the bill with instructions, they would be committed to sustain the bill, if reported accordingly. Such was not the fact. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, for instance, differed from all others in this, that the duties on non-protected articles were to rise or fall according to the state of the revenue. Now, could not a gentleman vote for the proposition as a whole, without committing himself to sustain that particular feature? Certainly he could. He might vote for it on the general principle that manufactures were to be protected for seven years to come, and that then the revenue was to be reduced to the wants of the Government. By recommitting the bill without instructions, time would be lost—and time was now all-important—because the committee would have to inquire, and spend much time in ascertaining what the will of the House was. It had been urged that if the committee reported a bill, it would have to go to a Committee of the Whole, where the previous question could not be called. This was very true; but what better off were gentlemen now, with numerous and conflicting amendments before them, on which the previous question could not be called, without bringing them back to the original bill?

To recommit with instructions was no novel proceeding, and the instructions proposed contained more, much more, than gentlemen were aware of. It had been offered by the South in good faith, with an honest endeavor to conciliate, and with the earnest hope that its adoption would allay the public discontents. To adopt the bill now before the House, though it might give contentment to one quarter of the Union, would raise rebellion in another, and excite at the North a feeling little short, in violence, of that which now existed at the South. It was in the hope of bringing the House to a measure of effectual conciliation that Mr. W. was thus earnest. Was not the proposal now offered better than the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means? Would it not give the manufacturers protection and peace for seven years to come? Was it not to be preferred to doing nothing? Was it not better than letting the present discontent fester for nine months longer, and be yet further aggravated by the excitement of a presidential election? It was his earnest desire that the House might return here the next session with this vexing question so effectually settled, that no political aspirant should be able to vault into power by a successful settlement of it. But if things should be sufferred to remain as they were, the protective system would be in imminent danger. Its danger would increase every day; and it would probably fall—and fall, not to the advantage of the South, but to the agitation and discontent of the whole country.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he was happy to perceive that nothing was to be done that night. To-morrow, he believed, was the day appointed for counting the votes for President and Vice President. He would therefore move that the consideration of the subject be postponed till the day after.

The SPEAKER said the subject must of course lie over. The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bill:

AN ACT authorizing the sale of the Bank Stock of the United States.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell the shares owned by the United States in the Bank of the United States, on such terms as he may deem most for the interest of the United States: Provided, That no stock be sold for less than the market value thereof, or for less than the par value.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Bank of the United States to purchase said stock, or any part thereof; any thing in any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill having been read, and the question of course being on ordering it to a second reading,

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, objected, (which at this stage is equivalent to a motion for rejection,) and the question being then stated in the form required by the rule, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

Mr. WICKLIFFE rose, and said he was impelled, by a sense of his duty to his constituents and to his country, to do, in this case, what he had never done since he had had a seat on this floor—to move the rejection of a bill at its first reading. There are cases, said Mr. W., in which courtesy should yield to the demands of justice and public duty; and this, in my humble judgment, is one of them. I do believe that the passage of this bill is not demanded by any public consideration. It is fraught with incalculable ruin to all private interest, except the interest of the stockjobbers of Wall street. I will say nothing of the interest which political stockjobbers may feel in the measure now before you. This measure will inflict injury, perhaps ruin, upon many of your honest, and I might say, in reference to the interest which they have in this institution, unprotected citizens. Its immediate effect would be to reduce thirty-five millions of the stock of the country, performing, in a great measure, the functions of a circulating medium in our commercial exchanges, ten per centum in its value. Possibly I may over-estimate the loss; but I think not. This time last year this stock commanded, in the markets of the world, from twenty to twenty-five per centum advance. The ruinous policy which the administration of the country has pursued towards this institution, has sunk the value of this capital twenty per cent., equal to seven millions. The United States has sustained a loss in the value of the stock held by the Government, equal to one million four hundred thousand dollars, and yet the Committee of Ways and Means propose a measure by which the Government will inevitably sustain a further loss of more than one million. For what reason? And why is this mad policy, sir, I might be allowed to say, this wicked measure, proposed? I have heard none, nor can I discover any, save that the President of the United States has recommended it.

Is it wise to sell, at a sacrifice, stock yielding an interest of six per centum to the Government, that money may lie idle in the treasury? Is not our treasury, at this time, said to be overflowing? Has not the administration told us that the present tariff will yield us at least six millions of money more than is needed for all the wants of the Government? We have been for weeks, sir, endeavoring to devise some plan, some revenue system, which shall prevent this dangerous accumulation of money in the treasury. The very existence of the Union is said to be in danger if we do not adopt some such system, and still we are now required by the administration to adopt this measure, which is to add to a redundant treasury seven millions more. What do the administration design to do with this seven millions when it shall reach the treasury? Is it needed to pay the public debt? No, sir. Is it required to meet the ordinary or extraordinary expenditures of the Government? Not at all. Why, then, I demand to know of the honorable gentleman who has reported this bill, are we called upon to adopt or to consider this measure?

Will the honorable gentleman, or any man, venture to state, on this floor, that the stock in this bank is not good? Will he venture the opinion upon the country, after the full and satisfactory evidence which has been afforded him, that this institution is not solvent, perfectly solvent? Sir, I will answer the question for him—he will disclaim any such opinion. The bill itself, Mr. Speaker, has enabled me to answer the question for the whole Committee of Ways and Means. The stock is to be sold at its market price or at par, by the terms of the bill. I take it, then, as an admitted fact upon the record, that, in the opinion of the committee, this stock is worth par; for I will not impute to the committee so unworthy a design as an attempt to impose upon the country stock at par which they believed not to be worth par value.

But, sir, there is an ambiguity in the expression, to be sold at its market price, or at par, which I am not able to explain. Should the market price of this stock fall, as I believe it will if you pass this bill, below par—should it fall to ninety-five—will not the Executive be authorized to sell at ninety-five? He is to sell at par value, or the market price. If he cannot get par, will he not take the market price? If this should be the construction of the bill, and I can place upon it no other, it will present a most glorious harvest for the speculator in stocks. Your market price of stocks would soon be run down. Shall we bring into market seven millions of the people's money, admitted to be good, in order to have it depreciated and run down, that speculators may thrive?

Does the honorable member who reported this bill feel himself authorized to state to this House that the Committee of Ways and Means believe this Government stock unsafe in that institution? I will venture to answer this question for him in the negative. They have no such opinion. The evidence before them repudiates such an opinion. The insinuation of such an opinion belongs to the partisan presses of the times. If then the stock is safe, if the Government do not need the funds, if a sale be made, the United States must sustain a loss, and private injury be inflicted upon our own citizens. Why, I ask, why this bill to sell the stock? I shall be answered, because the President has recommended it. In this instance I have the misfortune to differ with the President, and must beg leave to decline an acquiescence in this his recommendation, until some better reason be furnished.

Sir, we present to the world a most extraordinary spectacle. We—no, sir, the administration—have been striving for months to convince the public that the Bank of the United States is insolvent; that its currency was sinking, or likely to sink, in value; that it was unsafe; and under this declaration they propose to come into market with seven millions of this stock, which they have proclaimed to be in a doubtful condition, and propose to sell it at par. Sir, this would scarcely be considered honest in a private individual: how it ought to be estimated when done by a Government, I will leave others to determine. The whole course which has of late been pursued towards that institution by the administration, has not its parallel in the modern history of any civilized Government.

In the Congress of the United States is vested the exclusive power of coining money and regulating the value thereof, to regulate commerce, and also authority to carry into effect these and other delegated powers. Under some one or all of these powers, Congress heretofore created a bank, in order to furnish the community with a safe, sound, and uniform currency. Such this bank did furnish, all admit. And when the currency was at its greatest possible value, enjoying, as it deserved, the confidence of the whole people, we see the whole power and influence of an administration, headed by perhaps the most popular man in this our day, exerted for the purpose—perhaps I should say, to the effect of depreciating the value of that currency, at a time when seventeen millions of it is in the hands of a confiding community. What would be the consequences of such a policy to a ministry in another country, where liberty is not more valued than here, I cannot say. A British Parliament would not dare to second or sustain it.

Sir, I will suppose, for the sake of the argument, what I do not believe, and what those who have asserted in the public prints do not themselves believe, that this institution, from the corrupt and bad management of its directory, is in danger of becoming bankrupt. The General Government is the joint stockholder, has had a share in the management of this governmental agent. The notes of this institution are in the hands of our citizens to the amount of seventeen millions. Our citizens are its debtors to the amount of sixty millions; a portion of them, including widows and orphans, owning twenty millions of its capital. What does morality, what does justice, what does public faith require at our hands? That we should exert all the power which a prudent and just regard to the administration of the finances of the country would permit, to avert the wide-spread ruin which the failure of such an institution must produce.

The bank, however, sir, does not ask this. She does not thus need the aid of this Government. All that she desires at your hands is justice, is to be let alone, to be permitted to enjoy the privileges guaranteed in her charter, for which you have received an ample equivalent. I, sir, demand this of you, not for the sake of the bank or her stockholders, but I demand it in the name of my constituents. Let your stock remain, and share the common fate of that of your citizens, who have made investments upon the plighted faith of their Government. Whilst the Government continued to own stock, and to appoint, on its part, honest and competent men as directors, who looked to the interest of the Government, the bank, and the community, in the discharge of their duty, your citizens felt as if their stock was safe, and the currency of the bank was sound. They still feel so, notwithstanding the departure from that course which previous administrations had pursued towards the bank.

The United States still have a controlling influence over that institution. Your President appoints one-fifth of its directory. Your Secretary is furnished weekly with statements of the condition of the bank. Congress has power to appoint a committee to examine into the books, accounts, and dealings of the bank. All these furnish guaranties to the country. But, sir, if you sell the Government stock, dismiss your directors, and withdraw the supervisory power of the treasury and of this House, you may put it in the power of a corrupt directory of that bank, should such a one be found, to swindle the community out of millions in closing the concerns of that institution. No, sir: the Government should retain its stock, its supervisory power, and see that the bank, if it must close its operations in 1836, closes them honestly and fairly; first paying its debts, and then dividing in due and equal proportion the stock to the whole stockholders.

Sir, I well remember, in 1827, when the stock in this bank was worth twenty-five per cent. advance, a distinguished gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. Barbour,) then a member of Congress, submitted a resolution of inquiry, merely, into the expediency and propriety of selling the seven millions of stock held by the Government in the Bank of the United States. At that time, sir, we had a pressing demand for revenue to meet the payments of the public debt, falling due more rapidly than our means enabled us to meet. He proposed it as a financial measure. I remember, also, sir, the instantaneous effect the proposition had upon the value of the stock. The resolution met favor nowhere, though honestly and fairly designed by the mover as a measure of finance. It was voted down in this House by an almost unanimous voice, only nine members voting for the proposition.

If sound policy and good faith forbade the passage of such a resolution, and sale of the stock in 1827, the same policy and good faith demand the instant rejection of this wicked bill, for I can call it by no milder name.

We have now no public debt for which this money is needed. We have an overflowing treasury, into which the revenue is pouring faster than we can find uses for it, and still the administration and the Committee of Ways and Means desire that we shall sacrifice our stock, inflict individual ruin, excite anew the alarm which false clamor for a time put in motion, that seven millions more of surplus shall accumulate in the treasury, to lie dormant, or be squandered by inconsiderate legislation. All this is to be done, for what? For public good? No, sir. For the benefit of individual speculation. Away with such a project—strike from existence at once such a bill.

Sir, said Mr. W., I am not taken by surprise by the presentation of this bill. I have anticipated it for many weeks. I have watched events in another quarter, and have not mistaken the signs of the times. This measure is to be followed up with another, part and parcel of the same predetermination before we met here. The Government deposits are to be withdrawn. They are wanted elsewhere! State banks are to be enlisted as soldiers in the next campaign. The Government deposits are wanted to pay the bounty.

The solicitude I have felt upon this subject, and the feeble efforts I have made to prevent these measures of the administration, have not arisen from any personal considerations. To me, sir, the stockholders in the bank are unknown. I have received no favors, and desire none, of the institution; but my constituents and my country have a deep interest at stake.

The entire West at this time is witnessing the blessed effects resulting from the efforts of this administration to cripple and embarrass the operations of the Bank of the United States. The course pursued by the Government has compelled the bank to press heavily upon its debtors in that quarter. We have a country rich in soil and productions, not much surplus capital, a population industrious and enterprising, able to meet their engagements; but, if pressed, we must expect a fall in the value of our real estate, and the productions of our labor. Is it then just, is it wise, to pursue a policy toward the Bank of the United States, which must compel it still more rapidly to withdraw its circulation? If the bank is let alone, we shall weather the storm in safety, without a resort to the ruinous policy of 1819, '20. I am prompted in my opposition to this measure by on principle no blind opposition to the measures of this administration, be they right or wrong. Such a principle has never regulated my action in this House, and I trust never will.

H. OF R.]

Bank of the United States.

The Government deposits are to be withdrawn, sir, and where will you place them? In the State banks, I am told—yes, sir, in your State banks. And what is the condition of State banks? Who can answer for their solvency? Withdraw the Bank of the United States, and what restraint is there to excessive, and in some cases fraudulent issues of State bank paper? We have had, in former years, some lessons of woful experience upon the use of these miserable rag shops, for I can call them nothing else, as places of deposit for the public revenue. I have a list of such as broke with your deposits, by which the United States sustained a loss of 1,400,000 dollars. Sir, I will not take up the time of the House in reading this list; I will cause it to be appended to my remarks, which, to use the phrase of a former worthy member of North Carolina, is made "more for Buncombe" than for this House. Sir, I wish my constituents to understand where this administration design to put their money for safe keeping. This loss, sir, was sustained in the course of one or two years' experiment with these State banks. The United States Bank for sixteen years has been the place of your Government deposits. It has been the agent by which you have collected and disbursed $440,000,000 without the loss of the forty-eighth part of a cent to the Government. Do you expect to find a better agent? No, sir.

Sir, I should like to be informed by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] the organ of the Committee of Ways and Means on this occasion, whether that committee have investigated the true condition of the Bank of the United States, whose situation was such, in the opinion of the Executive, at the opening of the present session, as to render it doubtful whether it could be regarded as a safe deposit of the public revenue. Whether he is prepared to echo the sentiment expressed in the Executive message upon this subject.

I will venture the statement, sir, that that committee has had before it the evidence which will satisfy all impartial and candid minds of the perfect solvency and ability of the institution. Sir, there never was a period since the bank was established, when its means were more ample in proportion to its debts, than they are at the present moment. And every day's operation increases and invigorates its strength and its ability. All the efforts made to cripple the institution heretofore, have failed, and the injury aimed at the bank has fallen upon the community. And such will continue to be the effect of all such unjustifiable acts on the part of the Government. I will, sir, with the permission of the House, refer to a part of the evidence in the possession of the Committee of Ways and Means upon this subject. It is a statement of the condition of the bank on the 1st January, 1833.

The claims against the bank are:

1st. Notes in circulation	-	-	$17,459,571 79
2d. Deposites, public and private	-	-	13,547,517 95
3d. The debt to the holders of the funded debt	-	-	6,723,703 16
4th. Unclaimed dividends	-	-	76,529 84

Amounting to - - - $37,807,322 74

Its resources are:

Specie	-	-	$8,951,847 60
Notes of State banks	-	-	2,291,655 04
Balances due by State banks	-	-	1,596,252 08
Funds in Europe and foreign bills of exchange	-	-	3,190,225 43
Real estate	-	-	3,036,241 52
Debts due by individuals, viz.
On notes discounted	-	-	43,626,870 32
On domestic bills of exchange	-	-	18,069,043 25
Mortgages, &c.	-	-	103,333 75

Making - - - $80,865,468 99

From which sum of $80,865,468 99 deduct the sum due by the bank, ($37,807,322 74,) and there remains an excess of $43,058,146 25.

This sum of forty-three millions forms a guaranty to the holders of the notes of the bank, and to its depositors, over and above the whole amount of their claims.

Mr. Speaker, is it not idle, sir, is it not worse than idle, is it not wicked, longer to continue this warfare upon the bank and its currency? I will not take up the time of the House by entering into a comparative statement of the ability of the Bank of the United States and any of the local banks. I have the materials of such a comparison before me, and I am warranted in saying there does not exist a bank in the United States possessing greater means, I will say as great, in proportion to its capital, to meet its engagements, as the Bank of the United States.

After the short debate in this House at the commencement of the session, upon the incipient measures which have led to the report of this bill, in which debate I took an humble part, a friend of mine, a personal friend, as if anxious to convince me that it was in vain, by any effort on the part of Congress, to save the Bank of the United States, remarked that it was in vain to struggle, for the President intends to crush the bank, and he will do it. Sir, the declaration made a deep impression upon my mind. It caused a reflection upon the statesmanlike contest carried on by a President of the United States against the currency of the Government in the hands of the people. This man, though he did not speak by authority, or as one having authority, I would sooner take his opinions of what the President willed or intended, than the opinions of any man or set of men.

Though I have regretted to believe there was such a settled purpose on the part of the administration, it has not abated my anxiety to defeat it by all fair means, nor shall any responsibility prevent me from exposing to my constituents the evil and ruinous consequences of such a course. As one step toward arresting the evil, or at least of putting off the evil day, I have moved you, sir, to reject this bill, and I desire the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Statement referred to in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 4th of December, 1832, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th July, 1832, showing the amount of losses sustained by the United States, by using local banks as places of deposit.

Mr. POLK expressed his surprise that opposition was made to the bill at this stage. It was most unexpected to him. He had expected it to take the usual course, and he had intended, at the proper time, to move its commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where the fullest opportunity for discussion would be afforded. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] in his fresh zeal for the bank, manifested upon more than one occasion during the session, had, however, chosen, as he said, to meet it at the threshold, and move its rejection. The gentleman from Kentucky says he had anticipated this proposition; that he had expected such a bill to be reported. He need not have so informed us; for he seems to have come to his seat this morning prepared with notes and documents to make a set speech upon the subject. [Mr. WICKLIFFE, in an under tone: Not at all, sir.] Mr. P. continued. The gentleman refers to documents and papers; but he did not, he said, complain of the gentleman's opposition to the bill, whether made by a prepared speech or not. What he said, was, that that opposition was unusual upon the first reading of a bill; and if the House was now forced to a decision, that opportunity for deliberation would not be afforded which was necessary to enable it to form a proper judgment upon the subject-matter itself. The gentleman had pronounced a eulogy upon the bank, and was pleased to add that the country had confidence in its solvency and its good management. This was not the time to consider whether that confidence was misplaced or not. It had no necessary connexion with a proposition to sell the Government stock. This bill authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the stock upon such terms as he shall deem most for the interest of the Government. It was an isolated proposition. It proposed to disenthral the Government from a partnership with its citizens in this incorporated company. It proposed to get rid of the interest which the Government had in this moneyed monopoly. It proposed to do this by a sale of the Government stock, upon terms not below the market value, or the par value. The gentleman did not seem to have examined the provisions of this bill, or, if he had, he had not understood them. The gentleman will not, he says, call this a wicked proposition, but there was scarcely any other term too harsh, in his judgment, to be applied to it. What, sir, for the owner of property to offer to sell it! Was the Government bound to continue the partnership as long as the bank or its friends chose to consider that it was for the interest of that institution that it should be continued? But the gentleman tells us that his remarks are intended principally "for Buncombe;" that his speech is for his constituents. He charges that the course of the administration towards the bank has oppressed the Western country, by compelling the institution to call in its loans, and withhold its accommodations. How had the administration done this? The gentleman had not chosen to inform us. Was it by requiring that the public money deposited by the Government in the bank should be applied to the payment of the public debt? Had the bank found it necessary to use the public funds to sustain its credit? Had it found it necessary to extend its loans to effect its own purposes? And did the gentleman complain that the Government had called for its own money when it wanted to pay the public debt? Or had the bank expected the Government to postpone the payment of the public debt for its benefit? Could the gentleman inform us? In what other way had the course of the administration compelled the bank to oppress the gentleman's constituents? The gentleman seems to have seized this occasion to express his opinion of the sound state of the bank. He hoped it might be so, but he confessed that nothing which had fallen from the gentleman had given him any light upon that point. This was not the time or the occasion to go into that inquiry. His statistics, too, in relation to the losses heretofore sustained by the treasury in consequence of the failure of local banks, which, Mr. P. said, he supposed were also intended for the benefit "of Buncombe," had nothing to do with the question now before the House. But the gentleman had also been pleased to say that he had been informed by some one—no one knows who—out of this House, at an early period of the present session, that all his efforts to sustain the bank would be fruitless, for the administration had willed its destruction; and, he added, that this bill was but another step towards the consummation of that determination. Sir, said Mr. P., I deny that the administration has willed any such thing. It was time that the Government had demanded its own money, in the hands of the bank, when it wished it to pay the public creditors; and it was also true that the Executive had recommended the sale of all stocks held by the Government, not only in this, but in all other incorporated companies. The foundation and stability of the bank must indeed be frail, if its destruction is to be produced by the mere transfer or sale of the Government stock. This was an admission which came with a bad grace from those who boasted of the safety and solvency of the institution. Was the gentleman prepared to concede that it was necessary for the Government to remain a part owner of the stock of the bank in order to sustain its credit? But, said Mr. P., under the impression that the bill would be permitted to take the usual course, he should not then trouble the House with the reasons which had induced the Committee of Ways and Means to report it. At the proper time he would do so. He thought the gentleman himself would see the propriety of permitting it to take that course.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Connecticut, said it was no doubt an unusual course, as had been just intimated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] to reject a bill on its introduction, without permitting it to take the usual reference. But he considered the present question as justifying that course, if any could, and was therefore glad that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had been thus promptly made. He would treat every proposition, coming from a committee of this House, with all the respect due to it, especially any one proceeding, as this did, from the committee (Ways and Means) to which he himself belonged; but he could not consider a motion to reject, under existing circumstances, as at all disrespectful to those who reported the bill. The agitation of seven millions of stock was a matter not of ordinary occurrence, or of light consequence—it reached interests altogether more delicate and important than the connexion of the Government with the bank. It affected the great class of private stockholders, most of whom had purchased into the institution at high prices, and whose property was most seriously affected by every movement like this, made within these walls. It was this class of the community who were constantly preyed upon by the gamblers and stockjobbers, who watch every movement here, and, by artful misrepresentations of our proceedings, or those of our committees, create a panic in the money market whenever it suits their interests to fleece the simple ones. Every thing we do in this matter is felt instantly in the great market of New York, and made the occasion of the most disgraceful operations. There is a chain of these speculators reaching from the lobbies of this hall to Wall street, as well connected as the chain of counterfeiters from Canada to the Atlantic cities. These men let no opportunity pass unimproved, to operate on the timid and retired shareholders in the Bank of the United States; and the shareholders of this description, comprising the trustees of unsettled estates, orphan children, and other persons out of the active scenes of life, now constitute a large portion of the present stockholders, for the knowing ones have long since cleared out, and generally at handsome profits from their first investments, leaving the helpless and the unprotected to take the chances of the wreck. Under these circumstances, we owe it to ourselves, we owe it to the country, to decide this question at once; whatever we do, will be best done, if done quickly. The majority of the committee who reported this bill, he was aware, did not wish to encourage the speculations to which he had referred; he therefore felt authorized to call on them even to unite with him in bringing this question to a speedy decision, whichever way it might go. If the House should think it good policy to part with the interests of the Government in the bank, let us say so at once, and if otherwise, then the sooner that determination is known, the better will it be for the country.

This bill proposes to throw seven millions of bank stock into the general market, at prices not less than par, the immediate effect of which is to bring at once the price of all the shares of individuals down to the same level; and probably when it is seen that the Government shows a disposition to dissolve its connexion with the bank, the fall will not stop there: you will drive it down, in all probability, far below the par value; in this way not only knocking down the property of others, but, by the same blow, defeating the very object which you profess, of selling out your own seven millions at the estimate fixed by the bill. The present selling prices are about three per cent. advance. The introduction of this bill necessarily diminishes the prices to that extent; for no one would be so simple as to buy at an advance to individuals, when your Secretary of the Treasury stands ready to sell his seven millions at a lower sum. Sir, have not the proprietors in this institution been yet punished enough? One year ago, their stock stood at about 25 per cent. advance. You have already driven them down at a loss of more than 20 per cent., and will you now insist on making them feel your power still further? And why are we asked to do this? We are told that we have high authority for this course, that it has the sanction of the officer at the head of the treasury. But he [Mr. I.] had seen no recommendation from that officer sanctioning the principles of this bill. When he spoke of the recommendations of the Secretary, he alluded, of course, to his reports, to the language official: for he [Mr. I.] knew nothing, in those matters, of the language confidential.

This project was first brought to the notice of Congress by the Secretary in his annual report at the last session. But he did not recommend such a measure as this; on the contrary, he "respectfully recommended to Congress to authorize the sale of those shares (the bank shares) for a sum not less than eight millions of dollars," to enable him to pay off a portion of the public debt. Mark the limit: a sum "not less than eight millions of dollars." And what are we now asked to do? This bill proposes to sell out our interest at a sum not less than seven millions, thus throwing away one million, or making that difference at least between the Secretary's recommendation just quoted, and the recommendation of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means. More than this: the Secretary did not recommend carrying this stock into the public market; for he was aware, and so expressed it, that such a measure must prove abortive, when attempted under circumstances calculated to shake the public confidence in the solvency of the institution, or its safety as a place of deposit. He only recommended a sale to the bank itself. Let me read from the Secretary's report again; you shall have his very language. Here it is: "A sale of so large an amount in the public market could not be expected to produce more than the par value; and, if attempted under circumstances calculated to shake public confidence in the stability of the institution, would in all probability prove abortive. For these reasons, it is deemed advisable to effect a sale to the bank itself—a measure believed to be practicable, on terms satisfactory both to the United States and that institution." This measure, therefore, ought not, and could not be chargeable to the Secretary; for there was nothing in his official report to warrant it.

Why then is it pressed upon us, when you see that the recorded opinions of the Secretary himself show you that it must, under existing circumstances, prove "abortive," and can only lead to wild speculations while this bill is hanging here? You have no public debt yet due, so that the money, if you could realize it from your bank shares, must remain idle in the treasury till the year 1834 and '35, when portions of the debt will be payable. You have been legislating all winter to keep a surplus out of the treasury: and will you now turn short about, and try to legislate a surplus into it? Will you make the very mischief which has been over and over again denounced as the worst of all political evils—a surplus in the treasury? or have gentlemen become at last convinced that their fancied surplus is, after all, nothing but fog?

There is another view in which he would present this question to the House as a financial measure. This stock now yields us $490,000 a year, an interest of 7 per cent. on the original investment. As you have no present use for the principal, you throw away this four hundred and ninety thousand dollars, the income of the current year, besides sinking three per cent. on the value of the principal sum, which would be $210,000 more, thus making in the whole a round loss to the treasury of seven hundred thousand dollars over and above what you have lost by depreciating the stock, since the Secretary valued it at eight millions one year ago. Mr. I. said there was something, he must say, undeserved and unkind in these repeated attacks on the bank. Sir, are you aware that the greatest losses this institution has ever met with have proceeded from their assuming the debts due from the local banks (formerly used as places of deposit) to the Government, at the time the institution went into operation? Such, he believed, was the fact. It was, he believed, capable of the clearest proof, that the Bank of the United States lost at least two millions of dollars, by assuming to the Government these doubtful debts. But for this, your "unavailable funds," now amounting to $1,400,000, would probably have been three or four millions. An institution that had rendered such services to the treasury in the days of its distress, ought not now to be harassed in this needless manner. Let it at least have a quiet and an easy death. He, for one, would not be instrumental in adding to, or prolonging its pangs, and he hoped a majority of the House would be of the same opinion.

Mr. WATMOUGH, of Pennsylvania, expressed his sincere regret at the necessity which compelled him, even for a very few moments, to intrude himself upon the notice of the House. But, said Mr. W., to remain silent on an occasion so important as the present—to withhold the expression, either of my opinion on the bill now proposed to us, or of my indignation against the unceasing, unflinching persecution which its presence here informs us is still to be waged against this great national institution, would be both disgraceful and derogatory to the sacred trust I am sent here to fulfil.

I confess myself quite at a loss to say which feeling predominates at this moment in my breast; amazement at the utter absence of sound financial views on the face of this bill, or detestation of the unrelenting spirit on the part of the administration, by means of its advocates on this floor, against an institution, admitted by the wisest and best men of the times to be as absolutely essential to the existence and safety of this Union, as, I had almost said, the constitution itself, which forms its basis. Sir, I have said I was amazed that such a bill, at such a crisis, could emanate from any committee of this House. That amazement, however, is wonderfully diminished when I recall to my mind the source from whence it does come. It is reported, sir, from the Committee of Ways and Means, and comes into this House under the parental care and peculiar auspices of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee. Need I say more? It is a scion of the same stock from whence sprung the famous submission bill, as it has been indignantly called, from one end of the country to the other. A bill, sir, allow me to say, which will go far to immortalize all who have had a hand in its concoction, which, after a most severe and painful travail through this House, during which it has suffered all the severity of anatomical dissection, has at length been permitted to drop, as it were, lifeless to the ground, and been buried under the mass of its own dissevered parts, or so changed as no longer to be recognised by its illustrious founders. A bill whose title in the first instance should have been amended so as to read—to enable the mighty British empire to maintain free of all cost its mass of miserable paupers, to the utter ruin of the free and intelligent yeomen of these United States. When I reflect on all this, sir, I can no longer be amazed at any thing coming from that source.

But, sir, what shall we say of the conduct of the administration in reference to this vast and important interest? How shall we extenuate that? Upon what plea can that be excused? Is it, sir, that the action of this institution is hostile to the welfare and happiness of the citizen, or injurious in its operations to the great commercial, manufacturing, agricultural, or planting interests of the nation? No one will ever pretend that such is the case. Is it that the mighty minds of those who now govern the destinies of this fair empire, are disturbed by the constitutional question, which once rang through this hall and divided the nation? No, sir, not so; for they repose with complacency on this ground, and confess it is placed beyond a doubt. What then can induce them, at a crisis so momentous as the present, when it is confessed on all hands that this Union is being shaken to its very centre—when the minds of all men are filled with the gloomiest forebodings of the future, and no one knows how soon the security each now feels in the present will vanish, perhaps forever—when, sir, not one single principle of our constitution is settled or established, even after the lapse of nearly half a century—what, I repeat, can induce them to come into this House, and before this nation, in a spirit of political recklessness, and ask us, the friends of fixed principles, to aid them in their unholy crusade, or expect us to remain silent while they make their insidious attacks? And this too, at a time when they know not to what quarter to look for support—who are their friends, and who their foes? It might be supposed, as some extenuation for them, that the high-minded, honorable, and talented individuals who administer the affairs of this institution, had indulged in feelings of a just indignation, and set themselves up in hostile array against their persecutors. Is this so? Will the honorable gentleman from Tennessee venture to assert it? He will not. He will say nothing here which he does not believe. Sir, there is no foundation whatever for this supposition. The bank has never stepped out of her prescribed constitutional path: her vaults have never been closed against the wants of the Government; and if the subject can be got at, I have no doubt it will be found, that even at a moment when the public deposits did not equal those of many private individuals, the demands of the Government were unhesitatingly met, and her wants supplied beyond, perhaps, her utmost hopes or expectations. I will venture no further on this track. I will seek no further to unravel what can only pain me. I will only take care that no anxious fear of having a like current turned against myself, shall induce me to swerve, even for an instant, from the severe path of my duty: that I do not fold my arms, and tamely abandon all the great principles of the Government, and every interest of my constituents, while the attempt is being made utterly to merge them in the vast malstrom of political expediency or party intrigue. Could I act thus, I should consider myself unworthy the name of freeman, much less worthy to be endowed with the high privilege of a representative of a free, manly, and highly intelligent people. No, sir, I shall fulfil my duty here, happen what may. I shall be deterred by no personal considerations; shall fear no personal consequences: personal imputations I dread not—I feel myself above them. No honorable member on this floor will make them, and such as come from corrupt and dishonorable sources out of doors will pass me as the idle wind. On the subject now before us, I feel myself strong. I stand, sir, on the broad basis of public opinion: I am sustained by the unanimous voice of my constituents, and of the whole moral and intelligent community, of which I am the humblest member. The House will pardon me if I indulge for a time in what may be termed the luxury of this moment. We are no longer engaged in that miserable system of bush-fighting, ay, sir, bush-fighting, in which we have been struggling for the last five or six weeks. I feel, sir, that I have my head above water. I breathe freely. The enemy has ventured from behind his entrenchments; modestly enough, it is true, but still, sir, he is out, and I am too happy to meet him on the plain. My voice shall reach the people, that they may know who are their friends, and who it is that seek, in the indulgence of a rank personal animosity, to corrupt the sources of their comfort and prosperity, diminish the value of their property, and take from them what they now enjoy—a fair and just equivalent for the toil of their hands, and the sweat of their brows. Will not this prove the issue of these reiterated attacks on the bank? Who can doubt it? No one, sir. I hold in my hands documents ample to prove it: I will presently refer to them; time will allow me to do no more at present.

And now, Mr. Speaker, to the point. My honorable friends who have preceded me in this debate have performed this day a great duty to their country, and with that firmness and intelligence which always distinguishes their efforts. My honorable friend from Kentucky has amply demonstrated the folly, if not wickedness, of this expense, in its effects upon the country at large, and more particularly upon the West; while my distinguished friend from Connecticut has with equal ability shown its unsound and ruinous character as a measure of finance. But what says the honorable gentleman from Tennessee? Why, forsooth, he has told us, in calm and modest language, and with a most unaffected simplicity of demeanor, that he was greatly surprised at the opposition to this bill; that it was nothing more than an isolated proposition. An isolated proposition, Mr. Speaker! And have we come to this, sir? Is it possible that an honorable member of this House, and from the Committee of Ways and Means too, can rise in his seat, and tell us, the assembled representatives of the people, that a proposition which strikes at the very existence of the most important national institution in this country, an institution whose benefits are as extensively felt and acknowledged as, I had almost said, the broad light of day itself, without whose agency it is well known the administration of affairs could not progress, and whose amount of exchanges in a single year, foreign and domestic, solely for the benefit of the Government, and the convenience of the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing and planting interests, exceeds the enormous sum of two hundred and fifty millions of dollars; is it possible, I say, that a proposition which strikes at the very existence of such an institution, and puts at hazard this vast convenience, in which the whole Union is so deeply interested, is to be called simply an isolated proposition! The honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means must excuse me. I cannot view it in that light. My financial vision, humble as it is, cannot adapt itself to such a focus. An isolated proposition, sir! I consider it, and respectfully invoke the attention of the House to this point, as part and parcel of that grand system of attack against this noble and ably administered institution, began at an early period of the present administration, fully developed in the ever memorable veto message, and now, sir, brought into this House, that we, too, may be made subservient and accessory to its completion. But I trust, sir, that the representatives of this great nation will at once boldly march up to this question, meet it at the very threshold, and crush it before its influences shall be allowed to contaminate the air we breathe. But, sir, the honorable gentleman of the Committee of Ways and Means goes further, and tells us that this bill simply proposes "to disenthral the Government from a partnership in this incorporated company." Why, sir, this is strange doctrine, to say the least of it. The bill proposes to separate at once the Government and the bank. Now, sir, although it is true that, when the Government invited its citizens to join in this partnership, there was no express stipulation to that effect, yet was there just moral ground to presume that the Government would not desert the stockholders until the term of the partnership had fully expired; and this presumption was the more natural, inasmuch as the citizen was but slow to subscribe in the first instance, and accepted but reluctantly the invitation to invest.

Bank of the United States.

Let it be remembered, too, that while the Government has derived every possible benefit from the labor and exertion of the stockholder, the latter has at no time received even legal interest for his money. This position, sir, in my humble opinion, constitutes a strong moral ground of objection against this bill. But there are others, and equally strong ones, presenting themselves to my mind. I cannot abandon the hope that the people of these United States will, before long, have their eyes opened to the true state of this question. I firmly believe that, even at this moment, party discipline aside, a vast majority of them are in favor of renewing the charter of this bank. I will not therefore consent that their interest in the renewal of this charter should be thus extinguished; and, so far as my humble voice and exertions can go to accomplish it, I am resolved that they shall not only have the benefit of the bonus to be paid hereafter for the renewal, but likewise have all the advantage of the increased value of the seven millions, in consequence of that renewal, which cannot fail to amount to from two to three millions of dollars. This, sir, may never happen: I anticipate the reverse. And I do not hesitate here, in my place, to express my conviction, that when that question again comes up for consideration on this floor, and the country and Congress are put in possession of the documents proving the actual condition of this bank, and the vast benefits that result to the Union from it, that public opinion will make it imperative upon both Congress and the Executive to add their sanction to its judgment, and continue the benefits of this institution to the people, without which, having so long enjoyed them, they would become poor indeed.

And now, sir, let me ask the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, how and to whom does he propose to sell this stock? to the bank or to individuals? If it be to the bank he looks, surely it is with but little hope, for the bank has been hitherto managed with too distinguished skill to suppose it capable of the folly of reducing its capital, in direct opposition to the spirit of its charter, which assigns thirty-five millions of dollars as the amount necessary to enable it to perform its duties to the country, of diminishing its business, and curtailing its means of usefulness.

If, then, the bank be out of the question, it is scarcely probable that any honest capitalist will, under present circumstances, seek it as a permanent investment. It must therefore remain a long time in the market, before it can become absorbed by the community, greatly depressing the value of the property of the present stockholders, depreciating daily in its own, to the great injury of the nation at large, and only tending to illustrate the wretched infatuation upon which the financial concerns of this nation are based. It follows, then, as my honorable friend from Kentucky has clearly shown, that no one remains but the profligate speculator or the Government partisan, to avail themselves of this chance; a combination which we, as legislators, should ever consider it among the first and highest of our moral duties to discountenance and banish.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that time is not allowed me by the rules of the House to go fully into this subject. I hold the document in my possession to demonstrate most satisfactorily to this House, that certainly there does not exist at this moment, perhaps there never has at any time existed, an institution so sound in all its parts, so beautifully harmonious in its action, and beneficial in all its results, as this much calumniated, much abused Bank of the United States.

I beg honorable gentlemen from the West and Southwest, and, let me add, too, from the South, who entertain feelings hostile to this institution, not to be led astray by vague, indefinite charges and idle clamor, no matter from what source they may come, or under what garb they may approach them. Let them examine the system of domestic and foreign exchanges, of which this institution is constitutionally the agent, and the enormous amount of which I have heretofore alluded to, exceeding, in one single year, the sum of 250,000,000 dollars: let them test the operation of this system upon their own constituents, the value of their crops and of their property generally, and then let them calmly ask themselves, can we, in the face of this evidence, on any ground of political expediency, or party policy, lend ourselves to prostrate this institution, and with it the value and comfort of all that is most dear to us? Let them examine and admire the admirable theory of its action, its vital principle, by means of which it expands, with admirable effect, to meet every exigency, and having completed its sphere of duties, again contracts itself as business subsides, and thus preserves the whole atmosphere of trade and commerce, as it were, sound and healthful. The calm, dispassionate, unprejudiced, patriotic mind will not for a moment hesitate.

But, sir, while on this subject, and before I take my seat, the House will pardon me while I take as concise a view as possible of the grave, and, in my opinion, most unaccountable charge against the bank, made from the highest quarter, as to its solvency and security as a place of deposit of the public funds. I do not know, sir, how I can better illustrate the fallacy of this charge, than by a reference to a document I hold in my hand, from which I quote a few facts, as they appear in the report of the New York Legislature, made on the 31st of January, 1833.

From this it will be seen that the whole amount of banking capital in the United States, independent of the Bank of the United States, is one hundred and twenty-four million five hundred thousand dollars, their circulation 68,332,556 dollars; and that the whole amount of specie in their vaults did not exceed 10,953,950 dollars. Compare with this, at the same period, and immediately after having effected, without the least disturbance whatever, either to the currency of the country, or its business in any branch whatever, fifteen millions of dollars of the public debt, the situation of this insolvent institution, its capital thirty-five millions of dollars, its circulation 17,667,444 dollars, while the specie in its vaults equalled the sum of 9,040,050 dollars. And yet, sir, we are told, in the face of facts so easily got at, and in defiance of all collateral evidence of the most unrivalled prosperity, that the bank is insolvent, and not a fit place of deposit for the public funds! Sir, it is difficult to believe this. History will not credit that any administration could be so regardless of public opinion, or so reckless in the prosecution of its ends, as to give utterance to charges so fatal in their character, not more to the credit of the bank than to the character of the Government and nation both at home and abroad, and unsupported by even the shadow of proof.

But, sir, I have not yet done. Every one knows what for some time past has been the condition of England: laboring under a state of the highest political ferment, distracted in her councils, her ancient institutions tottering to their base, and on the eve of a vast moral as well as political revolution, it became necessary to subject her great moneyed institution to an investigation as rigorously as it was no doubt skilfully managed, and what was the result? Why, it was found that the Bank of England, with a capital of 72,765,000 dollars, a circulation of 90,258,550 dollars, had of specie in its vaults a sum amounting only to 26,465,750 dollars; and yet this institution is sustained by a report of the committee of Parliament, and represented by the Government to be in a most flourishing condition, while the administration of our own Government brings all its influence and patronage to bear against the great national bank of the Union, with the view to crush it, because, forsooth, its circulation does not equal half its capital, while the specie in its vaults nearly equals that contained in all the other banks of the country taken together, and falls short only by one-half its own amount of circulation. I blush, sir, while I state the fact. I wish my constituents, however, to know it, and ardently desire that all possible information on this deeply important subject may be laid before the whole body of the people.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee had, however, assured the House, the Government had not willed the destruction of the bank. The honorable gentleman has stated what he no doubt believes; his opportunities have, perhaps, enabled him to receive assurances which have satisfied his mind on that point; but, as I do not live under the same favorable auspices with the honorable gentleman, I only form my opinions from the great public acts of the Executive, and his advocates both here and out of doors. I am led to a different conclusion, quite, and to me it is a fact as evident as the sun at noon-day, that the destruction of the bank has long since been determined on, and will be consummated, unless, amid the political convulsions of the day, a new light should suddenly spring up, a new conviction arise of the sound moral as well as political expediency of renewing its charter, and of receiving it within the pale of those constitutional powers of the Government as essential in its sphere as the judiciary has, of late, been found to be important and paramount in the more grave and important orbit in which it is called upon to act.

Mr. W. hoped that, in any remarks he had felt himself called upon to make, he should not be considered as intending any thing personally disrespectful to any honorable member on this floor. Such, he assured the House, was not his intention. He hoped he knew too well what was due to the distinguished body before which he stood, and which had done him too much honor by the patient hearing they had bestowed on him; too well what was due to his constituents as well as to himself. It was true, he had assailed the action of the Committee of Ways and Means, and confessed himself entirely at a loss to conceive upon what ground or public document that could possibly have come before that committee, the bill then under consideration could have been based.

[Here the SPEAKER reminded the honorable gentleman that it was not in order to assail the acts of a committee.]

Mr. W. stated that he only intended to refer to the acts of the committee, as they had been brought before the House. Beyond that he did not wish to go—that surely afforded him ample ground. He again repeated that if, in the ardor of debate, any thing had dropped from him, calculated to wound personally, he should regret it extremely. In conclusion, he expressed the hope that the House would at once meet this question with the firmness and decision its importance demanded, and hoped that on his return home to his constituents, he might have it in his power to congratulate them and the country that a measure so fraught with ruin to them and it, had been met at once, and quashed in its very bud. He had done.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, then demanded the previous question; which motion being duly seconded, the previous question was ordered: Yeas 94, nays 90.

The main question was then put in the following form: "Shall this bill be rejected?" and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Allison, Arnold, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, N. Barber, Barringer, Barstow, Isaac C. Bates, Branch, Briggs, Bucher, Bullard, Burd, Cahoon, Choate, Collier, L. Condict, S. Condit, Bates Cooke, Cooper, Corwin, Coulter, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Creighton, Daniel, John Davis, W. R. Whereupon, the President of the Senate proclaimed that ANDREW JACKSON, of Tennessee, having a majority of the whole number of votes, was elected President of the United States for four years, from the 4th day of March next; and that MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, having a majority of votes therefor, was elected Vice President of the United States for the same term.

The Senate then withdrew, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14.
 GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Maine, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to employ a suitable person, in aid of the Topographical Bureau, for the purpose of ascertaining the geology and mineralogy of each of the several States of the Union, with a view to the construction of a mineralogical and geological map of the whole territory of the United States.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he should vote against the resolution, because he understood that the act of 1824, referred to in the resolution, had been practically nullified, inasmuch as the money intended to cover all the expense of surveying the routes of roads and canals had been withheld, and the surveys forbidden to proceed, unless the respective States where the surveys were to be made, would consent to bear the expense out of their own funds: of this, however, a gentleman behind him knew more than he. Now, if such was indeed the case, Mr. W. was against continuing a law, the only use of which would be to provide a good fat place for some man that wanted employment.

Mr. ANDERSON said that the resolution went to commit no one, to create no office, to take no money out of the treasury. If it were true that the law of 1824 had been annulled, then this resolution would be without effect.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said that as the gentleman from Kentucky had very unexpectedly called upon him for an explanation of the subject referred to, it might be proper for him to state, that a very important route for a railroad in the northeastern part of the State of Ohio, intended to connect Lake Erie with the Ohio river, having been proposed, an application had been made to the Secretary of War, signed by all the members of the Ohio delegation, by many members from the western part of Pennsylvania, and others, soliciting an examination of the route in question. The Legislature of Ohio had considered the object of so much importance that they had granted an act of incorporation to a company for the construction of the road, and it had been in contemplation to make an application to the General Government for aid to carry it into execution. The Secretary of War had taken up the subject, and, with the promptitude, which usually characterized the movements of that officer, had promptly informed them that the application would be granted, provided an appropriation for surveys under the act of 1824 should be made. It had been made; and the expectation of all had been, that the surveys would be made at the expense of the United States. A corps of engineers had been detailed, and part of them had arrived on the ground, when it was found that the bill had been so far countermanded as to throw the whole expense of the survey on the company, save the personal services of the engineer employed; the company had consequently been called together, and they had voted to refuse the offer. In consequence, the route had not been surveyed. The engineer had remained upon the line till near the fall, and had then asked and received leave of absence on furlough, on condition of reporting himself to the department once in every two weeks, that they might know where to direct orders.

A similar application had been made for the survey of a railroad from the Hudson river to Portage Summit, in Ohio. Great interest had been felt in this work in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, where it was universally considered as a work of great national importance. The applicants had been told that the survey would be made, but on the same conditions as those he had mentioned, respecting the other case. Engineers had been despatched, but an order from the President had suspended their operations.

Mr. ANDERSON said that the correctness or incorrectness of this statement would not affect the propriety of passing the resolution, since, if the President should refuse to employ the corps of engineers under the act of Election of Printer.—Land Reports.

[H. OF R.]

1824, the individual referred to in the resolution would, of course, not be appointed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said he was not to be understood as opposing the resolution.

Mr. BURD advocated the resolution in a short speech, in which he expressed his wish that the resolution could be so extended as to include all the relative resources of the different States, so that strangers and emigrants might have some guide in selecting where to locate themselves.

Mr. MERCER said he had not risen to oppose the resolution, being friendly to all inquiries of this character. He sustained the assertion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, as to the nullification of the law for surveys, and stated a correspondence between himself and the War Department, on the subject of assuming the reports of the Committee on Roads and Canals, when not contradicted by any legislation of the House, as the rule which was to guide the operations of the department in conducting the surveys.

Mr. VINTON moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "under the act of 1824," as he was not willing that the money which that law had destined to be employed in surveys, should be diverted to a different use.

Mr. MERCER further explained as to the history of a survey ordered in the neighborhood of Pittsburg.

Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, thinking this a dangerous initiation of a new system for expending the public money, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was negatived without a count.

Mr. VINTON's amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to change the direction of the resolution to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

This motion was negatived; and

The resolution was then agreed to.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

The hour having arrived at which the House had resolved to proceed to the election of a public printer,

Mr. SPEIGHT moved a call of the House.

The motion prevailed, and the House was thereupon called.

Eight members were absent—when the call was suspended.

Mr. MCCOY, of Virginia, then nominated Francis P. Blair.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, nominated Gales & Seaton.

Mr. WICKLIFFE nominated Duff Green.

Mr. COOKE, of New York, nominated Thurlow Weed.

The SPEAKER read a communication from William Greer & Son, proposing to do the work cheaper than any body else.

Mr. BURD, of Pennsylvania, thereupon nominated William Greer & Son.

Messrs. McCoy, Newton, Wickliffe, Cooke, and Burd, were appointed a committee to count the votes.

When the balloting commenced, and resulted as follows:

	1st Ballot.	2d Ballot.	3d Ballot.	4th Ballot.	5th Ballot.	6th Ballot.	7th Ballot.	8th Ballot.	9th Ballot.	10th Ballot.

At the close of the 10th ballot, it being after 4 o'clock, an adjournment was moved, which succeeded, and The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

The House resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, being the election of a printer to the House for the next Congress; the same tellers as yesterday acting. The following was the result of the several balloting:

	First.	Second.	Third.	Fourth.
For Gales & Seaton,	91	94	93	99
F. P. Blair,	90	91	90	94
Duff Green,	7	3	2	1
C. Raguet,	7	5	2	1
Blank,	4	3	2	2

After the third ballot,

Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, moved a resolution postponing the election until the first Thursday in the next session of Congress.

Mr. VINTON inquired of the Speaker if such a resolution was in order, under the law.

The SPEAKER replied that it was in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to lay the resolution on the table, stating that the postponement was inadmissible, inasmuch as the House was acting under a law which required the election to be made at the present session. He, however, waived his motion at the request of

Mr. WAYNE, who said that the House was now executing a law, and must proceed with the election unless the law be repealed. To postpone the election until the next session would violate the law, and could not be done without the interposition of the joint action of the two Houses. He read the act which enjoined the election of a printer at the close of every Congress; and hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would withdraw his resolution.

Mr. HALL then withdrew his resolution.

Mr. BOON, of Indiana, moved to postpone the election to the 3d day of March, (the last day of the session,) but being informed that the 3d was Sunday, he varied his motion to the 2d day of March, and demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to lay the motion on the table.

The SPEAKER said the motion to lay the motion on the table was not in order.

Mr. WICKLIFFE doubted the correctness of the decision of the Chair, and made some remarks to show that Mr. WILLIAMS's motion was in order.

The SPEAKER explained; and

Mr. WICKLIFFE not persisting in his opposition to the decision,

The question was taken on the motion to postpone the election to the 2d of March, and was decided in the negative, as follows: Yeas 92, nays 101.

Mr. HAWES then moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY demanded the yeas and nays, which were taken, and stood: Yeas 14, nays 173.

The fourth balloting then took place, which resulting as as above stated, Gales & Seaton were declared by the Speaker to be duly elected printers to the House of Representatives for the ensuing Congress.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

LAND REPORTS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the following resolution, viz.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House cause to be collected, arranged, and printed, for the use of the House of Representatives, such of the reports of the several boards of commissioners, and the registers and receivers when acting as boards, for the adjudication and determination of land claims in the several States and Territories, which reports were adverse to claimants, and which have not been printed heretofore by order of this House; and that the said Clerk cause to be made to the same a suitable index.

Mr. WILDE moved to postpone the resolution till Monday.

This motion gave rise to conversation and explanations, in which Messrs. WILDE, WICKLIFFE, CLAY, BULLARD, and VINTON took part.

Mr. VINTON condemned the motion as likely to occasion the printing of a vast mass of matter amounting to a number of volumes, without any useful result.

Mr. WICKLIFFE replied, and referred to the great facilities which would be enjoyed by the Land Committee, in consequence of having the record to refer to.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, supported the motion, as did Mr. BULLARD, Mr. MASON, and Mr. WHITTLESEY.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thought more deliberation was necessary before passing a resolution giving to an individual one of the heaviest printing jobs the House had ever offered.

Mr. WHITTLESEY warmly supported the motion as likely to save immense trouble to the Committee of Claims, a large part of whose labors were occasioned by cases from the Committees on the Public Lands and on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LEAVITT opposed the resolution, not having data as to the extent and expense of its consequences.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, explained, and urged the necessity of having such a record; the expense of improperly allowing one of those large land claims would cost the nation far more than the whole of this printing.

Mr. WAYNE suggested that an index might be prepared which would answer the whole purpose. He inquired of Mr. WICKLIFFE as to the number of volumes which would have to be printed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE could not exactly state, but supposed the whole expense would not exceed $2,000. He adverted to a claim which had been allowed by the Land Committee, but which would have been promptly rejected had the committee seen the records he now wished printed.

Mr. WAYNE said, if Mr. WICKLIFFE would examine and produce an estimate, he would vote in favor of the measure.

Mr. ASHLEY supported the resolution, and stated the erroneous grounds on which many decisions of boards of commissioners had proceeded.

The further prosecution of the debate was cut off by the expiration of the hour.

The House then passed to the orders of the day, and went into Committee of the Whole on sundry bills. Having come to the bill for the

DEFENCE OF THE FRONTIERS,

Mr. DUNCAN moved to strike out the word "dragoons," and to increase the force of the proposed mounted battalion into a regiment of ten companies.

Mr. D. made a brief statement of his object in making this motion. He objected to the bill as reported, because it contemplated a change in the character of the corps, and a diminution of from six to four hundred. He was anxious for a more perfect organization of the corps, but was opposed to diminishing the number of men. He had given notice when the bill passed at the last session, that he would avail himself of the first opportunity to propose an increase of the corps so as to form the battalion into a regiment, but he was unwilling to change it into dragoons, because he did not believe they would be as efficient in service, or as acceptable to the settlers on the frontier, whom this troop was intended to defend. He would not consume the time of the committee with any further remarks, but would renew his motion when the bill comes into the House.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. ASHLEY moved several small amendments in reference to sergeants, buglers, forage, &c., which were agreed to.

The committee then rose, and reported the bills to the House.

Mr. CONNOR moved to go into Committee of the Whole, and take up the Post Office bill.

No quorum having voted,

Mr. HOFFMAN moved a call of the House. The motion prevailed, and the House was called.

The call having been gone through, an adjournment was moved.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY demanded the yeas and nays. They were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 23, nays 116.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved a recess till 5 o'clock.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. CRAIG moved an adjournment: Yeas 58, nays 62.

Mr. CONNOR renewed his motion to suspend the rule, to move to go into committee on the Post Office bill: Yeas 71, nays 39—not two-thirds, the required number to suspend a rule.

Mr. EVANS moved an adjournment.

Mr. CLAYTON demanded the yeas and nays; they were taken, and stood as follows: Yeas 78, nays 83.

Mr. CONNOR gave notice that he would move to go into committee on the Post Office bill on Monday.

Various motions to take up particular bills having failed, another motion was made for an adjournment—which carried.

And the House adjourned.

[During nearly the whole of this day's sitting the members were attracted in numbers to the Senate chamber by the debate going on there; which accounts for the difficulty experienced in keeping a House together.]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

LAND REPORTS.

The resolution offered by Mr. WICKLIFFE, for printing certain reports of the board of commissioners on land claims, coming up,

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, moved to amend the resolution so as to include as well the reports in favor, as those adverse to the claimants. He explained the present dilapidated state of the records to be printed, and stated that the whole might be comprised in a single volume.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that he had heard a very different opinion as to the extent of the printing, expressed by a gentleman formerly chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands. This brought up

Mr. ISACKS, of Tennessee, who made statements as to the result of inquiries formerly made in the Committee on the Public Lands, as to the expediency of printing these reports, the result of which had been that it would cost more than it was worth.

The debate was here cut short (the hour of 12 having arrived) by a motion to proceed to the orders of the day, and the House took up

THE TARIFF BILL.

The question before the House was the motion of Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, to recommit the bill, and the amendment of Mr. WAYNE, of Georgia, to recommit with instructions to reduce the revenue gradually to twenty per cent. in the year 1841, and to provide for the intermediate fluctuation by increasing or diminishing, as might be necessary, the duties on unprotected articles.

Mr. WAYNE said that the question had assumed a different aspect from that which it possessed last week. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DRAVTON] was confined to his apartment by severe indisposition; and it was doubtful whether he would be able to resume his seat during the present session. Under these circumstances, he [Mr. W.] would not press the amendment which he had submitted, but would, with the consent of the House, withdraw it, together with that offered by the member from South Carolina. He had that gentleman's authority for the withdrawal.

Land Reports.

[H. OF H.]

The consent was given, and the motions were withdrawn.

Mr. DICKSON said that the bill, considering the course taken in relation to it last week, had come upon the House rather by surprise. He should, therefore, before they proceeded, further with the amendments, move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the call was ordered and taken, when 190 members having answered to their names, the call was suspended on the motion of Mr. POLK.

Mr. CRAWFORD said it must be manifest that, in the present temper of the House, and the late period of the session, no effectual legislation could be had upon this bill; and he would therefore move to lay it on the table. He called for the yeas and nays upon the question.

Mr. BOULDIN rose, and requested that the motion for laying the bill upon the table might be withdrawn for a moment, in order to allow him an opportunity of explaining the course which he and some of his friends intended to pursue in relation to this great question.

Mr. CRAWFORD consented on condition of the renewal of the motion.

Mr. BOULDIN said he had, with all the care in his power, drawn out a formal bill grounded upon the proposition which had been laid upon the table on a former day, and upon some of the amendments which had been submitted. It was his wish to offer a complete bill as the tender of a fair and honorable compromise to those interested in manufactures. He had nothing further to say. He should have offered it as soon as the subject was taken up, but he was aware that it would not be then in order. He should, however, submit it as soon as it became in order.

Mr. ARCHER inquired whether it would not be in order to offer it before the other amendments of the present bill should be disposed of; and if so, he expressed a hope that the motion to lay on the table would be withdrawn for that purpose.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order until the amendments were disposed of.

Mr. CRAWFORD regretted that he could not comply with the request, and that he felt himself compelled to renew the motion.

The question was then taken, and the result was as follows: Yeas 84, nays 108.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The House then returned to the amendments to the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment on blankets, which had been proposed by Mr. WARR, of New York, and which graduates the duty from thirty down to twenty per cent. (leaving it permanent at fifteen per cent.) was concurred in by yeas and nays: Yeas 114, nays 68.

The amendment which went to except ready-made clothing from the operation of this bill was also concurred in: Yeas 100, nays 75.

The question next came up on the amendment which retained carpets, flannels, stockings, and baizes, as under the law of 1832. This was concurred in without a count.

The amendment which made the reduction upon cloths more gradual, as originally reported, and fixed it at 35 per cent. till March, 1835, and so down, leaving the duty permanent at 25 per cent., was concurred in by yeas and nays: Yeas 104, nays 72.

A proviso, keeping the duty on ready-made clothing as under the law of 1828, was next concurred in without a count.

The amendment striking out the 8th and 9th sections of the bill, including the duties on cottons, and substituting other provisions fixing the duty at 30 per cent. and down to 20, was concurred in.

The question was then on concurring in a duty of two cents per pound on raw cotton. Adopted in Committee of the Whole, on the motion of Mr. BARRINGER. This was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays: Yeas 93, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Herman Allen, Allison, Arnold, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, Barringer, Bates, Beardley, Bethune, James Blair, Briggs, John Brodhead, John C. The amendments in relation to cordage, leaving the duty at two cents on tarred, and three cents on untarred cordage after March, 1834, were agreed to.

The amendment which imposes on fossil salt a duty amounting to one-third of the duty on other salt, coming up,

Mr. JARVIS opposed the amendment as inconsistent with the object of the bill, inasmuch as it goes to increase, instead of to reduce the tariff. It would, moreover, he contended, be of great injury to the manufacturers of salt.

Mr. HOWARD supported the proposition, as the importation of the article without such a duty would be attended with the worst consequences to the commercial interests of the country.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was concurred in: Yeas 89, nays 86.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

LAND REPORTS.

The question coming up on Mr. WICKLIFFE's resolution, for printing the decisions of boards of commissioners on land claims not hitherto printed, together with an amendment proposed by Mr. WARR, of Florida, extending the resolution to decisions confirming as well as rejecting the claims,

Mr. CLAY stated that Mr. WHITE (who was absent) was willing to withdraw his amendment, lest it might defeat the resolution.

The question was taken on Mr. WHITE's amendment, and negatived; and, after an inquiry from Mr. WAYNE as to the probable expense of the work,

The question was taken on the resolution, and decided by yeas and nays in the negative, as follows: Yeas 54, nays 65. So the resolution was rejected.

[The proposition was introduced in the Senate the following day, and passed.]

The House having passed to the special order of the day, and resumed the consideration of

THE TARIFF BILL,

Mr. CHANDLER, of Maine, moved a reconsideration of the vote of Saturday on the subject of fossil salt, (on which the bill, as amended, imposes a duty equal to one-third of the duty on other salt.)

This motion introduced, in substance, the same debate which has repeatedly taken place whenever this subject has been under consideration.

Messrs. REED, of Massachusetts, HOWARD, and H. EVERETT advocated, and Messrs. JARVIS, BLAIR, of Tennessee, HOFFMAN, and CRAIG opposed the reconsideration.

Mr. H. EVERETT said he understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BLAIR] to say he was opposed to this duty, because he was opposed to any duty on salt; and that, if he succeeded in rejecting the proposed duty on fossil salt, he should then move to strike out the duty on salt. Mr. E. said he thought the question now presented was merely what were the proper relative duties on the two kinds of salt; that, should the gentleman succeed in his motion to strike out the duty on salt, this on fossil salt would fall of course, as in terms it was proposed it should pay one-third the duty imposed on salt. He thought the gentleman would find himself under some embarrassment if the duty on fossil salt should be stricken out, and that on salt should be retained. He presumed the gentleman had no desire to exempt the one without exempting the other. Mr. E. thought there was much force in the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] that this article rested on the same principles as that of sirup of sugar. Both might be considered as raw materials, each requiring foreign capital and labor—the one to raise it from the mines, the other to grow the cane, and to reduce it to sirup. Both were introduced in fraud of the revenue, and of the protection of our manufactures; and he would add, that the judgment of the House on the one might determine his vote on the other.

The question was then taken, and the motion negatived by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 82, nays 93.

So the House refused to reconsider.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved to reconsider the concurrence of the House in the amendment laying a duty of two cents a pound on raw cotton, as gentlemen from the South had voted against it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to lay the motion on the table, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. ISACKS, who briefly stated his reasons for voting against a reconsideration.

Mr. McDUFFIE said it had been his intention not to have said one word on the bill; but as the question of reconsideration had been made, he should vote in favor of it. He considered two cents a pound as much too high for a revenue duty. But he could not agree with some of his colleagues. He did not intend that the rights and privileges of South Carolina should be proscribed in that House. If the motion to reconsider should prevail, he would move a duty of fifteen per cent., putting the article of cotton on a footing with other subjects of revenue. He disclaimed and disdained any duty as a protection.

Mr. WAYNE said that he had looked into some price currents recently received from the South, from which he had found that the proposed specific duty of two cents a pound on raw cotton would be equivalent to an ad valorem duty on Brazilian cotton of forty or fifty per cent. He thought this much too high. He had voted in the negative on the question of concurrence, and should now vote in favor of the reconsideration.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had voted against the duty when proposed. He should do the same to-day, and should continue to do so—not, however, on the ground taken by any of the gentlemen who had spoken. He went against the duty altogether. He concurred in the general principle maintained by the gentleman from South Carolina, that there ought to be one uniform rate of duty, as far as possible. But though they were advocates of free trade, they ought surely to be governed, in regulating duties, by some regard to the laws of other countries. So far as the bill went to take off duties, Mr. C. was in favor of it; but when it went to lay them on, he should oppose it. He would put no higher duty on cotton here than was imposed in England. If their duty was six per cent., he would have ours the same. Mr. C. inquired whether cotton had any duty imposed upon it before. On being reminded that it was now under a duty of three cents a pound, he said that he should vote to put the duty at fifteen per cent.

Mr. VINTON, of Ohio, said, as he had, at all times, sustained the protective principle, he felt himself called upon to assign the reasons which induced him, yesterday, to vote against agreeing to the amendment. When he first read the bill as it was reported to the House, and saw the article of cotton among the list of imports admitted free of duty, he regarded it as presenting a test question of the controversy so long waged between the planting interest on the one side, and the agricultural and manufacturing interests on the other. He believed, if that feature of the bill were retained, and should go into a law, it would settle the question between the North and the South in three years' time, and give quiet to the country; because, in his opinion, that interest would, in that time, be forced to come back here, and ask that very protection it now denies to all others. The staple products of the South, cotton, tobacco, and sugar, are all protected by specific duties, ranging from forty to seventy per cent. The two first, enjoying the very highest rate of duty, have been secured by it in the exclusive possession of the home market these forty years. And yet, standing behind a breastwork so high and firm that nothing can get over or break through it, they assert that, in fact, there is no protection before them—that they stand out in the open air; and this is made the justification for hurling all manner of projectiles against every branch of industry which is, in any degree, shielded by your laws. The great body of the people at the South believed all this. They have been told, over and over again, that they have no protection; that your laws plunder and rob them, to enrich other sections of the country out of their labor. The delusion has been inculcated till it has taken deep root, and spread over the whole South, this side of Louisiana. Now, sir, while that belief prevails, it is in vain to expect the people of the South will be contented, or cease to make war on the industry of the rest of the Union. All the stores of argument have been exhausted without effect; the South still denies the existing duty on cotton is any protection, and, on that ground, peremptorily demands a surrender of the protection enjoyed by all others. Under such circumstances, it becomes a question that can be settled in no other way than by trying the contested fact by a repeal of the duty. A temporary repeal becomes necessary to the interests assailed, as a measure of self-defence, and they are justified in aiding the repeal on the ground of self-preservation. The committee which reported the bill proffered a trial of the contested fact, but it has been defeated by the amendment now under consideration, imposing a specific duty of from thirty-five to forty per cent. as against that description of cotton which would be brought into the country for home manufacture—a duty not based upon the ad valorem principle, which the South is so urgent to impose on all others; but a specific duty, be it remembered, which will rise in value precisely as cotton sinks in price. He hoped the article of cotton would be left in the bill as it was reported, free of duty; and if, on subjecting it to the test of experiment, it shall be found the duty on cotton is of no value to the planter, he was free to say, for one, that fact would have much influence with him, and he should feel himself called upon to review the principles by which he had been governed in respect to the protective policy. He was very far from wishing to injure the cotton-growing interest. It was one of the great and leading branches of American industry: as such it ought to be protected, and he was willing to give it protection. Indeed, he would cheerfully vote an absolute prohibition in its favor, and prevent so much as a pound of foreign cotton from ever being consumed in this country. But he would do that, only on condition that that interest would deal fairly and justly by other interests, as he had no doubt it would be willing to do when the cotton planter should become satisfied that the protective policy was not a system of plunder and robbery on him, without any benefit to him, but that it was a shield as necessary to his protection as for others. Mr. V. said he entertained very little doubt, whatever might be said or pretended to the contrary, that the abolition of the duty would, in a few years, sink the value of the whole cotton crop ten or twenty per cent. The opening of the American market to foreigners, by enlarging their market, would create, as its natural effect, a stimulus to the production of cotton abroad, in the same way that a protective duty on an article manufactured at home, so adjusted as to bring it into fair competition with the foreign fabric, stimulates the domestic manufacture. It is the market, in both cases, which encourages production. Not only would the cotton of Asia, of the West Indies, of Brazil, and South America, generally, find its way, in the course of trade, into our markets, but a powerful impulse would be given to the growth of the cotton plant in Mexico, and especially in Texas, in our immediate vicinity, where, from all accounts, it can be produced in the greatest abundance, and at less expense than, perhaps, even in the valley of the Mississippi. Every one who has any acquaintance with the laws of trade, knows the superior value, in every country, of the home market over all others. A very little time will satisfy the deluded planters of the South of the very great importance of retaining the exclusive possession of the home market now enjoyed by them, if that market shall be thrown open to the world; and it would, probably, satisfy them too of what he believed to be true, that no section of the Union derived so much benefit from the protective policy as the South. It has built up, at home, the greatest cotton market in the world except one, and that market is, every year, growing in importance. It has built up the sugar cultivation in Louisiana and Florida: that interest, of itself, is of almost incalculable value and magnitude. The sugar production has diverted into that channel a large amount of capital and slave labor, which would otherwise have gone to swell the over-production of cotton, and depress its price, both at home and abroad.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The demand for slave labor to carry on the sugar cultivation has greatly increased the price of all the slaves in the country. It will be recollected that a gentleman from North Carolina, a few days ago, stated a very important and imposing fact on this subject. He said it was the opinion of those at the South, well qualified to judge of it, that the cultivation of sugar had added fifty dollars to the value of every slave in the country. The same gentleman estimated the value of all the slave population at four hundred and thirty millions of dollars, being an average of two hundred dollars per head for the whole. It will thus be seen that the increased value given by the sugar cultivation to all the slaves in the country is several millions over one hundred millions of dollars; and is one-third, or thirty-three and one-third per cent. added to the one hundred and fifty dollars which would otherwise be the average value of each slave throughout the Union. He would ask if the protective policy beyond the immediate neighborhood of the manufacturing villages and towns had caused a similar increase of the price of property in the other division of the Union. Had it, in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio, increased the price of land, or the products of labor, in a corresponding degree? He was sure it had not.

Mr. V. said he would act on the principle of protecting those who admitted they had protection, and wished its continuance; but as for those who denied they had any protection, and asserted they "disdained" it, and wanted none, he would take them at their word, and withdraw it from them. If, for example, they who represent the iron interest, should rise up here, and declare the protection was of no value to them, and make that a plea for assailing and pulling down other interests, after argument and expostulation were exhausted, he would take the protection away, and put the truth of the assertion to the trial. Such was, unfortunately, the state of the case with the cotton interest; and since they who represent that interest tell us they "despise" protection, and the offer has been made in this bill to give it up, he would help them to throw down their fences, and let all manner of trespassing animals into their fair fields; and when they shall come back again, as he had no doubt they will, he would assist to build them up again so high and so strong that nothing could break over them; provided they will consent to do it on the great principle of reciprocal justice, "live and let live." He had but one word more to say. If gentlemen, as they profess, desire to raise revenue from cotton, he could put them in the way of doing it; when it should be in order, he would move to fix the duty at five per cent., that being the rate at which the woollens and blankets worn by the slaves had been put by the act of the last session; and then we should get revenue from the duty. There was a fitness in adjusting the duty on the products of slave labor to the rate of duty paid on the imported articles used by slaves.

Mr. BARRINGER, of North Carolina, said that he had moved to put this duty at two cents a pound, not exclusively on the principle of protection, but equally on the principle of revenue. It was true that as this was a raw material, if it was not produced in this country, it might be good policy to admit it free, in order to aid our own manufacturers, and to cheapen the fabric of the consumer. But cotton was raised in this country, and every body knew the duty upon it was in a great degree nominal. Little or no cotton was imported, as the domestic supply exceeded fourfold the demand of the home market. The principle was true, in general, that wherever supply was equal to demand, and especially where it exceeded it, duties, however great, did not increase the price. American cotton now regulated the cotton market in every part of the world. The prices at Liverpool, Havre, &c. were regulated by our product. Of the whole amount of cotton made and consumed in the world, the American amounted to two-thirds, or perhaps three-fourths. Under these circumstances, it would and must regulate the price. A duty upon it operated nominally only. It did not increase the price of the raw material to the American manufacturer. The only effect was, that if we should be excluded from the great cotton market of the world, we should still have a monopoly for our own cotton, just as the manufacturer had for the manufactured article. Whatever gave a monopoly to one, would give the same monopoly to the other. And the only cause that could do this was a war with England. In that case, the protection of the raw and of the manufactured article would be mutually beneficial to manufacturer and producer.

The Tariff Bill.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Vinton] was correct in his deduction that this duty was a protection. It was about the ordinary standard of a revenue duty, viz. twenty per cent. Besides, he would like to know on which of the principles ordinarily advocated by that gentleman he would desire to exclude cotton from a protective duty, for the purpose of producing an importation of the article from the East Indies. He called upon the gentleman to show that he was not actuated by any personal hostility or enmity toward those whose misfortune he might say it was to live in the Southern States. According to no system of morals that he ever heard of, would the conduct of others, however wrong it might be, afford justification to him in abandoning his own principles. The gentleman's opposition could, so far as he perceived, be traced to no principle but that of retaliation (he would not say vindictive retaliation, though that, perhaps, would not be too strong an expression) upon those whose course might be considered as opposite to the interests of the gentleman's constituents. According to the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina, cotton was as fair a subject for a revenue duty as any other article, and a duty of two cents could not be called exorbitant. On the principles of protection, such a duty might perhaps confine the manufacturers to the use of American cotton. But if the price of cotton should rise, this specific duty of two cents might come to be equal to an ad valorem duty of only ten per cent., or even less than that. Mr. B. would appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to review his course, and act more in consistency with his own principles. If certain gentlemen from the South chose, in the loftiness of their mind, to abandon all protection; if they chose to be so very magnanimous as to give up all, Mr. B. could not go with them. He was for putting a revenue duty on this Southern product; and if protection should be the result, he thought his constituents entitled to it. As a Southern man, he asked it. If others abandoned it out of magnanimity, he should not. He was sent there to take care of his constituents, not to surrender their interests. Nor did he see on what principle the gentleman from Ohio could resist the duty, unless on the naked principle of retaliation.

Mr. E. EVERETT said he should vote against the reconsideration. He should vote against reducing the duty on imported cotton, for the same reason that he had voted, and should continue to vote, against reducing the duty on imported cotton fabrics. In fact, the same general principles applied, with a great degree of similarity, in the two cases. When the protecting duty on cotton fabrics was laid, in 1816, that duty was not intended for the benefit of the manufacturer alone: the interest of the planter was also consulted. This has been controverted on this floor; but I know it to be true. I do not pretend to speak of the motives of the Southern members who voted for the minimum duty on cottons in 1816, (a duty avowedly asked for as a prohibitory duty,) but I know that the manufacturers, who petitioned for that duty, urged, in favor of it, that its effect would be to shut out a foreign material, as well as a foreign manufacture. In the memorial of the manufacturers of cotton in Massachusetts, in 1815, it is said that—

"The articles, whose prohibition we pray for, are made of very inferior materials, and are manufactured in a manner calculated to deceive rather than to serve the consumer. No part of the produce of the United States enters into their composition. They are the work of foreign hands on a foreign material. Yet are they thrown into this country in such abundance as to threaten the exclusion of its more useful and substantial manufactures. They injuriously affect the industry, not only of the manufacturing, but of the agricultural States, and they cause a continual drain of specie. The prohibiting their importation, except for exportation, would, we apprehend, be attended with salutary effects upon the cultivators and manufacturers of the staple of the South."

In the report of the Committees on Commerce and Manufactures, at the same session of Congress at which this duty was laid, it was expressly stated that it would be one of the beneficial results of fostering the cotton manufacture in this country, that it would increase the consumption for American cotton. Nothing is therefore more certain than that, at the period when the protecting duty was laid, it was intended, as one object, to shut out India cotton, in the form of the fabric; and the reasons of policy which connected the two objects then, exist now.

But I have other reasons for not disturbing this duty on cotton. Its history entitles it to respect. It is a curious history, and less known than it ought to be. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRIDGE], thoroughly acquainted as he is with all these matters, had asked whether there was, by the existing laws, any duty on foreign cotton imported. I will therefore recall the manner in which this duty was laid, to the recollection of the House.

The manufacture of cotton is as old as the earliest settlements of America; not, of course, its manufacture in mills, and with machinery, (which is an invention of the last sixty years,) but the household manufacture. Nineteenths of the population of the country, not merely the poorest portion of the inhabitants, but the substantial yeomanry, were from the first clothed in homespun. Cotton fabrics, it is true, were much less worn then than at the present day; sheetings and shirtings of that material were much less used; but various articles of clothing were made of cotton, and of cotton and woollen mixed, besides its use in other parts of domestic economy. Just before the adoption of the constitution, cotton mills were established in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and perhaps in other States. They were aided by State bounties, by the efforts of patriotic associations, and by duties laid by the States upon the importation of cotton fabrics. Such was the state of things when the constitution went into operation in 1789; there was a very extensive household manufacture of cotton, and the manufacture with machinery was daily increasing.

Now, what was done by the first revenue law passed under the Government—the second law passed under the constitution? Cotton, as a raw material, was left in the bill, as it went through the House of Representatives, among the free articles. Though a little had been raised in some of the Southern States, it was not known as a staple product, nor as an article of exportation. All the cotton used in the country, for household or other manufactures, (except in the immediate neighborhood of those spots where the small quantity alluded to was produced,) was imported from the West Indies and the Spanish Main. As the bill passed the House of Representatives, this foreign raw material for clothing was allowed to be imported duty free. It then cost about one-third of a dollar per pound. In the Senate, by way of amendment, a duty of three cents per pound was laid upon foreign cotton. This was done, not to encourage, but to create the culture. It was purely a speculative duty. It was not asked for (as my constituents are compelled to ask the continuance of duties, on the faith of which their establishments had been created) to keep them from breaking down, but it was asked for to enable the Southern planters to introduce the culture of cotton.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

When the bill came back to the House of Representatives with its amendments, the amendment in question was supported by Mr. Burke, of South Carolina, on the ground that "cotton was in contemplation," as an article of produce, by the planters of South Carolina and Georgia; and that "if good seed could be procured, he hoped it might succeed." On this hope the duty was laid. In this patriotic contemplation, the first Congress laid a duty of about ten per cent. on the raw material of some of the most necessary articles of clothing—a duty which was felt in every farm house and cottage from Maine to Virginia, and from the sea to the mountains—a duty asked for by Southern Senators and Representatives, to encourage Southern products. What renders more striking the good care which the South then took to protect her industry, although at the expense of that of the North, in the present case, is, that the duties laid by the same bill on imported cottons were actually less than those which some of the States had laid under the old confederation.

This was severely felt by the infant establishments for manufacturing cotton; and when General Hamilton, in December, 1791, made his celebrated report on manufactures, he stated that "the present duty of three cents per pound on the foreign raw material was undoubtedly a very serious impediment to the manufactures of cotton," and that "a repeal of it is indispensable" to their prosperity. Did the South respond to this appeal? did they agree to remove this "serious impediment" to the manufacture of a necessary part of the clothing of the poor? an impediment arising from a protecting duty, asked for as such, by themselves, to enable them to introduce a staple as yet only contemplated? I find no trace of such agreement, and the duty remained.

Let it not be thought that this was a momentary thing. The cotton plant was acclimated very slowly in our Southern States. Although it had been known there as early as 1740, or earlier, yet, in 1784, a small quantity, of American growth, which had found its way to Liverpool in a vessel from the United States, was seized, on the ground that it must have come from the Islands. In 1789, as we have seen, the Southern members only contemplated and hoped it success, as a staple product; and as late as 1794, when Chief Justice Jay negotiated his treaty, he inserted cotton with molasses, sugar, coffee, and cocoa, as articles supposed to be all exclusively of colonial produce, which American vessels should not be permitted to carry from the United States to Europe; it not being intended to allow to our vessels the carrying trade between the West Indies and any ports but our own. It could not, accordingly, have been within the knowledge, either of Chief Justice Jay or the British minister, as late as 1794, that cotton was an article raised for exportation in this country. But two years later than this, I find this duty still considered and retained as a protecting duty on cotton. In 1796, a memorial was presented to the House of Representatives, from the proprietors of a cotton mill on the Brandywine, praying for the repeal of the duty on the raw material, and the increase of the duty on cotton fabrics.

The prayer of the petitioners was rejected by the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, on the grounds that the then existing duty on the imported fabric afforded sufficient protection, "and that to repeal the duty on raw cotton imported would be to damp the growth of cotton in our own country." This committee consisted of a member from Pennsylvania, South Carolina, North Carolina, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Virginia, and Maryland. These facts show the light in which this duty was regarded by Southern members of Congress. They prove that, at least for seven years, the South continued willing to lay a tax of three cents per pound on every yard of coarse homespun cotton cloth; nay, upon the wicks of the candles by which the poor farmer and his family spun and wove this cloth, in the long winter evenings, in order that their plantations might whiten with this beautiful product. From the last named period, and after the skill of a New England mechanist had presented the South with the saw-gin, the duty was probably for a long time of no consequence. But at the present prices of the cottons of other countries, it is now again unquestionably protective. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WARREN] told us that he had price currents before him, that made a duty of two cents per pound amount to forty or fifty per cent. Three cents per pound is therefore sixty or seventy-five per cent. This is surely a protecting duty. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARRINGER] says that one-third of the consumption of Europe is of cotton not raised in the United States. Our consumption is exclusively of our native cotton. Why should not one-third of our consumption be of Brazilian, Egyptian, and East India cotton? There is a small quantity imported and wrought up even with the burden of the duty, enormous as it is even on the foreign article. A great deal more is imported and re-exported. It would of course stay here and be wrought up, but for the duty. Sir, take off the duty, and a considerable quantity would be imported. The freight even from the East Indies is not much greater than from New Orleans.

Now, it is true that some gentlemen from the South, on this floor, reject this duty. I would not insist upon their taking it against their own wishes. I would not proceed on what the gentleman from North Carolina calls vindictive motives. I would not take this duty from them, because they propose and endeavor to take our protecting duties from us. But if they did not want it, I would not force them to have it. If the South was unanimous, whatever I might think of their policy, I should be disposed to let them have their own way. But they are not unanimous. Louisiana wishes the continuance of this duty. With that State the part of the country where I live carries on a commerce advantageous to us, and profitable, I hope, to them. They take our manufactures, our fish, our oil. We take their sugar and their cotton. The interchange is mutually beneficial. We are satisfied with it on both sides. We want no change. The cotton is cheap enough: ten cents per pound is little enough; and so is six and a quarter for the yard of cloth made from it. I will not lend a hand to the trying of any experiments to make them cheaper. These interests are too vast to try experiments. The annual value of the cotton fabrics of the United States is 32,000,000 dollars, a sum equal to the value of the cotton crop. I wonder that gentlemen, who consider how cheap the various articles manufactured are, should wish to tamper with it. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARRINGER] said the duty on cotton was nominal, and added nothing to the price. And what, I ask, does a duty of seven and a half cents per square yard add to the price of an article that sells for six and a quarter? We do not want the duty to add to the price of that class of fabrics. We want it to keep the market steady; to keep out foreign trash sold at auctions; to prevent great fluctuation. And it is wanted for the raw material as well as for the fabric. If the whole South wished the duty removed on their staple, I would gratify them: though in three years they would feel the difference, to their cost. But when a large part of the South ask to have it kept on, I will not agree to repeal it. On the contrary, if any gentleman will move to put it back to three cents, he shall have my vote.

Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, made some remarks, but what they were, or on which side, cannot be stated, as not one word was audible at our reporter's table.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, said that he should

H. or R.]

The Tariff Bill.

vote against the reconsideration. He was unwilling to disturb the duty as it now stood, and should vote against any reduction of it. He did not consider that duty as sanctioning, by any fair inference, the policy of protection. That policy, according to the general understanding, was comparatively modern. It had not commenced till 1816. But this duty on cotton was of old standing, and had been laid long before. If its effect should now be to produce protection to the raw material, he thought they of the South were entitled to it on the ground of seniority. They had a right to plead something like an act of limitation.

Mr. BURD observed that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] had said, that if gentlemen from the South were not willing to protect themselves, he would help them to throw down the fence. Mr. B. would act upon a higher rule. He would endeavor to do as he would be done by. The gentleman had said, let the foreigner come in, and the House would see their need of protection, and they would come and petition for it; and that then the gentleman would grant it to them. Mr. B. thought the House ought to be governed by no such motive. However just retaliation might be towards enemies, he could not view the people of the South as enemies, and he was not willing to retaliate upon his brethren. If they were deluded, he was sorry for it, but could not help it. He should be pleased to see them protected. He hoped their views would soon become more correct; and that they would view those measures as just and beneficial, which they now erroneously believed to be grinding them to the dust. Mr. B. thought they were wholly mistaken; he did not consider them as oppressed at all. He was a friend to the protective system, and was decidedly in favor of continuing the discriminating policy. He hoped the House would not reconsider.

Mr. THOMAS, of Louisiana, said that, lest it might be thought that all the cotton-growing States were of one opinion as to this duty, he wished to say a few words. He found that the most southern State in the Union was in favor of the protective policy, while the most eastern was the advocate of free trade, while the States between were some of one opinion, and some of the other. For himself, he had always been of one and the same opinion. He had fought to win our liberties, and after they were won, he had always held that our country ought to be independent as well as free; and that this would never be the case until we were able to work up the raw material of our own raising, and to sell in its manufactured state to foreigners. Then the country would be not only free, but independent. Mr. T. had not changed his opinion; and he held himself bound to say in his place, speaking, as he did, for the State of Louisiana, that she considered the duty on cotton as a great thing. What would be the condition of the planters there if it should be taken off? They had the finest cotton country in the world hanging just above them on the Red river, and the removal of the duty could not but be attended with the most serious injury. He was not for letting all Texas into our market. Let Texas hunt out a market for herself, as Louisiana had to do. Let us keep the home market for ourselves. We ought to proceed on the same principles as every cautious and economical family did. They looked first after themselves, and then helped their neighbors. He asked, who came first to the New Orleans market? The American merchant. Who gave the best price? The American merchant. He had often heard of the price declining, but never of its rising. By our present policy, an amount of eight or nine millions of dollars was secured to the American planter. Was this nothing? He thought it was something. And he hoped it would not be given up.

If, however, any State wished herself excluded from this benefit, he was for granting her the privilege. He might be mistaken, but he hoped Louisiana would be treated as well as the other States. He had heard nothing said about touching the duty on tobacco; and why reduce it on cotton? The duty on tobacco was merely nominal, but Mr. T. was far from asking to have it taken off. This, however, he would say, that if cotton must go, tobacco must go with it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said he should vote for the reconsideration, and this on very obvious principles. The Committee of the Whole and the House had denied to the manufacturing interest a protection above 20 per cent. And it was a principle recognised as sound by the South, that the raw material ought not to be taxed higher than the manufactured article. Now he asked gentlemen for the same rule on cotton as they had applied to cotton goods. Ninety thousand bales of cheap cotton had been imported in one year, costing from 4 to 6 cents. Now let gentlemen go to the foreign market, and assess the price there, not here. This East India cotton cost in India only 4 cents. A specific duty of 2 cents amounted to 50 per cent. Yet manufactured cotton was to be put at 20 per cent., while the raw material was at 50. Was that the gentleman's way of equalizing duties? Besides, this duty was specific. But when the manufacturer asked for a square yard duty, no such thing must be heard of. It was unjust; it was deceptive; it was defrauding the public. Why did not all this apply to a specific duty on cotton? He invited gentlemen to preserve some little consistency. When he looked at the planting interests, he found them all protected. Coal, cotton, flour, tobacco; all were protected by high duties. Manufactured tobacco was covered by a duty of 10 cents a pound; flour by a duty of 50 cents the cwt.; and coal by a duty of 6 cents the bushel. These were the staples of the country; every one of them protected in the amplest manner. And the Southern gentlemen came forward and cried out loudly against the protecting policy, and even insisted that it was a just cause for dividing the Union. They had had the benefit of all these high duties, and now, forsooth, they despised protection. The gentleman from South Carolina said that he had despised this duty for protection. It was time this thing was understood. The gentleman from South Carolina had said that this was a revenue duty. The time had now come which Mr. D. had long predicted. They had at length arrived at a test question on revenue. Mr. D. asked whether a duty was a revenue duty merely because it was assessed, or because it actually produced revenue. Which of these two senses was the true one? Which addressed itself to common sense? Mr. D. maintained that no duty was a revenue duty unless it produced revenue—unless it brought money into the treasury. If gentlemen would look to the table of imports, they would find that the treasury had realized from this duty of three cents a pound on raw cotton, some three or four, or at most five thousand dollars. Yet the gentleman from South Carolina got up, and gravely told the House that it was a revenue duty. What character of revenue had it? Let not the House be deceived by names. Revenue meant money. What was it levied for? Why was the duty put at 20 per cent.? Would gentlemen call it a revenue duty because it equalized revenue? They must know that a duty of 20 per cent. would raise revenue on some articles, but more on others. This was the doctrine of Mr. Huskisson. He had said that in England 15 per cent. was enough. Why? Because in England that was protection. So was the duty of three cents a pound on cotton. If it should be put at 20 per cent., it would not be with a view to enrich the treasury. It would be imposed for protection. Let things have their right names. A duty was not either more or less a revenue measure, for being made equal to the duty on other articles. Mr. D. protested against considering this as a revenue duty, as being a false assumption. It was no revenue duty at all.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. D. said he was willing to treat gentlemen on the other side of the Potomac as fairly as others, but he was not willing that they should have a protection of 50 per cent. on raw cotton, and then stand on this floor and deny to the North a protection over 20 per cent. on the manufactured article.

He would say to the gentleman, go on. Proceed with your system, till you have stopped every cotton mill in the country. Was it for revenue? And how would they raise a revenue when they had stopped all the manufactures? The position was an absurdity. He could call it by no other name. Mr. D. should therefore vote for the reconsideration, and for putting raw cotton on the same footing as the corresponding article. He would do this, and he would do no more. He protested against that love for British systems of revenue which seemed so powerfully to have smitten the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] He did not know why that House should always be called upon to imitate England; or what authority British statutes had as precedents on this side of the water. Let us do our own business in our own way. But let it ever be remembered that the protecting policy was a system, and must be treated as a system. It was a system that would work great good if properly regulated. But unless it was treated as a system, it must inevitably fail, and fail entirely.

Mr. WILDE here rose to explain, and reply, but owing to his great distance from the reporter's seat, and the noise and confusion of the hall, he was only heard at intervals. He was understood to say that the Committee of Ways and Means had reported a bill by which cotton was to be free of duty.

They had been induced to do so, because, while they were rapidly reducing the duties on manufactured cotton down to the revenue standard, they were told that to retain a high duty on the raw material would be very injurious to the manufacturers, and that, if they reduced the one duty, they must reduce the other. They had accordingly put cotton free of all duty, believing that the planters would not be exposed to any great danger from foreign competition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] was mistaken as to the amount of revenue produced by the existing duty. Instead of three or four thousand dollars, it was over ten thousand.

Here Mr. W. made some explanations about cotton from the Rio Brasos, which were not distinctly heard or understood by the reporter. With respect to the "protecting duty" on cotton, about which so much was said, it ought to be remembered that when the duty of three cents a pound was originally laid, the price of cotton was 75 cents a pound, and consequently the protection amounted to 4 per cent. In 1795, when the cotton gin was invented, cotton enjoyed little or no protection, in consequence of the long time it required to free it from the seed. But that most useful invention did more to protect it than all other things put together. In 1802, in a town in Georgia, which now shipped 100,000 bales of cotton annually, it was a rare thing to see a wagon load of cotton. Tobacco was the great staple. The omission of tobacco in the bill reported by the committee was accidental; and if any gentleman would move to make tobacco free, Mr. W. was understood to say that such a proposition should have his vote. And gentlemen would find that representatives from the tobacco country would not oppose it. Mr. W. was in favor of the reconsideration. He thought two cents too much; and as to leaving it at three cents a pound, he would rather vote to take the duty off entirely. He should think, however, a revenue duty of 15 or 20 per cent. quite fair.

Mr. WAYNE remonstrated against the unnecessary consumption of time in this debate. That House was trifling with the expectations of the people, in thus discussing a bill which, it must be obvious to all, could not be put in any shape to ensure its passage. Under this persuasion, he had said nothing yesterday, but had silently voted against the imposition of this two cent duty. He considered it as entirely too high, and was not willing to expose himself to the reproach of voting a high protecting duty on his own staple, while he was opposing the doctrine of protection generally. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] had, he thought, treated them with perfect fairness, save in one particular. It was the desire of South Carolina that no product of the South should be shielded from competition, except by a revenue duty; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts would look at the price of foreign cotton, he would perceive that a duty might be imposed which would in fact produce nothing to the treasury, and yet might be a revenue duty. If a duty was put at the same rate with other duties imposed for revenue, it would not follow that it was a protective duty, even though it might produce no revenue at all. What was the actual fact? Let a duty of one cent, or a cent and a half, be imposed on foreign cotton. That upon the prices abroad would not be more than 25 per cent. Mr. W. was told that the foreign material might be brought to this country at a freight of one cent a pound. How then could the duty be a protection?

He heard the gentleman say that the cotton that came in would be a poorer article. That was very true; but its being a poorer article would not prevent the manufacturer from making it up into the same goods as now came into the country made from this very cotton, and sold well in the market. He was aware that the object of the manufacturers was to keep the trade as it now stood, and to prevent fluctuations in the market. Mr. W. did not say that a very large amount of foreign wool would come in; yet as the country made, at present, but very little cotton goods, but of coarse cotton, the importation would increase the manufactures of that description. The manufacturing interest wanted to keep things as they were. But he begged them to allow the South to be consistent if it chose to be so. She asked a reduction of the protection now enjoyed. And while he heard some gentlemen say that they were out of their senses, in wishing to take off the duty, he maintained that it was quite as great madness for the manufacturers to impose on the South a heavy protecting duty on their own raw material. One gentleman had told the House that the South was not united in this wish—that Louisiana was for retaining the duty. He knew this. He expected it; as of course Louisiana was not united with the South Atlantic States on any point. Her representatives dare not give up this duty, lest they should commit themselves to do the same thing with respect to sugar. The venerable gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. THOMAS] had said that there was a vast cotton country above them just going to be opened. Very true. And that was precisely the reason why the duty should be put low. That country would and must come into the cotton markets, and the price of cotton would range from 6 to 9 cents.

The cotton interest looked ahead; they saw their fate; they were willing to meet it. But they hoped that the reduction of the protective system would prove an equivalent.

Mr. BURD, of Pennsylvania, said he was opposed to the reconsideration of the vote, and to the reduction of the duty on cotton. The old rule ought to be practised and observed, of "do unto others as you would wish others should do unto you." I do not practise upon the system of morals suggested by the gentlemen across the way. It may be just to retaliate on an enemy; but it is always good policy to place your adversary in the wrong, enemy or not. The inhabitants of the Southern States I consider as brethren, not as enemies. If they differ from us, I am willing to concede that they think they are right. We conceive they are under a delusion, and that a few years will convince them that they are. For one I shall never abandon the policy of protecting the domestic industry of the country. The South have been foremost in the policy, and have found and now experience the beneficial effects of it. I contend for the duty, not caring whether the Southern planter requires it or not, but as a part of a great system which has in a great measure made us independent of foreign manufactures, and which will, if persisted in, render us entirely so. To abandon the discriminating principle in protecting our own industry, would, in my humble opinion, be wretched policy, and what, for one, I never will agree to. I therefore shall vote against the reconsideration.

After some explanation between Messrs. WAYNE and DAVIS, as to personal consistency, Mr. W. again remonstrated against wasting time upon this bill: every body knew it could not pass; and he hoped the House would hasten through the amendments, that another bill might be introduced that should bring harmony and healing on its wings.

Mr. DAVIS explained, in reply to Mr. WILDE, as to the amount of revenue arising from the three cent duty. The actual amount of money received from it at the treasury, as appeared by the official returns, was $341.

Before any question was taken, a motion for adjournment prevailed.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to extend the provisions of the act of the 3d of March, 1807, entitled "An act to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law;" which bill having been twice read,

Mr. WICKLIFFE handed to the Chair a letter from the Secretary of War, showing the necessity of this bill, to guard against a project on foot for organizing a company at Rock island, to take possession of the lead mines west of the Mississippi, upon which the law for the removal of intruders, in its present form, would not operate. The object of this bill was merely to extend the authority of the United States over its unappropriated land, wherever situated. Mr. W., foreseeing no objection to the bill, asked that it be now ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DUNCAN regretted to have been obliged to differ with the majority of the Committee on the Public Lands who had reported this bill. It did not, in his opinion, meet the views of the Government, and must fall short of the expectations of its friends in the committee. He objected to reviving a law which had remained near forty years a dead letter on the statute books; an act which had never, and could never be enforced. Public opinion had long since fixed the seal of reprobation upon any attempt to punish individuals for settling or trespassing, as it is called, upon the public lands. Suits had often been brought under this act, and the result had universally been, that the Government paid the cost. He was in favor of extending the power to the President to lease the mines west of the Mississippi on the same terms that those east of that river are now leased. Such a policy would receive the sanction of the people; would produce a large revenue; and be the means of preserving the timber, and of husbanding all the resources of the country.

He was opposed to the bill on account of the impossibility of enforcing it, the principles it contained, and the vexation and violence which he thought would certainly ensue if an attempt should be made to enforce it, under the policy now pursued in relation to the mines east of the river. He said it was in the power of the Government agent to protect the timber and mines from waste; and when that country is offered for sale, which must soon be done, it would command a high price, after having paid, in rents received from the mines, largely more than the original cost of the whole country. He was not very favorable to the leasing system; it would be much better to sell these mines as soon as possible; and the Committee on the Public Lands agreed with him on that subject, and had reported a bill for selling all the mineral lands east of the Mississippi. But one thing is certain, that the enterprising citizens of that country cannot be kept out of this newly acquired territory; and it was a question now to be settled, whether we should admit every good citizen, or, by attempting to exclude all, only admit those who are independent of, and will disregard all law.

Mr. WICKLIFFE briefly replied, insisting on the expediency of legislating on the subject, and leaving the question of the execution of the law to those on whom it would devolve.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PLUMMER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill granting to the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama, a quantity of land for purposes of internal improvement.

Mr. P. said, in presenting this bill to the consideration of the House, he had no disposition to attempt an argument in favor of its provisions, which seemed to meet with the general approbation of the members. Justice to the new States demands its passage; and so sensible are all parties of the equity of its provisions, that no one, from whatever quarter of the Union he comes, whether from an old or new State, will, I trust, be found to raise his voice in opposition. Instead of making a formal report, it has been deemed advisable to make a brief verbal statement of facts in reply to the call made on the committee by the House. I am anxious to make that statement at this time, because of the impracticability of our being able, in consequence of the advanced period of the session, to consider the subject again, separated from, and unconnected with, the bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States according to their federal representative population, which has passed the other branch of the Legislature.

The Committee on the Public Lands, by whose order this bill was reported, were instructed, by a resolution of the House of the 14th of December, to inquire whether any of the States had received donations of land from the General Government for the purpose of making roads, bridges, canals, and improving watercourses; the quantity of land received by each State; and into the expediency of granting to such of the new States as have received no portion of the public domain for such purposes, a quantity of land equal to that granted to the other States, to be applied to objects of internal improvement within their respective limits. I find, on examination, that there has been granted by the General Government to the State of Ohio, nine hundred and twenty-two thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven acres; to the State of Indiana, three hundred and eighty-four thousand seven hundred and twenty-eight acres; to the State of Illinois, four hundred and eighty thousand acres; and to the State of Alabama, four hundred thousand acres of land, for the purposes of internal improvement, viz. making roads, bridges, canals, and improving navigable streams within the limits of those States. No grants of land have ever been made for the purposes of internal improvement, to the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, or Missouri. These are all the new States in which the General Government has exercised ownership over the waste and unappropriated lands within their respective limits. Without entering into any argument in favor of a system of internal improvement, either by the States or the General Government; and without expressing any opinion as to the propriety or policy of making donations of land for such purposes, I would simply remark, that the same reasons which have heretofore induced Congress to make donations of land for objects of internal improvement to a portion of the new States still exist, and are urged in favor of making grants for similar purposes to the other new States. The bill simply proposes the granting of five hundred thousand acres of land to each of the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Missouri, and a sufficient quantity to each of the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama, to make the whole quantity donated to them equal to five hundred thousand acres each. The lands to be located by authority of their Legislatures, in tracts not less than eighty acres each, on any of the unappropriated lands within their respective limits, subject to sale at private entry. The lands so located to be disposed of at a price not less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and the proceeds to be faithfully applied to such works of internal improvement as are therein particularly designated.

I was willing that the Legislatures of the several States should have been left to designate the particular objects to which the proceeds should be applied, but a majority of the committee preferred that they should be designated in the act making the grant. The improvements of the navigation of watercourses, named in the bill within the State I have the honor of representing, would, by enhancing the value of the adjacent lands belonging to the General Government, add to the national treasury, and thus benefit all of the States: the same remark is applicable to the other States named in the bill. I hoped to have been able to lay before the House the report of a board of civil engineers, who, in 1829, examined all the streams within the State of Mississippi named in the bill, under the authority of the Legislature, for the purpose of showing the practicability of making them navigable, but in this I have been disappointed.

The Tombigbee river, the western branch of the Mobile waters, is a desirable portion of the northeastern part of the State I represent. Upwards of one hundred miles of this stream, within the State of Mississippi, is susceptible of being made navigable for steamboats six months in the year, at an estimated expense of ten thousand dollars. The Yazoo river rises in the Chickasaw country, in the northern part of the State, and, after a meandering course of three hundred miles through the most fertile lands and delightful part of the State, empties into the Mississippi a little above the thirty-second degree of north latitude. It has been navigated by steamboats one hundred and sixty miles from its mouth. There are some obstructions to the navigation of the Yazoo, such as logs in the channel, and overhanging timber on the banks. It is estimated that the expense of removing the obstructions will not exceed two thousand dollars.

The Big Black river runs in the northern part of the State, between the waters of the Tombigbee and Yazoo, and empties into the Mississippi a little below the thirty-second degree of north latitude. The average width is forty yards, and the water from six to twenty-five feet deep in the driest season of the year. The only obstructions to steamboat navigation are logs in the channel, and projecting timber from the banks. It is estimated that it could be made navigable for steamboats six months, and for keelboats nine months of the year, two hundred and ninety miles from its mouth, including the meanderings of the river, for the sum of fifteen thousand dollars. Steamboats have ascended, in time of high water, as high as fifty miles, and keelboats much higher. Flat boats bound to New Orleans, loaded with cotton, in high water, descend it annually from a distance of two hundred miles from its mouth. It is a sluggish stream, and a great portion of its banks are annually overflowed a distance of from one to three miles from the main river.

The river Homochitto empties into the Mississippi, and waters a rich and fertile part of the State; it can be made navigable a distance of fifty miles, five months in the year, at the estimated expense of four thousand dollars.

Pearl river rises in the Choctaw country, and empties in the Gulf of Mexico, through Lakes Borgne and Pontchartrain. It has been navigated by steamboats, in high water, as far up as Jackson, the seat of Government of the State, five hundred miles from its mouth. It is estimated that it can be made navigable, on the rise of the water, say six months in the year, for twenty thousand dollars. With the exception of a raft about forty miles above the head of tide water, there are no obstructions excepting projecting trees and timber from the banks.

Pascagoula river is formed by the junction of Leaf and Chickasawhay, in the eastern part of the State, and empties into the Gulf of Mexico. It is navigable its whole length, sixty miles. Leaf and Chickasawhay can be made navigable, the former one hundred and thirty miles, and the latter one hundred and sixty miles, for boats of one hundred tons, for the sum of eight thousand dollars.

About seventy miles below the line dividing the States of Tennessee and Mississippi, there is a bayou or pass, which makes out of the Mississippi river into the water of the Yazoo. This pass seems to be an anomaly in nature. It puts out of the Mississippi immediately into a small lake called the Horse-shoe, from its form. The distance from the lake to the entrance of the pass on the opposite side is about eight miles. It is a remarkable fact that the current between the lake and the Mississippi river, during the portion of the summer when the river is low, runs a counter course from the lake to the Mississippi. After making its way through a rich and fertile region of country, now in the possession of the Chickasaw and Choctaw tribes of Indians, for about forty miles, it unites with the waters of Cold Water, and the left branch of the Yazoo. Its average width is about thirty yards. The channel is of sufficient depth for steamboat navigation during the whole year. There is no historical account of its having been known to the French or Spaniards. It seems, however, from some traditionary accounts of the Chickasaws, to have been known a long time to the Indian hunter.

The first knowledge which the whites had of its connecting itself through the Yazoo again with the Mississippi, or of its being navigable, was, as I have been credibly informed, ascertained accidentally, by a circumstance which I will relate. Many years ago a flat boat loaded with produce, descending the Mississippi river in time of high water, was thrown by the current out of the main channel into this pass. When the commander of the boat discovered his mistake, it was too late to force his broad-horn* against the current back into the main channel. In consequence of the overflow of the swamp, the crew were unable to land and reconnoitre the country, or abandon their boat. As the only alternative, he concluded to float upon the current, and trust to Providence for a safe deliverance, under the hope that it was only an ordinary cut off, which would take him back into the Mississippi river again. After floating by way of the pass, the Cold Water and Yazoo, through the interior of the uninhabited part of the now State of Mississippi, for hundreds of miles, they found themselves, to their astonishment, again floating on the bosom of the waters of that majestic river they had left some two or three weeks previously, and joyfully proceeded on their way to New Orleans, the place of their destination.

In consequence of obstructions in the pass, it can only be navigated in time of high water. A Mr. Bell, a highly respectable and intelligent citizen of Mississippi, who resides at the point where the pass makes out of the river, has, during the present season, piloted several boats through the pass into the Yazoo, in perfect safety. The obstructions to the free navigation of the pass, in low water, consist of timber standing in the main channel, logs, driftwood, and in some places rafts. The whole expense of making the pass navigable for boats of all descriptions, is estimated at a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars. In 1828, the Legislature of Mississippi authorized the Governor to employ a civil engineer to examine the pass, and he made a favorable report, accompanied with an estimate of the expense, which I am unable at this time to refer to.

No part of the land on this stream has yet been offered for sale. An appropriation of money by the General Government, or a donation of land sufficient to make this pass navigable, would enhance the value of the land to ten times the amount of the sum appropriated. It would also be of incalculable benefit to the States of Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, who supply the planters of Mississippi with the products of their soil, to be able to run their boats into the interior of the richest, most fertile, and densely populated part of the State.

There has been much controversy upon the subject of the powers of Congress to make improvements in the interior of the country. I am aware the doctrine has been held by a respectable portion of the politicians of the country, and by those with whom I have been associated on most of the great national questions, that, although they had the power to improve the seaboard, by widening channels, erecting breakwaters, and cleaning out harbors, they could not, constitutionally, make similar appropriations for the improvement of the navigable streams in the interior of the other States. But I trust that those who are the strictest in their construction of the constitution, will not carry their State rights doctrines so far as to deny the power of Congress to relinquish to the new States a portion of the lands to which they are entitled, by virtue of their sovereignty, and to which they would still be entitled, but for the fact of their having, by their own act, disclaimed all right and title thereto, and relinquished the same to the General Government. Five-eighths of all the land in the State of Mississippi is held and owned by the General Government. It is not my intention to enter into a discussion of the merits of the bill, but I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the language of the Legislature of the State I have the honor of representing, in their numerous memorials to Congress on this subject. I have not been favored with copies of them for presentation, nor do I find any record of their ever having been presented. I find them among my collection of legislative documents.

[Mr. P. here read extracts from sundry memorials of the Legislature of Mississippi, on the subject; after which, the bill was twice read, and committed.]

DUTIES ON HARDWARE.

Mr. HORN moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of Congress, passed the 14th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," as provides that certain articles therein mentioned shall not be imported at a less rate of duty than would have been chargeable upon the raw material, constituting the chief value if imported in an unmanufactured state.

The question being put, to agree to the said resolution, it was ascertained that a quorum did not vote.

A motion was then made by Mr. FITZGERALD that there be a call of the House; which motion was disagreed to: when, to ascertain the presence of a quorum, a motion was made by Mr. WICKLIFFE that the House do adjourn; which was decided in the negative: Yeas 8, nays 123.

Mr. HORN said that, if the object of the resolution was understood, he believed that there would be no objection to it. Believing, himself, that no bill on the general subject of the tariff would pass at this session, he knew it to be indispensable that some bill should pass in relation to the subject of this resolution. Without some such legislation, the utmost confusion must prevail in the collection of the revenue, and that in fact the law, as it now stands, cannot be executed. He understood that application had been made to the Treasury Department to know if any construction could be there given to the law, which would remedy its objectionable and impracticable provisions, and that an answer had been returned that no construction could be given to the law, but that which the act bears on its face. Satisfied that the framers of the act of July last never intended it to have the operation to increase the existing duties three or fourfold, as it does, he hoped the resolution would be agreed to without opposition.

Mr. DEARBORN confirmed, in substance, the statement of Mr. HORN. He was himself satisfied that the provision of law, referred to in this resolution, was not only onerous in itself, but could not be executed. He presented to the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury on the subject, sustaining his views of the necessity of an immediate amendment of the act of July 14, 1832, which was read at the Clerk's table.

Mr. CAMBRELENG spoke to the same effect. He instanced the case of a common utensil, a frying pan, for example, the parts of which were composed of iron, of different descriptions, paying different duties, and paying those duties by weight. Under the act which was to go into operation on the 4th of next month, every package of such goods must be opened, weighed, valued, &c., in such a manner as to defy the ingenuity of all the collectors in the country to carry it into effect. Even if a general tariff bill should pass at this session, (as he hoped it would,) a special act would be necessary to remedy this difficulty, before the law of July could go into operation.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said, if the amendment suggested was necessary, he desired to see it made in a proper manner. Let it be done by way of amendment to the general tariff bill. With this view he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, if a tariff bill passed, it would not go into operation before September next, and the existing law, which is to take effect on the 4th of March, would, if not amended, produce a sad state of things.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was negatived: Yeas 44, nays 108.

After a few further observations from Mr. DEARBORN and Mr. STEWART,

The previous question was demanded by Mr. SPEIGHT, sustained by the House, and carried, and the resolution was agreed to without a division.

The hour of one having arrived, the House proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up

THE TARIFF BILL.

The question pending was on the reconsideration of the duty of two cents a pound on raw cotton.

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, was opposed to the reconsideration. He was not an advocate for the duty on the article, because he was opposed to the whole protection system, internal improvements, and all, on principle. Inasmuch, however, as the duty had been agreed to by the House, he was opposed to reconsidering it.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, thought the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina impugned the motives of all who voted for this duty. He himself did not consider it in the light of a protecting duty; it did not belong to that class of duties. A duty on raw cotton had existed ever since the year 1816. He did not believe that many members were aware of this fact; or that any duty had been imposed on cotton at all. The gentleman from North Carolina professed his opposition to internal improvements; now I, said Mr. B., carry my opposition to protection just as far as he does his to internal improvements. When he wants an appropriation for Ocracoke, or any other place in his district, his principle is not heard of.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. SPEIGHT disclaimed any intention to impugn the motives of any one on this question, and he was surprised to hear such a thing imputed to him; nothing was further from his thoughts. The gentleman talked about appropriations for internal improvements. Mr. S. said he was against all such appropriations, whatever the gentleman might say to the contrary.

Mr. WICKLIFFE now renewed the motion to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table. He had been sorry ever since he withdrew it.

The question on laying the motion was lost: Yeas 72, nays 105.

Mr. VINTON said he had endeavored last evening, without success, to obtain the floor to say something in reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BARRINGER,] having allusion to himself. Mr. V. said he wholly disclaimed being influenced by any such feelings towards the interests of the South, or those who represented its interests here, as the gentleman seemed to imagine might be the case. He [Mr. V.] did not wish to inflict injury on the industry of the South; very far from it; he was glad to see it prosperous. He had yesterday stated the cotton cultivation ought to be protected, and that he was willing to grant in its favor a prohibition of all foreign cotton. But what he stated was, that he would do it only on terms of reciprocal justice to other interests: that he would not consent that cotton should enjoy a duty which, in fact, was a prohibition, and at the same time deny it had any protection, and make that denial its justification for assailing and pulling down all other branches of home industry. The preservation of the interests assailed required that denial should be put to the test, until the denial and the hostility of the cotton interest were withdrawn. The gentleman from North Carolina had complained of him [Mr. V.] as though he was the author of the proposition to admit cotton duty free. He must beg leave to remind the gentleman, he [Mr. V.] had not introduced the proposition; it was in the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means—a free trade committee. Let the gentleman put the saddle on aright, and quarrel with his friends for bringing the proposition here, and not with him for helping them to execute their wishes.

The gentleman had taxed him [Mr. V.] with inconsistency. He had given a reason for his course satisfactory to himself. But if the gentleman is fond of consistency, he will find abundant matter for contemplation by directing his attention home to himself. He is a free trade advocate; is for bringing every thing down to a revenue standard: he lays duties only to raise money for revenue, and not for protection; is against specific, and for ad valorem duties, and votes for duties of that character, and at the lowest rate on all manufactured articles. And yet the gentleman moves to strike the article of cotton out from the free list of imports, and to substitute a specific duty, which is now admitted to be equal to fifty per cent. And this he calls a fair revenue duty. Will the gentleman lay his hand on his heart, and say he intends by this proposition to raise a dollar of revenue, or that he believes it will have that effect? Is not his whole and sole object to secure to the cotton grower the exclusive possession of the home market? And what is that but protection? Does any friend of manufactures ask for any thing more? Do not the manufacturers seek after the same thing? He would repeat what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] yesterday said, that gentlemen must not think to mislead us by names, and get protection under one appellation, and then deny the same thing to others by changing its name.

Mr. V. said he must be permitted to say to his friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] that he was a better and meeker man than himself. He [Mr. V.] would not consent to hold up the shield of protection to those who persisted in dealing out blows upon his constituents. He had heard that gentleman on other occasions describe to this House, with great effect, what the protective policy had done; the towns and villages it had called into being; the thousands of looms and spindles it had put in motion; the millions of capital it had invited into investment, giving bread and employment to thousands of people. His heart had sickened within him at the recital of these things, which ought to excite no other emotion than pride in an American bosom. He must be permitted to say to the gentleman that the signs of the times admonish us that the day is not far off when they who will not consent to save themselves will find the magnanimity of others will fail them. He [Mr. V.] denied that he acted on the principle of retaliation. He said, if a blow was given him, and he struck back again, he called that self-defence; and if the return blow was a little the hardest, he did not know that he should give himself much trouble about that. He stood there to protect his constituents; and if their interests were unreasonably and unjustly assailed by any other interest, he would expostulate and reason the case with the assailants, as had been done with the opponents of domestic industry. When reason and expostulation failed, he would, in the last resort, lay them by the heels who attempted to lay his constituents by the heels. He wholly disclaimed all retaliation and vindictive feelings; but he should vote to make cotton free of duty, in sorrow and sadness, such as he should feel on administering calomel to a bilious patient, with the hope it would in time restore him to health. For, until the delusion now prevalent at the South, that it experiences nothing but injury from the protective policy, is removed, the country will be agitated, and no branch of industry dependent upon that protection can enjoy a moment's safety or repose.

Mr. BARRINGER admitted that, though the proposed duty on cotton was laid for revenue, it might operate incidentally as protection.

Mr. H. EVERETT said that, having yesterday, with only two or three of his tariff friends, voted against the amendment, he desired to state the reason of that vote, and of the one he should now give. His individual opinion was then, and he had not changed it, that the duty proposed was not only a protection, but a valuable, if not a necessary protection to the cotton planters. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARRINGER] seemed to take it for granted that it was only a revenue duty—a duty of twenty per cent. It is true that, on cotton costing ten cents per pound, it was only a duty of twenty per cent.; but on the foreign cotton, which would come in competition with the upland, costing four cents, it is a duty of fifty per cent. This was in fact prohibition on this article, not a revenue duty. Though his private opinion was that this was a protection important to the interests of the South, yet he found it was in opposition to that of the cotton planters in general. They were very ably represented in the Committee of Ways and Means, by a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDS.] That gentleman had concurred in the bill making raw cotton duty free. The votes of the South, in Committee of the Whole and in the House, were, with few exceptions, against the amendment. Under these circumstances, he felt himself justified in yielding his own opinion to the better judgment of those more immediately interested. Should the manufacturers of cotton of the North, with the same unanimity, oppose protecting duties on their manufactures, would they be imposed, and by Southern votes?

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he had originally voted with the Southern gentlemen against this duty. Had the bill simply remained a revenue bill, he would not have objected if cotton had been made free. But the bill had been entirely changed, and a duty on this article was as proper as on any other. As cotton could be brought into the country from abroad and sold at five cents a pound, he was willing to have a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem, not as a protection, but as a continuation of a duty already laid in the act of 1816. He was not disposed to repeal the duty heretofore existing, as it was continued on other articles. To give an opportunity for voting for the ad valorem duty, he would vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there was such difference between principles professed and determinations avowed, on this subject, that if the debate continued much longer gentlemen would not know what side they were on. He himself was opposed to the duty, and in favor of reconsideration.

Some further discussion followed on the part of Messrs. E. EVERETT, DAVIS, of Mass., WICKLIFFE, and BULLARD; several of them referring to the general impression or understanding that the bill could not pass in its present shape, whatever decision might take place on this particular feature of it.

Mr. STEWART said that this discussion on the protection of the great cotton interest seemed to excite great uneasiness in a certain quarter. Gentlemen evinced great impatience for the question. Why this fluttering? Were gentlemen apprehensive that the people of the South would discover that they too had a vital interest in the tariff, now secure under a protecting duty of 75 per cent.? He was glad to see the war carried for once into the enemy's country: he rejoiced that an opportunity had been afforded by this debate, of letting the Southern people see that there were two sides to this question; that they were not less interested in the protecting system than those of the North. The war had been waged in the North long enough. He was glad to see it now carried south of the Potomac, where the doctrines of "free trade" were so eloquently maintained when applied to Northern labor; but when it is proposed to apply them to the cotton and tobacco of the South, they become all at once the most abominable doctrines in the world. You gore our ox, "that alters the case," and instead of "free trade," we have just heard from gentlemen, who, yesterday, denounced the tariff as an abomination, some of the soundest tariff arguments he had ever heard on that floor. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BARRINGER,] (always opposed to the tariff), has just told us that the reduction of the duty on cotton would be giving a bounty to that amount, to induce foreigners to import their cheap cotton into our markets, to the great damage and injury of the labor employed in growing cotton in our own country. True, perfectly true; and does not this argument apply with equal force when applied to wool, iron, hats, shoes, and every thing else? If you reduce the duties on these, do you not thereby give a bounty to the foreigner to import cheap wool, iron, hats, &c., to the injury of those now employed in their production and manufacture here? This could not be denied: the only difference was that the one was produced in the South, and the other in the North. The difference of meum and tuum. This difference of mine and yours often brought many to opposite conclusions. The gentleman has further told us, that, owing to the great difference in the price of labor in Mexico, Brazil, the Indies, and other cotton-growing countries, it will be impossible to maintain the competition without greatly depressing Southern labor; and we have been told that considerable quantities of low-priced cotton are, in fact, now imported into this country, paying a duty of three cents a pound, equal to 75 or 80 per cent.; take off this duty, and we are told our factories will be supplied with the cheap cotton of South America.

Mr. S. said he believed these opinions were well founded, and he should be sorry to see it; but whose fault would it be? Did not Southern gentlemen bring this destruction on their own people? Was it not the effect of their own measures and their own principles? Undoubtedly: and the people, even in the South, would soon, he trusted, cast off this delusion, and awake to a sense of their true interest. He believed the time was not distant when Virginia, and the whole South, would become decided tariff States. But another gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] tells us he wishes a duty on cotton for revenue—a revenue duty! What! raise revenue by the importation of foreign cotton! This was most extraordinary. He had all along understood that we were reducing the tariff to get rid of revenue; that the treasury was suffering from plethora; but now we are told we want a duty on cotton, not to reduce, but to raise revenue! But another gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BLAIR] admits that it is a protecting duty, but says, this duty is of such ancient date, that it would be monstrous to reduce it now. The cotton growers have a right to protection by prescription: and he concluded by saying that he pleaded the statute of limitation against the reduction of the duty on cotton. To this, perhaps, the wool and hemp growers, and cotton manufacturers, might reply, that cotton had enjoyed protection long enough; that it had now acquired strength under the fostering care of Government, to go forth and defend itself; and that the time had now come when other interests should experience similar favors.

But, Mr. S. said, he had risen not so much to engage in this debate as to explain, in a few words, the motives of his own vote. He should vote to reconsider. He had not been aware of the ad valorem amount of the duty of three cents on cotton; on many descriptions of cotton it had been stated to be 70 or 80 per cent. Cotton, it must be remembered, is a raw material, and it was a sound principle of political economy that the duties on the raw material should never exceed the duty on the manufactured article. Now it is proposed to reduce the duty by this bill on cotton manufactures to 20 per cent. He should, therefore, vote to reduce the duty on cotton also to 20 per cent. If gentlemen would consent to give a higher duty on the manufactures of cotton, he would vote a corresponding duty on the raw material. To put a high duty on the raw material, whether wool, iron, cotton, or any thing else, and a low duty on the manufactured article, was making it the obvious interest of the foreigner to work up the raw material, and import it in a manufactured condition under low duties, thus compelling our people not only to pay for the raw material, but also for the labor and its subsistence, thereby depriving our own industry of employment, and our own farmers of a home market for their produce. We have been told, said Mr. S., that a certain description of cotton was sold in the foreign market for three and four cents per pound. If it cost three and a half, it might be imported for four, but it had to pay three cents duty, which made it cost the manufacturer seven cents; this amount they, of course, were compelled to pay the Southern planter for similar cotton; but if this three cents were taken off, then the foreign cotton could be bought for four cents, and the Southern planter would be compelled to sell the same for four cents instead of seven, or lose the market. Thus this duty of three cents enabled the Southern cotton grower to sell his cotton to the American manufacturer 75 per cent. higher than he could if the duty was repealed. This was obvious. It was too plain to admit of dispute. Yet we are told that they have no interest in the tariff policy! He was glad this debate had opened gentlemen's eyes and the people's eyes to the true state of the case. Was it right to tax the manufacturer with a duty of 75 per cent. on the raw cotton, while the producers of this cotton refuse to give the cotton manufacturer any protection whatever? Did gentlemen expect to get all and give nothing? No! they must give and take. If they will destroy our industry by withdrawing protection, they must expect theirs to fall in turn. We are willing to do as we would be done by. If the protection on manufactures is to be reduced to 20 per cent. let cotton come down to the same. If they will give more to manufacturers, he would give more to cotton. This was the rule which should govern his vote. He would prefer leaving the duty on cotton open until the rate of duty on manufactures of cotton was first determined, and then the House could regulate the duty on cotton by this standard. He, for one, would never consent to fix a higher rate of duty on the raw material than was granted to the manufactured article. This he considered a sound principle of legislation, and he would be glad to see it introduced as a permanent provision in every tariff, that the manufactured article should in no case have a lower rate of protection than was granted to the raw material. Otherwise, it was made the interest of the foreigner to import the raw material in a manufactured condition, to the prejudice of the agricultural and manufacturing industry of our own country.

The question was then put on the motion to reconsider, and was carried in the affirmative: Yeas 92, nays 77, as follows:

The question then, of course, recurring on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the specific duty of two cents a pound on raw cotton, Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to strike out this duty, and insert a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. ISACKS suggested to the mover the expediency of making the duty twenty per cent.

Mr. ARNOLD also preferred twenty per cent, and made some remarks to show the propriety of protecting the cotton product against the importation of the foreign staple.

The debate was now renewed, and continued for some time, by Messrs. McDUFFIE, DAVIS, of Massachusetts, TAYLOR, E. EVERETT, WICKLIFFE, CLAY, REED, of Massachusetts, ADAMS, BATES, of Massachusetts, and COKE; and, the question being taken, the motion to insert a duty of twenty per cent. was negatived: Yeas 60, nays 104, as follows:

So the House refused to concur in the amendment imposing a duty of two cents a pound on cotton; and The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

FRONTIER DEFENCE.

The bill making further provision for the defence of the frontiers coming up for consideration, and the question being on an amendment offered to it, in committee, by Mr. ASHLEY, going to create a difference of pay between mounted men and foot soldiers, it was opposed by Mr. WATMOUGH, and Mr. THOMAS, of Louisiana; when, on motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, (who had reported the bill,) the bill was, for the present, laid upon the table.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

Mr. BELL asked that the bill from the Senate, to enforce the collection of the revenue, now on the Speaker's table, be ordered to be printed for the use of members.

Mr. WILDE objecting, and the orders of the day being called,

Mr. BELL moved to suspend the orders of the day, to allow him to make the motion he had indicated.

Mr. LAMAR demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, Mr. ELLSWORTH, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. WILDE, Mr. WAYNE, and Mr.

CLAYTON addressed the Chair on the questions which arose relating to the order of business.

The question on suspending the orders of the day, in order to consider the bill from the Senate, was then taken by yeas and nays—Yeas 115, nays 63.

The required vote of two-thirds of the members present not having sustained the motion, the House refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. BELL then asked the unanimous consent of the House to have the bill printed.

Objections being made, however, Mr. SPEIGHT moved to postpone the special order (Mr. VERPLANCK's tariff bill) until to-morrow.

Mr. WICKLIFFE opposed the motion. The mover had avowed it to be his object, in making this motion, to get at the Senate's enforcing bill upon a motion to print it. The whole object of this movement was obvious. It required little penetration and little reflection to discover that the end and object of the motion was to give a quietus to the tariff bill for the residue of the session.

Mr. SPEIGHT here interposed, and disclaimed any such purpose as the gentleman imputed to him. His sole object had been to get the Senate's bill printed, and laid on the tables of members.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he had no objection to the printing of the bill; and what he had said had no personal reference to the mover, but to the effect of his motion. It was evidently the intention of a majority in that House to give the tariff bill the go-by; if the majority would disclaim any such object, Mr. W. would withdraw all opposition to the motion. But he believed that the avowed, the declared object of the motion was to put off the further discussion of the bill to reduce the tariff, and take up the bill which had produced so much debate and excitement elsewhere. [In the Senate.] Mr. W. regretted that such a motion should have proceeded from a quarter of the country which, through its representative on that floor, had complained loudly of the utter in expediency, oppressiveness, and unconstitutionality of the tariff laws. Did any gentleman, could any gentleman expect, that if the Senate's bill once became the subject of discussion, the House would return to the bill now before it? He would appeal to gentlemen, he would appeal to the gentleman from North Carolina, who had made this motion, whether he believed, should the House get at the other bill in any stage, at its first, or second, or third reading, there could be the faintest hope that they would reach the tariff bill again this session. The gentleman might hope it, but as surely as he drew the breath of life he would find himself disappointed.

Mr. W. said he felt deep anxiety on this subject. He had witnessed, not without pain, the slow progress of the House toward the adjustment of this question for the last two or three weeks.

Several voices here called to order, and the CHAIR admonished Mr. W. that the question being simply on a motion to postpone, he must confine his remarks to that point alone.

Mr. W. insisted that the motion involved the previous course of the House in respect to the bill which it was proposed to postpone. He trusted before the House could lay aside the subject before them to take up a bill which went to throw a firebrand into the country, and to produce a state of things that must end in the excitement of lasting discord among the States of this Union—

Mr. CAMBRELENG here called Mr. W. to order.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to enter on the merits of a bill not before the House.

Mr. W. inquired whether it was not in order to show the importance of acting on the tariff first, before taking up that bill. If the House should determine to pass a bill reducing the tariff, did any man imagine that such a bill as that from the Senate could ever pass in that House?

FEB. 21, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The CHAIR again reminded Mr. WICKLIFFE that it was not in order to advert to the character or fate of a bill not before the House.

[Mr. ARNOLD here reminded the CHAIR of a decision some time since, in a case which he considered strictly parallel, that all discussion on a motion to postpone the orders of the day was out of order.]

[The SPEAKER understood the case to be different.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE resumed. When interrupted, he had been presenting reasons why the House ought not to postpone the consideration of the bill which they had had so long before them. It was admitted that the bill had occupied a vast length of time, and the universal expectation of the country was that the House would, after so long a time, come to some prompt, decided, (and he would add,) patriotic action upon that bill. To postpone its consideration, would be to disappoint this just expectation. For the last five or six days the House seemed to have let go its hold upon the bill; its friends had relaxed their grasp upon it almost entirely. Mr. W. well remembered that at a certain time after this bill had been made the special order of the day, a member could scarce get leave to offer an ordinary resolution—the cry of the tariff bill was instantly raised—nothing must impede it even for a moment; and none had been louder or more strenuous in this cry than the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT.] And yet now, when the bill had come out of committee, and the House seemed just upon the point of coming to a vote upon ordering it to a third reading, and when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOUDIN] had apprised the House that if it should not pass, he had a substitute to offer, which would, as he hoped, enlist the suffrages of a majority of the House—now, it was proposed to give the whole subject the go-by! Gentlemen must not think to deceive themselves or their constituents. If the motion should succeed, they would hear nothing more of the tariff bill this session; it would be equivalent to an indefinite postponement of it.

If it should be found, after every effort, that they could not agree upon a bill which would give quietness and contentment to the country, why it could not be helped. But he hoped gentlemen would come and sit with him till the lamps expired in that hall, to try if they could not pass some bill that would prevent consequences such as must be deeply deprecated by every patriot. He trusted, he entreated that every expedient would first be tried, every effort exhausted, to prevent what might lead to consequences that must long be lamented by all who loved their country.

Mr. SPEIGHT denied that it had been his wish or purpose to give the tariff bill the go-by. He was of the same opinion, in respect to the necessity of passing that bill, that he had been at the first. His opinions in respect to the tariff had in nowise changed. He held it to be unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional. His whole conduct had been such as clearly to show that he was willing to pass a bill to reduce it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] got up and talked to him about throwing firebrands! He had made his motion with a view, simply, of giving some disposition to a bill sent down by the Senate. However, as the motion seemed to create so much disturbance, he would withdraw it; and Mr. S. withdrew it accordingly.

Mr. IRVIN renewed the motion.

Mr. WAYNE demanded the previous question.

The CHAIR decided that the previous question would not apply to a motion to postpone.

Mr. WAYNE expressed some astonishment, but submitted to the decision.

Mr. IRVIN said he had renewed the motion because he was anxious that the Senate's bill should be printed, and that it should be settled on what day it was to receive the action of the House.

Mr. WAYNE again inquired whether his motion for the previous question was not in order.

The CHAIR repeated its former decision.

Mr. IRVIN said he regretted to witness, on this occasion, such feelings as had been evinced by the gentleman from Kentucky, and he felt fully convinced that language of the kind the gentleman had thought fit to use, would have no operation on the course of members in that House. He could assure the gentleman it would have none upon his own. He trusted the House would act from no excited feeling, but from a deliberate and dispassionate judgment of what its duty required.

Mr. DANIEL said that he understood the motion to be to postpone the consideration of the tariff bill until tomorrow, without reference to any object whatever in view, and that nobody must even allude to what was to follow. He should endeavor to conform to order, and then the field left was quite wide enough for a discussion that would occupy the balance of the session. Mr. D. said that he was now fully satisfied that it never had been the intention of some gentlemen, who had professed themselves to be very anxious to settle the tariff question, that any bill should pass the House on that question. He was convinced of it. It was conclusively testified. Their conduct proved it, and no man could doubt it. Here the House had been laboring under a recommendation of the President, for weeks and weeks past, to settle an all-important subject, which, if left unsettled, must jeopardize the safety of the Union; and now what did they hear to-day? He heard a motion made, without any reason assigned, that the daily special order for the consideration of the tariff should be postponed until tomorrow. What was to follow that motion, no mortal dare to know, nor was it in order so much as to hint at it. One thing, however, was certain. The object of the motion was to defeat the tariff bill, and to let some other business, which nobody must talk about, take precedence. This was clearly the object of the motion. And why must not the House dispose of its special order? Was not the tariff bill as important? Surely it was. In his judgment, it was the most important measure that had ever come before the American Congress; for on it might depend the permanence, and the very existence of the Union. Why must it be postponed? The House had only seven or eight business days remaining. Would gentlemen come out and say plainly that they were determined to pass no tariff bill at all? That they were not anxious to give quiet to the country? Was he so to understand gentlemen? It would seem so. A gentleman from the Southern section of the Union now came forward and demanded the previous question. It was an extraordinary—a most extraordinary course. What, was the gag law to be enforced upon them so early?

Mr. CRAIG here called Mr. DANIEL to order.

Mr. DANIEL. To order? How am I out of order?

Mr. CRAIG insisted that the rules of the House should be applied as rigidly to the gentleman from Kentucky as they had been to himself.

Mr. DANIEL. Oh! that is right; very right. But how am I out of order?

Mr. CRAIG said that a reference to the gag law was no more in order than a reference to the bill from the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. I am much obliged to the gentleman, much obliged, indeed. The gentleman is very polite. I never take any umbrage at what that gentleman says, either here or elsewhere. But I had no allusion to the gentleman at all.

Mr. WAYNE. Did the gentleman allude to me?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, I did allude to you.

Mr. WAYNE. Then I call the gentleman to order. I understand him to allude to the decision of the Chair that my motion for the previous question was not in order; and I want to know whether it is in order for him to allude to it in a manner calculated to misrepresent me to the public.

The CHAIR said that personal allusions were not in order.

Mr. DANIEL said he had no desire to be out of order; it was not his purpose. He meant to keep himself in order, and he should try to do so. He was an orderly man. But he thought it was an extraordinary attempt to stifle investigation on a subject so important as this. He meant to pursue the rules of order rigidly. The field was wide enough. He had a right to discuss the motion to postpone, and he had a right to complain of any gentleman who pretended to be in favor of reducing the tariff, and yet attempted to stifle investigation.

The CHAIR here called Mr. DANIEL to order.

Mr. DANIEL. What! Cannot I apologize? Well! if I cannot apologize, I do not know how I am to keep myself in order.

Mr. WAYNE here rose to explain, when

Mr. DANIEL called him to order. He insisted that the delay of the tariff bill was justly chargeable to those who, while they professed to be anxious to settle the tariff question, never had in fact desired any such thing. That was not the gentlemen's object. They had a far higher object in view; they were engaged in President making; and to that end it was necessary to hang up this tariff bill, and keep the subject still unsettled before the people. The edict had gone forth. A gentleman was in another part of that hall, who had expressly proclaimed that the question should not be settled because his President was not elected.

The CHAIR here called Mr. DANIEL to order. It was not in order to refer to any thing that passed in the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL said he had not uttered a word about the Senate. He had spoken of a gentleman in that hall: he had said nothing about the Senate. If the bill was to be defeated, let the responsibility rest where it ought to rest, on the shoulders of those who were endeavoring to prevent its passage, while they professed to be its friends—who were doing all they could to put the country into civil war.

Mr. FOSTER remonstrated against the consumption of precious time. He understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAYN] was ready to withdraw his motion to postpone, if gentlemen would withdraw their opposition to the printing of the Senate's bill. He conjured gentlemen to put an end to this debate: let the order for the printing be passed, and then let the House return to the consideration of the tariff. He concluded by asking the unanimous consent of the House to move for the printing of the bill from the Senate.

Mr. ARNOLD objected.

Mr. IRVIN withdrew his motion to postpone.

Mr. FOSTER again asked consent to make his motion.

Mr. ARNOLD again objected.

Mr. FOSTER then moved to suspend the rule.

Mr. ARNOLD demanded the yeas and nays on suspending.

The House refused to order them.

The question being thereupon put, the rule was suspended.

Mr. FOSTER now moved that the bill from the Senate, to enforce the execution of the revenue laws, be printed.

Mr. ARNOLD said, if the House intended to act on the Senate's bill at all, it must be manifest to all that it was necessary to make some disposition of it without delay.

The CHAIR said that no such motion could be in order at present.

Mr. ELLSWORTH suggested that the best course would be to take a question on printing the bill, and then to move successively to postpone the remaining orders before the House until they arrived at the Senate's bill.

Mr. DICKSON now moved to postpone the special order of the day (Mr. VERPLANCE's bill) till to-morrow, for the purpose of disposing of the bill from the Senate, to enforce the collection of the revenue.

Mr. WAYNE moved to lay that motion on the table.

The CHAIR pronounced Mr. WAYNE's motion not to be in order.

Mr. DICKSON demanded the yeas and nays on the motion he had made, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. CLAY suggested that to-morrow had been set apart for business relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMBRELENG opposed the motion of Mr. DICKSON, and hoped that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] would carry out the zeal which he had manifested for having the tariff question settled first.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said that, unless the House fixed upon some day of the six business days left them for the consideration of the Senate's bill, it could not come up at all. To refuse to fix a day to consider it, would be equivalent to declaring that they would not consider it at all. He hoped a majority of the House would proceed to postpone every bill until that bill should be reached.

Mr. BELL suggested that the Senate bill would be disposed of to-morrow at any rate. It could not surely be very important to dispose of it to-day in preference. He therefore hoped that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSON] would consent to withdraw his motion, and suffer the House to manifest its will on the bill now before it.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said the gentleman was mistaken in supposing that the Senate bill would be reached to-morrow. There were bills enough before it to occupy the mornings of four or five days. Why not give the bill some disposition now?

[Mr. BOULDIN here made some observations, which are necessarily deferred.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, said that he did not intend to detain the House, but his feelings were such at this moment as constrained him to ask the House to pause. The proposition was to postpone the special order—till when? It was said, until to-morrow; but should the motion prevail, the postponement would be to the end of the session. Could any gentleman believe otherwise? The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. ELLSWORTH] had remonstrated against wasting the little time now remaining. If he was not mistaken, that gentleman himself had done at least his share towards consuming the time of the House. He knew that it was not in order to advert to the bill intended to be gotten up by this motion, but he was certainly permitted to suppose what would be the consequence of postponing. Could gentlemen persuade themselves that the American people would not feel disappointed? Had not their voice called upon Congress finally to adjust this long vexed question? Should the motion prevail, it would be immediately followed by another, for taking up a subject of a different complexion. The South had long been petitioning Congress to be relieved from the burdens under which they were groaning. What must be the consequence, should Congress lay aside the bill for their relief, and take up a bill, the declared object of which was to enforce submission? When they asked for bread, to give them a stone, when they asked for a fish, to give them a serpent, he implored the House, in the name of God, and of his country, and by all the consequences which were suspended on its action, not to do such a deed. He would go down to its feet, and humble himself in the dust, if he could but prevail, if he could but induce them to have mercy upon our common country. There was a point beyond which human forbearance would not extend; a point where reason would yield to the dictates of deep and uncontrollable feeling.

The Tariff Bill.—Silk Culture.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BELL said that there was no need of pressing the point, as the gentleman from New York had withdrawn his motion.

Mr. DICKSON said the motion was not withdrawn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND observed that the gentleman from Georgia seemed to think the motion very alarming. Mr. S. could see nothing alarming in it. All his desire was to see a day fixed when the Senate's bill was to be taken up. It would not be pressed to-day or to-morrow. If gentlemen who were so very anxious for the tariff, instead of adjourning at three o'clock, would sit (as the gentleman from Kentucky had said) until the lamps went out, they might dispose of it in time to take up the other bill. The gentleman from Kentucky had himself to blame, that all the time of the present debate had been withdrawn from the consideration of the tariff. Mr. S. was ready to meet the yeas and nays, and, if possible, to settle the question that night.

Mr. ARCHER was opposed to fixing at this time upon any day for the consideration of the bill from the Senate; and for this reason, that many gentlemen who were in favor of the principles of that bill, would nevertheless vote against it, unless the House should first come to some determination as to the tariff question. Why, in fact, should any man give his vote for it, so long as a hope remained that the tariff question could be adjusted? It was only in case of the failure of one bill, that the other would become necessary. The friends of the bill, by pressing it now, would lose many votes. He hoped that this reason would prove conclusive.

Mr. CLAYTON here made some observations, a report of which was, unfortunately, not preserved.

Mr. ISACKS was for doing one thing at a time. He was for first trying to reduce the tariff. The moment it should be decided that this could not be done, he should be prepared to go into the other bill.

Mr. DICKSON now modified his motion, so as to make it for postponing the special orders until Saturday.

The yeas and nays were taken on the motion in this form, and decided as follows: Yeas 86, nays 99.

So the House refused to postpone.

The House then proceeded to the special order of the day, and again took up

THE TARIFF BILL.

The first question was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on striking out a duty of fifteen cents a gallon on olive oil in casks, until the year 1834, and thereafter a duty of ten cents. This amendment was negatived: Yeas 80, nays 85, and the proposed duty of course retained in the bill.

The next question was on agreeing with the committee in inserting "on linseed, hempseed, and rapeseed oil, a duty of twenty-five cents a gallon." Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the amendment by including olive oil, and making the duty on all twenty cents a gallon. This amendment was supported by Messrs. REED, HUNTINGTON, DEARBORN, and PENDLETON; and was opposed by Messrs. CRAIG and CAMBRELENG.

Mr. POLK remonstrated against the consumption of time, and pressed the House to pass through the amendments, in order to get at the bill to be proposed by Mr. BOUDIN as a substitute.

The question being taken, the amendment proposed by Mr. REED was agreed to.

The question of concurring in the amendment, as thus amended, was then taken, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 86, nays 75.

As the subject of coffee would be the next in order, Mr. HUNTINGTON moved a call of the House. This being refused,

Mr. E. EVERETT moved to adjourn.

The motion was negatived by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 71, nays 88.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved for a suspension of the rule, in order to allow him an opportunity to move for a recess, but the motion was negatived.

The question then coming up on concurring in the next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, viz. to strike out the duty of one cent per pound on coffee,

Mr. CRAIG stated his reasons for supporting the amendment.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, moved a call of the House; the motion prevailed, and the House was called accordingly; 182 members answered to their names, when further proceedings on the call were suspended.

The question on concurrence was then taken, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 117, nays 57. So the House concurred.

The amendment striking out the duties on teas was then concurred in by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 108, nays 63.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

SILK CULTURE.

Mr. ROOT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House procure for the use of the members 2,000 copies of the manual on silk, published by J. H. Cobb, of Dedham, in the State of Massachusetts, provided the cost shall not exceed one thousand dollars.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. ARNOLD demanded the yeas and nays, which being taken, stood as follows: Yeas 61, nays 74. So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. ROOT said that Mr. Cobb, of Massachusetts, had sent in a memorial, praying for encouragement in a manufactory of silk, which he had established, and which, he was of opinion, might be, beneficially for the country, extended. His idea at first was to apply for a grant of land, for the encouragement of the growth and manufacture of the article, similar to those grants which had already been made for encouraging the growth of the vine and of the olive. He had accompanied his memorial with a copy of a book which had been published under the supervision of the Government of Massachusetts, which gave the history of the growth and manufacture of silk, from the incipient state of the worm, to the manufacture of the article into handkerchiefs and other articles. It also contained ample directions for the culture of the mulberry, and was illustrated with beautiful plates. The Committee on Agriculture, supposing that it might not be useful to apply for a grant of land, even if they should succeed in obtaining it, thought it better to confine the culture and manufacture to the lower part of the country; but they deemed that the printing and distribution of the book would be highly useful to the country at large; and they could not devise a better mode of distributing it, than by putting a number of copies into the hands of the members of Congress, who would judiciously distribute it in all parts of the nation. Mr. R. enlarged upon the value of the publication, particularly to the agricultural interest.

Mr. CLAY rose to reply, when

Mr. HOFFMAN rose, and announced to the House the decease of JAMES LENT, JR., a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York. After some appropriate remarks, Mr. H. submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of JAMES LENT, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of New York, by wearing crape on the left arm for the remainder of the present session of Congress.

2. Resolved, That this House will attend the funeral of the late JAMES LENT to-morrow, at eleven o'clock A. M. and that a committee be appointed to take order for, and to superintend, the said funeral.

3. Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate, to notify that body of the death of JAMES LENT, late a member of this House, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at eleven o'clock.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 23.

After attending the funeral of the deceased member, Mr. LENT, the House, pursuant to adjournment, assembled at two o'clock; but no quorum appearing, a motion for adjournment prevailed, and

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Agriculture, on the 22d instant, directing the Clerk of this House to procure 2,000 copies of the manual on silk, published by J. H. Cobb, provided the cost shall not exceed one thousand dollars.

And after debate thereon, the question was then put, viz. Will the House agree to the said resolution? It was passed in the affirmative: Yeas 80, nays 75.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his private Secretary, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1833.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the House, a letter from General Lafayette to the Secretary of State, with the petition which came enclosed in it of the Countess d'Ambugeac and Madame de la Goree, granddaughters of Marshal Count Rochambeau, and original documents in support thereof, praying compensation for services rendered by the Count to the United States during the revolutionary war; together with translations of the same. And I transmit, with the same view, the petition of Messrs. de Fontenille de Jcaumont and de Rossignol Grandmont, praying compensation for services rendered by them to the United States in the French army, and during the same war, with original papers in support thereof; all received through the same channel, together with translations of the same.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The said message, with the petitions and papers accompanying the same, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The House then took up the following resolution, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whatever evidence he may have received, that authorized the belief that the Government and people of South Carolina, or any portion of them, had at any time meditated or intended to seize the forts or property belonging to the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, said he was desirous of giving a brief explanation of the object of the resolution, before the question should be put upon it. He had not introduced it with a view of imputing blame to the President, or to the Secretary of War, for the mode and manner of the publication of the orders. The publication had been made in obedience to a call from the Senate; this fact was borne upon the face of the document. He repeated, that no blame was ascribed by him on account of the private orders which had been given; but inasmuch as they had been made public, and as they convey an imputation on the State of South Carolina, he held it to be an incumbent duty, as one of her representatives, to meet the charge with a flat denial. The documents containing the imputation were now in the public archives; and it was therefore fit and proper that the proof should be challenged. He did not know whether the House recollected the precise language used on the occasion in the orders in question, but it was such language, he could assure them, as should not pass without a denial from him. It was imputed to the Government and people of South Carolina, that a design existed on their part of seizing the arsenal, the arms, the stores, the munitions, and the other property of the United States, within the limits of that State. The last order of the series went even further, and accused them of intentions still worse. It was charged that they contemplated crossing the boundary line which divides them from another State; of a design to pass the Savannah river, and plunder the United States arsenal in Savannah of its arms and ammunition.

Mr. D. asked if it could be expected of the representatives from South Carolina to be silent under such allegations. He called for the proof in these cases, and he appealed to the justice of the House to sustain him in the call. The President might or might not give the information required, or the House might or might not decide to call for it. He put it to them, however, whether it would be proper or just that such charges should pass unrefuted; and next, whether, when made, the proof to substantiate them should not be adduced. He denied the truth of the charge, from whatever source it had emanated: come from the highest public, or lowest private station, from what quarter it might, he would say in reply,

"Highland or Lowland, Prince or Peer; Lord Angus, thou hast lied."

Mr. WAYNE thought there was already sufficient excitement in the House, without this addition to it. He saw nothing in these orders, which differed from the attitude in which South Carolina had placed herself by her ordinance, and her subsequent laws in pursuance of that ordinance. He disapproved of that ordinance, and of those laws, but it was not his intention to debate that question now: at a proper time he should, if necessary, express his sentiments upon it. He asked whether it was not proper, when a whole community was in a state of excitement, for a careful and prudent magistrate to take every precaution against danger. He restrained the expression of his feelings at present, and moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CARSON hoped he would not press the motion. It would be better to let the resolution take its course.

Mr. WAYNE declined to withdraw his proposition.

Mr. BEARDSLEY asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The yeas and nays were then taken, when the motion to lay on the table was carried: Yeas 109, nays 57.

WATERVLIET ARSENAL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the ordinance and engineer appropriation bill. The item appropriating $9,000 for the purchase of forty-five acres of land at the arsenal of Watervliet, New York, came up.

Mr. WICKLIFFE was against making the appropriation, unless he had evidence of the necessity for the purchase, and of the land being worth the money which was asked for it.

Mr. WARD, of New York, said that the subject had been before the Committee on Military Affairs three years ago, and the committee was then unanimously in favor of the report. The then Secretary of War, Mr. Eaton,

FEB. 25, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[H. or R.]

was then at the place, and recommended its purchase. The measure had had the sanction of two Secretaries of War, and of two Committees on Military Affairs. They had recommended it in good faith, and were deserving of the confidence of the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE wished to know of what description the land was.

Mr. WARD replied that it was as fertile as any in the State of New York, and, being situate near the city, was highly valuable.

Mr. WICKLIFFE had no doubt, then, that it might be found very convenient to the officer in charge of the public store, to have the occupancy of a farm of forty-five acres, but he did not see the necessity of so large a piece of ground for the purpose of storing the public arms. There were other arsenals in the occupation of the Government: there was one at the city of Washington, which would contain more arms than the Government was likely ever to have occasion for. The land might be found to be convenient to the officer in charge of the arsenal, no doubt; and it might also be advantageous to the holder to find a good purchaser. It was sometimes found to be more convenient to sell to the Government than to individual purchasers.

Mr. WARD repeated that the additional purchase had been called for by the Secretary of War, not by any report, but from his own personal observation of the land. He stated that it was advantageously situated as a depository of arms, for the convenient supply of the western part of New York, and the Eastern States. If not purchased now, the land might, at a future time, cost more money.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, followed on the same side, and described the localities of the place.

Mr. DEARBORN said that, besides being a depot of arms, it was a large manufactory of muskets, powder, and other munitions of war, and observed that the sheds and workshops required much space. Besides, a village was growing up about it, which in a few years would become a flourishing town, and enhance the value of the land. He, therefore, thought the purchase ought to be made promptly.

Mr. WICKLIFFE was prepared to give his vote for the bill if he saw good reason for it. But, according to a map which he held in his hand, Government held about a hundred acres there already, and he was at a loss to perceive the necessity of a further purchase.

Mr. BELL here moved to lay the bill on the table, and all other bills before the Speaker, in order to dispose of the revenue collection bill from the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered and taken, and stood as follows: Yeas 95, nays 73.

So the bills were laid upon the table.

The hour of one having arrived,

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved that the House proceed to the special order of the day, (which is the tariff bill.)

Mr. BELL hoped the House would not do so until it had first disposed of the bill from the Senate.

Mr. BOULDIN moved a call of the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that if the House proceeded to the order of the day, he hoped they would dispose of the amendments to the bill before it, when he should offer another bill to reduce the tariff, such as he hoped would unite the votes of a majority of the House.

Mr. BOULDIN withdrew his motion for a call.

Mr. WICKLIFFE then said that, as Mr. BELL opposed the execution of the special order, he would ask the yeas and nays upon his motion to execute it. They were ordered by the House, and being taken, stood as follows: Yeas 80, nays 106.

So the House refused to proceed to the order of the day.

Mr. VANCE moved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up the bill from the Senate on the subject of disposing of the proceeds of the public lands for a limited time.

The CHAIR decided that such a motion could not be made until the House had reached the orders of the day.

Mr. VANCE took an appeal.

The SPEAKER explained his decision, and Mr. VANCE the grounds of his appeal.

Mr. WICKLIFFE then suggested that the vote taken by yeas and nays, refusing to execute the special order of the day, was insufficient to prevent the taking up of that order; inasmuch as the rule to go into the special order every day at one o'clock, had been passed by two-thirds, it would require two-thirds to prevent it.

The SPEAKER said it was too late to make this question now, as other business was before the House.

Mr. DANIEL said he should insist on the same ground, and would take an appeal.

The CHAIR said there was already an appeal before the House.

Mr. VANCE, in order to have the question tried, withdrew his appeal.

Mr. DANIEL then appealed, and insisted that the special order should be executed.

The question of order was argued by Messrs. WICKLIFFE, CARSON, TAYLOR, THOMPSON, of Georgia, DANIEL, SUTHERLAND, and DEARBORN; after which,

Mr. DANIEL withdrew his appeal.

Mr. WILLIAMS now moved to postpone all the orders of the day which precede the bill from the Senate on disposing of the proceeds of the public lands.

Mr. CARSON inquired whether the tariff bill was included in the orders.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. CARSON appealed from this decision.

The SPEAKER said no appeal could lie, as the motion was to postpone all the orders, whatever they might be.

Mr. WILLIAMS inquired whether two-thirds were necessary to postpone all the orders.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS then moved the postponement of each particular bill as they were announced in succession.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The House at length arrived at the Senate's bill further to enforce the collection of the revenue.

The bill was read a first time.

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved that it now have its second reading.

Mr. LEWIS moved to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BOON asked the yeas and nays on the motion. They were ordered and taken, and stood as follows: Yeas 58, nays 125.

The bill then had its second reading.

Mr. CARSON moved to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He made this motion, because he thought that on a question of so much importance the fullest and freest discussion ought to be allowed. The present measure was of a similar character to one already reported upon by the Judiciary Committee of that House, and which had been consigned to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; consistency, therefore, demanded that the bill before them should be referred to the same committee. If it went at once to the House, the previous question might be called, and all deliberation out off. Mr. C. concluded by deprecating the present bill as of a more despotic character than the alien and sedition law.

Mr. STANBURY inquired if it was not necessary that the present bill should go to a committee, inasmuch as a tax for military purposes would be necessary to carry its provisions into execution.

The CHAIR gave its opinion that the present was not a bill of such a character.

Mr. WICKLIFFE asked the reading of a decision of the CHAIR upon this subject on a former occasion.

The decision referred to was not read, not being in the possession of the Clerk or the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he had never understood until that day that it was the determination of the friends of the administration to pass this bill in preference to one, the purpose of which was to give peace to the country; the votes of that day had shown this to be their determination. Mr. W. concluded by expressing his opinion that, as far as regarded the point of order, the bill ought to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BELL did not believe that it was the intention of gentlemen to cut off discussion on this subject by the previous question. The justice of the House, and the responsibility of its members to the justice of the country, would, in his opinion, secure to it a full and fair discussion. With regard to the bill itself, he did not think it fraught with the mischief which some gentlemen apprehended; he thought it comparatively peaceable in its nature, and calculated to prevent bloodshed. It must be evident that to do any thing interfering with an immediate action on the bill, was, at the present period of the session, practically to defeat it. They might pass the present bill, and would still have an opportunity to act on any other measure relative to the tariff. He should, therefore, move to make it the special order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER contended for the committal of the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It was obvious that the same reasons prevailed here as in the case of the report of the Judiciary Committee. It was evident that those who opposed this reference, had the power in their hands to stop any debate on it when they pleased; he hoped that, with this consciousness of their own strength, they would have the courtesy to let the bill take the course which had been given to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAYTON said the proposition to grant relief by modifying the tariff, after the passage of a bill like the present, reminded him of an anecdote of the celebrated Fox, who had proposed to postpone the settlement of an account with one of his importunate creditors until the day after the day of judgment. Mr. C. proceeded to represent the sympathy which would be felt by other States with South Carolina, should the present bill pass. If they would pass a measure of reconciliation, there would be no occasion for the present or any other measure of enforcement. Mr. C. concluded his remarks by deprecating the employment of force against South Carolina.

Mr. GORDON followed at some length on the same side.

Mr. WICKLIFFE was opposed to the motion to make the bill the special order for to-morrow, and should prefer its postponement until Thursday. The administration was in a singular position, indeed, when it preferred a measure of war to one of peace.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he also was in favor of the postponement until Thursday, although he could not vote for the commitment of the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on account of the shortness of the session.

Mr. ARNOLD advocated the proposition to make the bill the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. DANIEL, at some length, discussed the nature of the bill, and expressed himself in favor of the postponement until Thursday. He should vote for the longest day, for the time would be so much gained for the cause of liberty, which would be destroyed by the passage of this bill.

Mr. WAYNE wished it to be understood, that when gentlemen designated the bill as one which was calculated to dissolve the Union, as a bloody bill, and so on, they misrepresented it grossly. He had hoped that something would have been done to compose the country; and probably his hopes would have been verified, if the action of the House had not been delayed by the death of a member. Why, he asked, should that important measure be now set aside, and another substituted? But it seemed as if it was not intended that the tariff bill should pass. The time had now arrived when men ought to act together for one common object—to have the tariff reduced, and the country pacified. He knew such a disposition to exist on the part of a sufficient number of members, although others would not suffer the bill to pass.

Mr. WICKLIFFE asked, did the gentleman allude to any particular portion of the House who would not suffer the tariff bill to pass?

Mr. WAYNE said his object was to show how immaterial it was which took precedence. When gentlemen alluded to a particular State, and that his neighboring State, which he could see from his own window, as the place where that bill was particularly intended to operate, he thought it his duty to endeavor to prevent its passage. And when he saw that bill placing extensive military power in the hands of an individual, he began to think that he was living under new laws. He then read a communication from Messrs. Baring, Brothers, and Co., bankers, London, which stated that, in consequence of the disagreement of the country, the faith in American securities was much shaken, but somewhat restored by the proclamation of the President. The character of the country for responsibility, he said, required pacific measures, and that Congress should be strong enough to maintain them.

Mr. WARREN R. DAVIS said the House would do him the justice, and those with whom he acted, to own that they were in no way responsible for the snail-pace of the tariff bill; they had not impeded it by the frivolous amendments alluded to, or by propositions of any sort. They acquiesced in, and followed the suggestions of friends on this floor, and remained silent on this deeply interesting subject, lest to their participation in the debate should be attributed whatever of a dilatory or stormy character it might assume. You have all witnessed, he said, that we submitted in silence to the reading and discussions of public documents, containing false, malicious, and defamatory libels on the State and people of South Carolina; to language of contumely and reproach upon our public functionaries, (friends whom we dearly love,) that shot like fiery arrows through our veins. Yet we were dumb. Still more, sir, the bitter cup was not yet full—it might not even thus pass. We felt it our duty to let the sacrifice be complete. We remained in our places, we kept our seats, and bore the torture. You all knew, from the beginning of the session, that such would be our course; yet we were baited at the start. What friendly voice of truth or justice was heard in our vindication during those hours, days, weeks, of burning agony? What did we hear from those who ought to have defended us? Why, that South Carolina was precipitate!—After ten years of petition, prayer, and suffering; after witnessing all our Southern sister States taken up last summer with the presidential election, as if the shirt of Nessius were not upon their backs. Precipitate! away with such stuff and nonsense. And what, sir, do we now see? The tariff question, that has been creeping, loitering, drivelling, dragging itself through six weeks of the session; the very bill we were desirous to abstain from discussing, lest we might shake too rudely the leaves of its olive branch—a bill entitled, by all parliamentary right and usage, to precedence, is to be shoved aside, and this firebrand to be flung before it. Why? Because, forsooth, the President wills it! And by whom is the attempt made to substitute this sword in the place of the olive branch? By the organs and fast friends of the President on this floor. Can I be mistaken? That I may not be, I desire now to ask of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, (if he be in the House,) I do not see him in his seat—[Here Mr. BELL rose from a different part of the House,] to ask, and the terms of former kindness between us entitle me to a candid answer, whether it is the intention of the party with which he acts, to give precedence and preference to the bill for collecting revenue.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said he would answer the question in the same spirit of candor in which it was asked: it was desired to have this measure passed as soon as practicable, and, for that purpose, to give it precedence. He exonerated the delegation of South Carolina from all responsibility for the delay of the tariff bill, and approved their course on the occasion.

Then, said Mr. DAVIS, we understand it now. The President is impatient to wreak his vengeance on South Carolina. Be it so. Pass your measure, sir; unchain your tiger; let loose your war dogs as soon as you please. I know the people you desire to war on. They await you with unflinching, unshrinking, unblanching firmness. I know full well the State you strike at. She is deeply enshrined in as warm affections, brave hearts, and high minds, as ever formed a living rampart for public liberty. They will receive this bill, sir, whether you pass the other or not, with scorn and indignation, and detestation. They never will submit to it. They will see in it the iron crown of Charlemagne placed upon the head of your Executive; they will see in it the scene upon the Luperical, vamped up and newly varnished; they will see in its hideous features of pains and penalties a declaration of war in all but its form; they cannot (for they are the best informed people on the face of the earth, or that ever have been on it, on the great principles of civil and political liberty) but see in it the utter prostration and demolition of State rights, State constitutions, ay, and of the federal constitution too. But, say gentlemen, and I am surprised at their blindness and hardihood, it is all a mistake; it is a mere bill for collecting the revenue—intended for the preservation of peace, and to prevent civil war. Civil war with whom? Sir, all usurpations are attempted on such mild, lovely, and benevolent pretexts as these. Peace, is it? Shame, shame! You pour fire and brimstone on our heads, and bid us, in the language of a departed friend, "Be quiet; it is Macassar oil—myrrh—frankincense!" You tell us, with this bill of pains and penalties, of army, and navy, and militia in your fist, that it is a mere matter of revenue collection; a very quiet, peaceable affair. You collect taxes at the point of the bayonet, and call it civil process!

I have intimated, and I repeat, that I will not oppose the taking up this bill by any indirect means; I am ready to meet and expose its deformity; I only ask that you will not gag us with your previous question. Vouchsafe me that, you may go your ways; but that you can apply the gag, is but too manifest, since the cordial junction pro tanto of two hostile parties; the one opposed to the President, and who declares that he is not worthy of his office, or of the trust and confidence of the country; and another that seems willing to grant him any thing he asks.

I heard a gentleman somewhere near me say that the whole question is one of dollars and cents. To be sure, it is the very gist and marrow of it; if it were not that there were such things as Southern dollars and cents, we would never have heard the question made; the nefarious system would never have grown up. All governmental oppressions, exactions, and tyranny throughout the world, and through all time, have been perpetrated for the dollars and the cents of honest people, earned by the sweat of their brow, for the purpose of giving them to the powerful or roguish, who did not earn them. If, however, it is meant to say that South Carolina makes a question of the mere amount, the more or less, to be contributed for the support of the Government, the short answer is, it is not true. What does her bright and glorious history tell you? To coin her heart for money; to drop her blood for drachms! Her objection is to your taking her dollars and cents, not for the support of the Government she jointly made with her sister States, but for the purpose of putting them in your pockets, or of the people or States you represent. The amount, even then, she might have borne as a temporary injustice, had you not declared it a perpetuity. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WALKER] has informed us that this bill will be harmless, as a tariff project, not yet submitted, will certainly be adopted, that is better than either yet proposed. I am delighted to hear it; but why, in the name of liberty, is it not offered to us instead of this outrage on the constitution? Why arm the President with powers so dangerous to peace and freedom; and in the face of a recorded refusal by your predecessors to give the pacific civilian, the mild, virtuous, humane Jefferson, the much lesser power of suspending the habeas corpus act? Is this thing so coveted by, and gratifying to the President? Is this bloody bill, this Boston port bill, so delightful to him that it is to be preferred to that which is said to be pacificatory? Why, sir, if he must be gratified—must be amused and pleasantly employed, buy him a tee-to-tum, or some other harmless toy, but do not give him the purse and sword of the nation, the army and navy, and whole military power of the country, as peaceful playthings to be used at his discretion. If, however, this bill must pass; if there be no substitute so palatable as blood, I withdraw my opposition to its being taken up, and only ask the privilege of exposing its details; although I clearly see that the interested passions on one side, and a supple subserviency on another, will ensure its passage by a very large majority. In what I have said, no individual allusion was pretended: I fired at the flock. My allusion was to a state of things as notorious as noonday. Our situation is peculiar, and some allowances should be made. Our representatives on this floor are small in number. Our people love honor as they do liberty: both have been assailed. We value highly the opinion of the wise and good; many, very many of whom we recognise in the ranks of our adversaries. It is when they show a disbelief or suspicion of the integrity of our purposes, or purity of our motives, that we feel the iron enter our hearts.

One word, sir, to the gentleman over the way—entirely over the way—who says this bill is necessary, because South Carolina has not yet repealed her ordinance. "Has not yet," I presume, means, notwithstanding the President's proclamation. Sir, South Carolina has received the insolent mandate of the President, commanding her to retrace her steps, tear from her archives one of the brightest pages of her glory, and alter the fundamental principles of her constitution; and she sends him back for answer (through her humble representatives) the message sent from Utica to Cæsar—

"Bid him disband his legions;
"Restore the commonwealth to liberty;
"Submit his actions to the public censure,
"Abide the judgment of a Roman Senate,
"And strive to gain the pardon of the people."

That, sir, is her answer.

Mr. MARDIS did not rise to discuss the proposition, but to express his regret that the chairman of the committee, and those who acted with him, had felt themselves called upon to pursue the course which they had been pursuing, whilst they held feelings similar to his. They had declared the tariff bill to be most important, and it was strange that they should give another bill to supersede it. If gentlemen wished to express an opinion on the measures of the bill, they should do it in a way to conciliate. Then why not postpone the consideration till Thursday, and then take it up? It was said that, if the bill should be taken up to-morrow, all hopes of passing the tariff bill would be lost. Might it not yet, by perseverance, be turned to advantage? If any proposition was likely to be brought forward which would be acceptable to the House and the Senate, why not go on? If the tariff bill was postponed, there would be no occasion for the other; but if you pass that without the measure of peace, let gentlemen reflect upon it! The people of South Carolina were not opposed to the Union, but they were opposed to the tariff; and if they were driven from measures which were constitutional, they had but one measure to take, and they would take it. If gentlemen supposed that passing that bill without the pacific measure of the tariff would not have that effect, they deceived themselves. The bill, he said, had a wrong title; it ought to be called a bill to dissolve the Union.

Mr. COULTER had given his vote under the impression that the little time that remained of the present session would be requisite for its discussion; but as he now understood that in some other place a measure had been matured, and that there was a majority of the House to support it, he would now vote to postpone the consideration of the other bill till Thursday. To gain the consent of the people, ought to be the first resort of any Government, and particularly a Government like ours, which originated from, and was for the benefit of the people. He would quell discontent by coercion, indeed, but it should be the coercion of kindness. He would soothe the people of South Carolina. Some gentlemen were of opinion that to yield to the wishes of South Carolina would be compromising the national honor. When opposed to a foreign foe, it was glorious to conquer with the sword; but when we contended with our friends, then it was glorious to talk of peace. Was there not some danger in offering to South Carolina the olive branch and the bayonet at once? Let it be remembered, said he, that our countrymen are freemen, and have the spirit of freemen, and when you offer them the cup of peace, do not mingle it with gunpowder. In the hope that that bill would pass that ought to pass, he would vote for a delay till Thursday, and, in the intervening time, when it was recollected that the happiness of the country and the Union was at stake, much might be done.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, was astonished that if gentlemen wished to discuss the bill, they should wish to put it off till Thursday.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose to appeal to the judgment of the House whether the present discussion could possibly be attended with any good results. Gentlemen who might be anxious to discuss the merits of the bill from the Senate must be aware that every hour that was occupied in this preliminary debate limited the time which would enable them to express their sentiments upon it. The same was the case with those who wished the tariff bill to be taken up, and he therefore hoped that no more would be said upon either, until the merits of the case should fairly and fully come before the House.

After some further remarks from Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. WAYNE, Mr. CAMBRELENG, and Mr. BELL, the question was taken on the motion to postpone the bill till Thursday, and negatived: Yeas 77, nays 108.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till Wednesday.

Mr. BEARDSLEY was in favor of the motion to make the bill the special order for to-morrow. It would be even then in the power of the House to take up the tariff bill, if a majority of the House should be in favor of doing so.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that those gentlemen who were opposed to the tariff bill were perfectly consistent in the course which they were taking to defeat that bill altogether. When the present question was disposed of, he intended to propose to take up the tariff bill to-night; and if the House were disposed to act upon it, much might be done towards introducing and acting upon one or other of those specific bills which were intended to supersede the tariff bill of the Committee of Ways and Means by to-morrow.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken, when the motion was negatived: Yeas 84, nays 99.

The question recurred on the motion to make it the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, rose to move an amendment that it be made the first special order for to-morrow.

This being declared not to be in order,

The question was taken on making it the special order for to-morrow, which was agreed to without a division.

Mr. WICKLIFFE then moved that the House take up the special order, (which was the tariff bill.)

The motion was agreed to by yeas and nays, 115 to 57.

The House then took up

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. LETCHER immediately rose, and moved to strike out all the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert another bill in lieu thereof, [the bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. CLAY.]

This being objected to,

Mr. LETCHER moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to report his bill to the House.

The bill and instructions having been read,

Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. ARNOLD, and Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, rose together to ask for the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken; when the motion was agreed to: Yeas 96, nays 54.

Mr. WICKLIFFE then moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WICKLIFFE in the chair.

Mr. LETCHER moved that the instructions of the committee be complied with, by adopting the bill he had offered.

The motion was agreed to forthwith, the bill was read, and the committee rose, and reported it to the House.

Mr. FOSTER moved to amend the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, by striking from the third section the following words: "And from and after the day last aforesaid, the duties required to be paid by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be assessed upon the value thereof, at the port where the same shall be entered, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. F. said he did not intend to detain the House but a moment in explaining the reasons of his proposed amendment, nor did he wish to embarrass the effort which was making to adjust the great question which had not only so long divided our councils, but distracted our country. On the contrary, he would cheerfully contribute his feeble aid to the success of an object so desirable and important. But he found, in the amendment of the committee, a clause which, from the slight view he had been able to take of it, seemed to conflict with a provision in the constitution familiar to every one, that "all duties shall be uniform." Now, said Mr. F., we have a ~~seacoast~~ extending from Maine to Louisiana, with numerous ports of entry. At each of these ports you have your appraisers to assess the value of the goods imported; and on this assessment you propose to calculate the duties. Can it be presumed that these appraisers will all affix the same value on articles of the same quality? And if this is not done, if the appraisements vary, will not the duties necessarily vary also? How is it possible for the uniformity required by the constitution to be preserved, if this regulation is adopted? Having suggested the difficulty, Mr. F. proposed to obviate it by the amendment which he had offered, and was content to submit it to the determination of the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said the objection of his friend against the particular clause was a constitutional one, arising from the difficulty of ascertaining the duties in different ports. For example, an article might be purchased in Paris, and another of the same description in Manchester. They would bear different prices where purchased, but be of the same value here, and the difficulty would be to ascertain the duties chargeable on each article. His [Mr. FOSTER's] object was to make the duties equal in every port.

Mr. FOSTER's motion was negatived; and the question being stated on engrossing the new bill,

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, rose, and said he was greatly surprised at the sudden movement made in this House. One short hour ago, said he, we were collecting our papers, and putting on our outside garments to go home, when the gentleman from Kentucky rose, and proposed to send this bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to strike it all out, and insert, by way of amendment, an entire new bill, formed upon entirely different principles; yes, to insert, I believe, the bill which the Senate now have under consideration. This motion was carried; the business has passed through the hands of the committee, is now in the House, and there is a cry of question, question, around me, upon the engrossment of the bill. Who that was not a party to this arrangement, could one hour ago have credited this? We have, I believe, been laboriously engaged for eight weeks upon this topic, discussing and amending the bill which has been before the House. Such obstacles and difficulties have been met at every move, that, I believe, very little hope has of late been entertained of the passage of any bill. But a gleam of light has suddenly burst upon us; those that groped in the dark seemed suddenly to see their course; those that halted, doubted, hesitated, are in a moment made firm; and even some of those that have made an immediate abandonment of the protective system a sine qua non of their approbation of any legislation, seem almost to favor this measure. I am obliged to acknowledge that gentlemen have sprung the proposition upon us at a moment when I did not expect it. And as the measure is one of great interest to the people of the United States, I must, even at this late hour, when I know the House is both hungry and impatient, and when I perceive distinctly it is their pleasure to vote rather than debate, beg their indulgence for a few minutes while I state some of the reasons which impose on me the duty of opposing the passage of this act. [Cries from different parts of the House, "go on, go on, we will hear."]

Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of hasty legislation under any circumstances, but it is especially to be deprecated in matters of great importance. That this is a measure of great importance, affecting, more or less, the entire population of the United States, will not be denied, and ought, therefore, to be matured with care, and well understood by every gentleman who votes upon it. And yet, sir, a copy has, for the first time, been laid upon our tables, since I rose to address you; and this is the first opportunity we have had even to read it. I hope others feel well prepared to act in this precipitate manner; but I am obliged to acknowledge I do not; for I hold even the best of intentions will not, in legislation, excuse the errors of haste.

I am aware that this measure assumes an imposing attitude. It is called a bill of compromise; a measure of harmony, of conciliation; a measure to heal disaffection, and to save the Union. Sir, I am aware of the imposing effect of these bland titles; men love to be thought generous, noble, magnanimous; but they ought to be equally anxious to acquire the reputation of being just. While they are anxious to compose difficulties in one direction, I entreat them not to oppress and wrong the people in another. In their efforts to save the Union, I hope their zeal will not go so far as to create stronger and better founded discontents than those they compose. Peacemakers, mediators, men who allay excitements, and tranquillize public feeling, should, above all considerations, study to do it by means not offensive to the contending parties, by means which will not inflict a deeper wound than the one which is healed. Sir, what is demanded by those that threaten the integrity of the Union? An abandonment of the American system; a formal renunciation of the right to protect American industry. This is the language of the nullification convention; they declare they regard the abandonment of the principle as vastly more important than any other matter; they look to that, and not to an abatement of duties without it; and the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DAVIS,] with his usual frankness, told us this morning it was not a question of dollars and cents; the money they regarded not, but they required a change of policy. They demand the pound of flesh, with the unyielding obstinacy of Shylock, and they require this House to apply the knife nearest to the heart; and shall it be cut away? Is it patriotic? Is it harmonizing public feeling? Is it saving the Union to drain out the life-blood? What is this bill? I will not say it goes at once to such extremities, but it seems to me to contain a principle which works an unqualified abandonment of the protective policy, unless changes greater than we have a right to look for shall take place in our condition.

It proposes to descend, by a reduction, once in two years, of two-tenths of the excess of duties over and above twenty per cent. for nearly eight years. It then proposes to divide the residue of such excess into two equal parts, and to remove the whole in two years, so that all duties on all imports will be run down to a level of twenty per cent. ad valorem, in between nine and ten years. The first part of the descent may be termed gradual; but in the last two years, the strides are, I fear, decidedly too long to be met by any preparation for them. Our course then is down hill during this time, wearing out the American system; and when we arrive at the foot, we pass out from under the protection of that parental benefactor, and place ourselves under the guardianship of the Carolina system. I say from the American to the Carolina system, because duties which are now below 20 per cent., are to be raised to that amount, and all free articles, with the exception of an unimportant list of dyestuffs, are to be subjected to duties. Duties are, therefore, at the end of our declivitous course, to fall on all imported merchandise at an equal rate of 20 per cent. This is the Carolina system.

What will be the effect of this bill? The protection will be diminished from year to year. This will check the operations of capital; it will, I fear, stop investments, if it does not crush that enterprising, valuable class of young men who have entered upon business, relying upon their industry and capacity to carry them forward. They are in debt, and I fear timid creditors may fall upon them. Business then will be brought to a stand at any rate, and, if bankruptcies ensue, will be diminished. This is precisely what some interested in manufacturing are selfish enough to desire, for they have money; wages will be cheaper, if a portion of the mills cease to run, and no new ones are erected, and the capitalists will, by this means, in the end, gain more by a diminution in the competition in business, and the reduction in wages, than they will lose by the reduction in duties. But, sir, this is a policy founded in such naked selfishness; it is built up so manifestly at the expense of those who have small capital, and of the laborers; it is so hostile to the first principles of protection which invite the free investment of capital from all quarters, that goods may be made cheap by the competition, and the public be thus benefited, that no friend of American labor can give it his approbation on that ground. It may answer for a time the purposes of a few, if it operates as they anticipate; but should this prove so, it will be an unanswerable argument with the public for disapproving of it, for the causes which will make the measure valuable to some, will make it injurious to the public.

Again, sir, I can vote for no bill which abandons protection. I think this does. It adopts the Carolina system for equalizing duties, by bringing them all to 20 per cent. It abandons the exercise of all right to discriminate, and in that, give me leave to say, abandons common sense, for the system of equalization has never, to my knowledge, until now, found an advocate among financiers or political economists. It is, however, a very cunningly devised plan, and worthy of its origin, (Gallatin, in the free trade report,) for it contains a sweet poison that will destroy the last remnant of protection. Who ever heard of so absurd a system as equalizing duties? What, impose the same duties on ardent spirits as upon tea and coffee! But why do the free traders desire an equalization? Why do they insist that the duty on hats, on shoes and boots, on leather, on scythes, hoes and axes, shall be reduced to 20 per cent.? Why do they at the same time insist that there shall be a duty of 20 per cent. on tea and coffee, pepper, spices, fruits, and a thousand other things which we do not, and never shall produce, and which are now free of duty? It is to level all protection with the dust. They start with the proposition that the public debt is paid, that we have too much revenue, and it must be reduced. We have always contended, not that the revenue shall not be reduced, for we are not the advocates of an accumulating surplus, but that it shall be reduced by letting goods in free, or by diminishing the amount of duty when the whole cannot be spared, and that this principle shall be applied to merchandise not produced in this country, that our labor may have the benefit of the revenue as a protection. While we contend that the revenue shall be levied in this manner, the free traders insist that nothing shall be free, and that the duty on all shall be alike. The revenue, say they, is too abundant, and must be reduced. The bill before us, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, is for that purpose. What a happy mode of reducing the revenue, to diminish the duty on hats, shoes, boots, leather, axes, &c., from 30 per cent. and more, to 20 per cent., when the articles are so entirely produced here, under the present protection, that none are imported, and no revenue is realized. Is not the direct and obvious effect of such a reduction an experiment, to see if the foreign articles cannot be introduced, and the revenue increased instead of diminished? It is a still more singular mode of reducing revenue to restore the duties on articles which are free. Sir, the farmers, the mechanics, the manufacturers, cannot be blind to such an insidious scheme. They will not fail to discover that the reductions of duty on a vast variety of articles produced wholly in this country are made under a false pretence of reducing the revenue; and that the restoration of duties to free articles is also made under the delusive pretence of making taxes more equal. It will not escape their observation that this crafty plan of reducing revenue is apparently devised for the purpose of overstocking the treasury, and creating a surplus from year to year, so as to call for further and further reductions, till you come, as the politicians of South Carolina declare you shall, to twelve and a half per cent. Is it not plain that an equalization gives the least protection which industry can possibly have, unless you make the duties on articles which we do not produce, higher than you rate them on such as we do produce? When you have arrived at twenty per cent., if there is a surplus, you have, I believe, the right to discriminate below that: but of what value is such a right? Twenty per cent. ad valorem upon the foreign cost; what is that? Go to the officers of the custom-house in New York, who witness the daily frauds and impositions of importers. Go to the head of that establishment, who, it is said, declared openly in this city, it was a railroad for legalized smuggling, and inquire what a twenty per cent. ad valorem duty, or any other ad valorem duty, is. And if they tell you the truth, it will be, that it is whatever the importer chooses to have it.

This bill, after we have made our descent, facilis descensus Avernus, carries us into the free trade system, which may be summed up under three heads.

1. All specific duties are abolished, and all duties are to be ad valorem; all free traders, and especially the Yorkshire men and Lancashire men of England, have always earnestly contended for this. For what reason, it is difficult to imagine, unless it is because frauds are perpetrated with greater facility.

2. All duties are to be equal, and to be assessed upon all imports, except a few articles of little importance, and consequently the discriminating principle is abandoned.

3. The gradual reduction which is professedly made to reduce revenue, is applied to all articles, as well those on which no revenue is raised, as those which produce revenue; thus tending, by every reduction, to bring the American producer into greater peril at every step. If this be not a total, unqualified abandonment of the protective policy, unless twenty per cent. is protective, then I know not what is an abandonment. The bill, it is true, provides that after we come to the twenty per cent. ad valorem, the duty is to be assessed on the valuation in the home market. About the meaning of this, however, there is already a dispute. The South say it means the price of the goods by the duties and charges; that is, it means the foreign cost; and a distinguished gentleman declared in debate distinctly, that he supported the bill upon that exposition of its meaning. If this be a true interpretation, the provision is worth nothing. That valuation is to be regulated by law, according to the terms of the bill, and what that regulation will prove to be, no one can foresee.

Sir, I regret that discontent and signs of violence have manifested themselves in this country; but I am not disposed to meet it with a faint heart, or to falter for a moment in support of the Union and constitution. I would face these disturbers of the public tranquillity on their own ground, and accede to the general proposition that the revenue shall be reduced to the demands of the Government; but the amount of expenditure shall be fixed by Congress, and not by South Carolina; and the revenue should be raised in such a manner as to give the most efficient protection to American labor. For one, sir, while I would do South Carolina justice, ample justice, I would not destroy the Union by attempting to save it. I would not bring the power of Congress and the constitution into contempt, by establishing a precedent, that a little knot of uneasy, discontented politicians can, by threatening to dissolve the Union, make the Government itself bow down, humble itself in the dust, abandon its policy, and promise in future to give no offence. If these are the terms on which the Union exists, if this Government holds and exercises its powers upon such contingencies as these, I was about to say, the sooner the Union is at an end the better, for the rude breath of treason will dissolve it at any moment. But, sir, whether South Carolina is well or ill pleased, whether she declares herself in or out of the Union, I am not prepared, on any compromise, to give up the protective policy; and I do contend that an equalization of duties as low, or lower, than twenty per cent. protection, is incompatible. Yes, when you surrender, the right to discriminate, you surrender all.

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

This is a bill to tranquillize feeling, to harmonize jarring opinions; it is oil poured into inflamed wounds; it is to definitively settle the matters of complaint. What assurance have we of that? Have those who threatened the Union accepted it? Has any one here risen in his place, and announced his satisfaction and his determination to abide by it? Not a word has been uttered, nor any sign or assurance of satisfaction given. Suppose they should vote for the bill, what then? They voted for the bill of July last, and that was a bill passed expressly to save the Union; but did they not flout at it? Did they not spurn it with contempt? And did not South Carolina, in derision of that compromise, nullify the law? This is a practical illustration of the exercise of a philanthropic spirit of condescension to save the Union. Your folly and your imbecility was treated as a jest. It has already been said that this law will be no more binding than any other, and may be altered and modified at pleasure by any subsequent Legislature. In what sense then is it a compromise? Does not a compromise imply an adjustment on terms of agreement? Suppose, then, that South Carolina should abide by the compromise while she supposes it beneficial to the tariff States, and injurious to her; and when that period shall close, the friends of protection shall then propose to re-establish the system. What honorable man, who votes for this bill, could sustain such a measure? Would not South Carolina say, you have no right to change this law, it was founded on compromise; you have had the benefit of your side of the bargain, and now I demand mine. Who could answer such a declaration? If, under such circumstances, you were to proceed to abolish the law, would not South Carolina have much more just cause of complaint and disaffection than she now has?

It has been said, we ought to legislate now, because the next Congress will be hostile to the tariff. I am aware that such a sentiment has been industriously circulated, and we have been exhorted to escape from the hands of that body as from a lion. But, sir, who knows the sentiments of that body on this question? Do you, or does any one, possess any information which justifies him in asserting that it is more unfriendly than this House? There is, in my opinion, little known about this matter. But suppose the members shall prove as ferocious towards the tariff as those who profess to know their opinions represent, will the passage of this bill stop their action? Can you tie their hands? Give what pledges you please, make what bargains you may, and that body will act its pleasure without respecting them. If you fall short of their wishes in warring upon the tariff, they will not stay their hand; but all attempts to limit their power by abiding compromises, will be considered by them as a stimulus to act upon the subject, that they may manifest their disapprobation. It seems to me, therefore, that if the next Congress is to be feared, we are pursuing the right course to rouse their jealousy, and excite them to action.

Mr. Speaker, I rose to express my views on this very important question, I regret to say, without the slightest preparation, as it is drawn before us at a very unexpected moment. But, as some things in this bill are at variance with the principles of public policy which I have uniformly maintained, I could not suffer it to pass into a law without stating such objections as have hastily occurred to me.

Let me, however, before sitting down, be understood on one point. I do not object to a reasonable adjustment of the controversies which exist. I have said repeatedly on this floor, that I would go for a gradual reduction on protected articles; but it must be very gradual, so that no violence shall be done to business; for all reduction is necessarily full of hazard. My objections to this bill are not so much against the first seven years, for I would take the consequences of that experiment, if the provisions beyond that were not of that fatal character which will at once stop all enterprise. But I do object to a compromise which destines the East for the altar. No victim, in my judgment, is required, none is necessary; and yet you propose to bind us, hand and foot, to pour out our blood upon the altar, and sacrifice us as a burnt offering, to appease the unnatural and unfounded discontent of the South; a discontent, I fear, having deeper root than the tariff, and will continue when that is forgotten. I am far from meaning to use the language of menace, when I say such a compromise cannot endure, nor can any adjustment endure, which disregards the interests, and sports with the rights of a large portion of the people of the United States. It has been said that we shall never reach the lowest point of reduction, before the country will become satisfied of the folly of the experiment, and will restore the protective policy; and it seems to me a large number in this body act under the influence of that opinion. But I cannot vote down my principles, on the ground that some one may come after me who will vote them up.

Mr. Speaker, I have done my duty, in an imperfect manner, I confess; but I perceive it is in vain to discuss the matter, and I will detain the House no longer.

Mr. H. EVERETT asked the attention of the House for a few minutes. He said he was unwilling that his dissent should be given by a mere silent vote. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LETCHER] had said the House had had ample time to examine the bill, and he presumed the minds of the members were made up. It was true that the Senate bill had been laid on their tables some days ago: the amendments which had since been made in the Senate were adopted in the bill now before the House; these, he admitted, had improved the bill, but still had not rendered it satisfactory to him. For one, Mr. E. said, he did not complain of want of time; he had formed an opinion, and that opinion he now rose to express. He considered the bill, as originally reported in the Senate, as a total, an absolute abandonment of the protective system after 1842—at least, it was but a lease to the manufacturers for seven or eight years, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, a notice to wind up their concerns within that time: their destruction was slow, but sure. The existing protection was to go down, down, from year to year, until the end of the term, when the existing establishments were to be abandoned by the Government: he said the existing establishments, for new ones could not be expected. Prudent capitalists would not adventure in a sinking concern. About the same time was given that was allowed the bank to wind up; and were theirs a mere money business, they would have less reason to complain; but, unfortunately, their capital was fixed, and must be sacrificed. Factories and machinery were of no value unless in operation. The owners of flocks were not in a much less hopeless condition. He repeated that the bill, as originally laid on their tables, abandoned, totally abandoned, the protective policy. It reduced all duties to the same level, twenty per cent. Even the principle of discriminating duties was abandoned. In its present form, he admitted that principle was faintly perceptible. "Congress were not to be prevented from altering the rates of duties on articles which are now subject to a less duty than twenty per cent. in such manner as not to exceed that rate;" that is, they may raise or lower the rates of duties on the unprotected articles, but may not raise the duties on the protected articles above twenty per cent. This is the only discriminating principle now in the bill; and this, poor as it was, he should show was wholly illusory; that the wants of the Government would require the full duty of twenty per cent. on the unprotected articles. The change of the foreign for the home valuation, he admitted, was a valuable improvement, though its principal value must, in a very considerable degree, if not wholly, depend on the regulations which "may be hereafter established by law." The gentleman from Kentucky had echoed the cry of alarm which had been heard from another quarter, that the protective system was in danger; that the next Congress would prostrate it. Such alarms tended to create the peril they announced. That system, in his opinion, had no greater peril to encounter than the one of which St. Paul complained as the chief of perils. He was willing to trust it to the next Congress: they, he trusted, would protect the great interests of the country. This projet had come upon the manufacturers from an unexpected source: the blow had not been anticipated from that quarter. If there should be a majority in the next Congress against the protective policy, the manufacturers, the farmers would submit with what grace they may. If the system should then fall, it would fall under the superior force of the enemy. But, said Mr. E., the occasion had excited feeling—better, perhaps, suppressed than uttered. He had heard it said, out of the House, that we were only bending to the blast; that we should right when it had passed over us. But was such a forecast just? Should not they who present, and they who accept this bill as a measure of conciliation, do it in good faith, without mental reservations? For one, he did not join in the offer, nor would he pledge himself or his constituents to abide by it. He would ask the gentleman from Kentucky what would be the financial operation of the bill? What would be the amount of revenue accruing under it, particularly in 1841 and 1842—the period when it was to settle down as the revenue system of the Government? These were the periods to which the manufacturers would look (he would not say they had been encouraged to look) for the restoration of the protective system. Taking the excessive importations of 1831 as the basis of calculation, the amount of the proposed reduction of duties on the protected articles (paying over twenty per cent.) would be nearly twelve millions, ($11,924,000;) the whole amount of the customs, in 1841, would be between ten and eleven millions, ($10,846,000;) and, after the final reduction in 1842, about seven millions, ($7,268,000.) How would the deficiency of revenue be supplied? The last section proposes it should be supplied by raising the duties on the dutiable, unprotected articles up to twenty per cent. This would give short of eight millions, ($7,679,000;) making the whole revenue from the customs less than fifteen millions, ($14,947,000.) What then becomes of the discriminating principle of protection? If additional revenues are to be raised, in what manner could it be done? It must be done either by raising the duties on the protected articles, or by laying duties on the articles now free.

Should this bill pass, said Mr. E., he should be almost prepared to concur in the opinion he had heard expressed in the House this morning, that it would do away the necessity of passing the enforcing bill. The duties were eventually to come down to the same rate on all dutiable articles—to twenty per cent., the South Carolina standard. With her it was only a question of time, unless she should still insist that there should be no articles imported free of duty. This was one of her unalterable resolutions. Mr. E. said he did not wish to prolong the debate. He had risen to state the light in which he had viewed the bill, and in which he thought it would be viewed by the country—as the ultimate abandonment of the protecting policy.

Mr. DICKSON also opposed the bill, and moved its postponement till to-morrow. Negatived.

Mr. LETCHER spoke in reply, and in defence of the bill; when the question was put on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and carried: Yeas 105, nays 71, as follows:

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

THE TARIFF.

The engrossed bill to reduce the tariff (as amended by the adoption of Mr. CLAY's bill of the Senate) was read a third time, and the question stated to be on its passage.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, after a few remarks on the great importance of this question, moved a call of the House.

The House was called accordingly.

It appeared that two hundred and one members were present.

Mr. BURGESS moved to suspend further proceedings on the call, but the motion failed: Yeas 69, nays 78.

The doors were then closed, and the excuses of absentees received. Proceedings were then suspended, and the doors of the hall again opened.

Mr. BURGESS, of Rhode Island, then rose to address the House against the bill. I have not risen, at this time, said he, to enter into any extended discussion of the bill just now read to the House: it is my purpose to do no more than to pronounce an humble protestation against the provisions of this measure; to state a solemn denunciation of the purposes intended to be effected by its enactment; and, in a few words, to express my utter abhorrence of the causes which, as I think, must have brought such a scheme before Congress.

If, sir, you will permit me to do it, I will first read, from my place, the resolutions, brief, but full of meaning, which, on the morning of the 21st day of the last month, I had the honor to present to this House, and to move the reference of them to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. These resolutions were sent to me and my colleague by the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations. They had been, on the 16th day of that month, unanimously passed in both the House of Representatives and the Senate of that State; and, speaking our sentiments in a better style, they announce to us the opinions and requirements of the State representatives of that portion of the American people who have honored us with a place in this House. It appears by this paper, that in General Assembly, January session, A. D. 1833, it was Resolved, That this General Assembly views with alarm, and with unqualified disapprobation, the propositions which have been submitted to the Congress of the United States, at the present session thereof, for abandoning, totally or partially, immediately or prospectively, the principle of protection to domestic industry, which was adopted with the constitution, has been ever since incorporated in the laws of the Union, and was believed to be, what of right it ought to be, a permanent and settled principle of the policy of the Government, on faith of which the people of this enterprising and industrious republic might act with confidence, and be secure in their labors and pursuits.

Resolved, That this Assembly does not perceive, in the present juncture of the affairs of the Union, nor in the suggestions submitted in connexion with the aforesaid propositions, any sufficient reason for a change in national policy, of a character so comprehensive, and fraught with consequences widely disastrous, and to a fearful extent absolutely ruinous to the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, the population, power, and happiness of a now prosperous people. On the contrary, this Assembly being convinced that, under existing circumstances, the sole path of safety is that of calm and persevering firmness, cannot but view, with equal surprise and disapprobation, all suggestions that countenance the substitution of the will of a minority for that of a very great majority of the people of these States; and protests against the ratification of any such suggestions, by the adoption, at this time, of any national measure affecting the national industry, resources, or revenue, in conformity thereto. And this protest it makes, under a solemn and irresistible conviction that every such measure would not only tend to introduce into all our future councils weakness, irresolution, and inconstancy, but would paralyze every just power of the Government, and create a far greater and more immediate probability of a dissolution both of the Government and of the Union, than any which otherwise exists.

Resolved, That this Assembly cannot perceive how a surrender of a principle necessary for the independence and prosperity of the nation, to menaces of disunion, or of lawless resistance proceeding from a minority, can be less disastrous to the interests or to the honor of the nation, than a surrender to actual and overpowering force: nor how those who are constrained, or who are willing thus, in anticipation, to surrender, can be said to enjoy the benefits and protection of a republican Government, or to possess the character essential to the existence of such a Government.

Resolved, That the essential and vital interests of the people of this State, and, in the opinion of this General Assembly, the interests of the great body of the people in all the States, including those in which the dissatisfaction of a part has been most distinctly manifested, and most speciously argued, require that the protection now provided by law should be continued to articles of the growth, production, and manufacture of the United States.

Resolved, That the necessity of a protective tariff by no means arises either solely or principally from its importance to those who, upon the faith of the Government, have invested their capital in manufacturing establishments; that such a tariff is demanded by considerations affecting the independence and security of the nation, in times of commotion, and affecting its resources, and the resources, enjoyments, comforts, and necessities of its individual citizens in all times, that the great and paramount class of proprietors and cultivators of the soil in every State, the whole class of laborers, whether deriving the means of their subsistence from mechanical or other daily toil—the whole class of employers and employed, who are engaged in a sound and profitable commerce, interior and exterior, foreign or domestic—classes which mainly constitute the population and strength of the republic, her means of advancement in peace, and her hope of defence in war—all these, and the millions who compose them, whether considered in classes, or singly as individuals, have a deep, a fixed, and absorbing interest in the preservation of the protection now extended to the national industry; an interest in respect to which the interests of the owners and conductors of manufacturing establishments, also requiring that protection, are intermediate, subsidiary, and subservient.

Resolved, That a vacillating policy, in the regulation of trade and intercourse with foreign nations, is destructive to all branches of our national industry.

Resolved, That the effect of frequent alterations of the tariff laws is to distract and paralyze the enterprise of the merchant, to destroy the stability of the markets for the agriculturist, and bring ruin upon the manufacturer.

Resolved, That all branches of our national industry have been arranged, contracts made, voyages projected, and business commenced, under the belief and expectation that the tariff of the last session of Congress was framed and solemnly enacted after mature deliberation, and that reliance could be placed upon the stability of these measures of the Government.

Resolved, That, without a countervailing policy in the regulation of trade with foreign nations, all branches of our industry will be paralyzed, as was the case before the adoption of the constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That the Senators from this State in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives be requested, to use their exertions and influence to prevent any abandonment whatever of the protective policy, and also to prevent such a reduction of the protection now extended by law to the productions of the soil, mines, and manufactures of the United States, as has been proposed to Congress at the present session thereof, and is embraced in the bill now pending before that body, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be certified by the Secretary, and forthwith transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

House of Representatives, January 16, 1833.—Voted unanimously.

In Senate.—Read the same day, and unanimously concurred in.

I protest against this measure, continued Mr. B., because, like that which has been stricken out of the bill, to make room for its insertion, it proposes to provide for the wants of Government, but does not propose to make any provision for the wants of the nation. It calls on the people for money to feed that Government, and at the same time takes away that protection of their labors, by which the people have hitherto been enabled to feed themselves. Not less than one million seven hundred and fifteen thousand free white working men are annually employed in the agricultural, mechanic, and manufacturing labor of the Eastern, Northern, and Western States of this Union. That part of these men thus employed in mechanic and manufacturing labor, depend on that part of them employed in agricultural labor, in the same and other States, for a market for their fabrics; and a supply in return of food; of corn, wheat, flour, beef, pork, and other provisions, amounting annually to more than $27,000,000. They also look to them, and to other producers in many of the States, for a further market for like fabrics; and expect, in exchange, the products of their lands and mines, equal to $15,000,000 in amount annually. Those employed in the farming and mineral labors of these States, look to such as are engaged in these mechanic and manufacturing labors, for this market for their products, and therein for their supply, by this exchange of those various manufactured fabrics annually to this great amount.

By the destruction of this mechanic and manufacturing labor, men employed in agriculture, whether on their own lands, or farming the lands of others, must lose that market; and not only lose their annual supply of those fabrics heretofore purchased in it, but their annual production left on their hands for want of a market, must, to this amount, annually be utterly lost to them. For in no other market of the world could they sell their breadstuffs and provisions, their wool, their lead, their iron and steel.

This loss will take from those thus engaged in the labors of farming and the mines, not only the ability to obtain manufactured fabrics, but also the power to purchase and consume annually, as they do now, four or five millions in amount of sugar, produced in Southern Georgia and Louisiana; and thereby leave this production, to that amount, on the hands of the planters of those States. There it must perish, unless they can find a market for it in Europe, where such a market for United States sugar has not, I believe, ever been found to the amount of ten hogheads in any one year.

I pass over the rice and tobacco, drawn from the South by the owners of manufacturing capital in the North; nor mention the cotton, on which their great fabrics now so much depend; in all amounting probably to $10,000,000 annually. This omission is made because the great, rich, and independent manufacturing capitalists of the North can and will stand their ground, though they will stand that ground alone, under the provisions of this bill. When those provisions shall be carried out into perfect operation, as they will be at the end of ten years, the great, independent, manufacturing capitalist will then not depend on the South for the raw materials which he can then bring from any country at a mere revenue duty of twenty per cent.; a tax of no importance to him, because it must be paid finally by the domestic consumer of his fabric. Nor will the Southern planter then depend, for he does not now depend, on the domestic market, for the sale of his great staples. These two classes, the rich owners of great manufacturing capital in the North, or of capital in land and slaves in the South, are perfectly independent of each other's production, by the provisions of this bill; and may stand with perfect impunity, under those provisions of this measure, which must be so ruinous to all those, at this time, operating with that limited capital, or employed in those various labors, now encouraged or protected by that system of laws intended to be destroyed by these provisions.

How do the provisions of this bill ensure the destruction of that system? By the utter abandonment of even the very principle of discriminating, countervailing, or protecting duties of impost on imported goods, wares, and merchandise. At the end of ten years these duties, that is, the whole system of imposts, are to be reduced to twenty per cent. ad valorem, and to stand at that rate upon all imported commodities, such as are produced in our own country, by our own domestic industry. So utterly is protection, in its very principle, abandoned by this bill, that if more revenue shall be wanted than may be obtained, by this rate of impost on protected commodities, such impost shall not be raised on such commodities above twenty per cent.; but such impost for such revenue shall be placed on tea, coffee, and other articles unprotected, because not produced in this country; and such impost may, for revenue, be raised up to twenty per cent. This bill, therefore, not only takes from all the free labor of the free States the whole benefit of the present system of encouragement and protection, but may, and doubtless will in its progress, still further discourage such free labor by a heavy tax placed on the imported food of that labor; tea, coffee, and sugar—a tax from which the slave owners of the South will be exempted, in respect of all their labor; because neither tea, nor coffee, nor sugar, is ever consumed by the slaves.

This bill provides concerning all impost on any protected commodity, that whenever such impost exceeds twenty per cent. ad valorem, all such excess shall be divided into ten parts; and that a tithe of this whole excess shall annually be taken away, until at the end of ten years no impost shall remain at a higher rate, on any commodity, than twenty per cent. on its value.

The taking away a tenth part of this protection, annually, will, in two or three years, so expose the middling interest men, concerned in manufactures, to the first effects of foreign competition, created by excessive importation, that they must give up the conflict, and submit to the ruin provided for them by this measure.

This will leave the war of the trade in the hands of capitalists, who can afford to lose; and, outliving those losses, which ruin the less wealthy, they will take all the benefits resulting to them, as the survivors of their ruin. That ruin, and the certainty that all protection will terminate at the expiration of ten years, will discourage all owners of small, or middling, or even great capital from embarking in these manufactures, and will leave the whole concern to the over-wealthy now engaged in this business; these fortunate men, united with foreigners, will continue the trade, and supply the market. They will do this at such a rate of cost to the consumers in our country, as may be charged upon all manufactured fabrics sold in our market, by the producers of such fabrics in foreign countries. Whatever the cost of them may be in England or elsewhere, to that cost will be added the cost of importation, not less than fifteen per cent., and in like manner the amount of impost, twenty per cent., will so much further enhance the whole cost to the American consumer. The wealthy capitalists, the only surviving manufacturers of the North, then exempted from all domestic, will receive the full benefit of foreign competition—a competition which, in its first movements, by excessive importations, will have ruined all competitors of limited capital in our own country; and will thus finally enable those men, more abundant and independent in their means, to share with the wealthy manufacturer of other nations the spoils of our consumption, taxed, as it must then be, by the final effects of this measure, with not less than thirty-five per cent. more in amount, for our whole supply of manufactured fabrics, than would have been their cost, if wholly furnished by domestic production, under that system of encouragement and protection, and domestic competition, which the provisions of this bill are intended to destroy.

This evil will fall on the whole country, and will be a just retribution for the cruel and unrelenting ruin which this profligate measure will have brought on the many hundreds of thousands of free white working men, now employed in the mechanic, manufacturing, and agricultural labors of the free States. When the domestic manufacturers, the owners of the mills and machines, by the working of which those men now earn their bread, and that of their families; when these owners find they must surrender a tenth part of their protection—a tenth part of the impost, over and above twenty per cent. of the whole, they will call on their working men to surrender a like tenth part of their wages, or to leave their employment. When will this first call be made? In the very dead of the next winter, when they and their families must perish or have employment. It will be repeated annually at that season. They will surrender, rather than hear their children cry for bread when they have none to give them. This demand on labor for a reduction of wages will be repeated once a year, just as often as this bill makes a like reduction of the rate of that impost by which manufacturing labor and capital are now protected. At the end of ten years, when the whole protection is taken away, the wages of labor will be reduced to twenty per cent. of its present amount. What a consummation of what a scheme!

Those in the West, who have heretofore supported our great system of encouragement and protection, and who now support this measure, so fitted for the destruction of that system, will, I do not say with what feelings, hereafter meet some of our working men, who, driven out from their present life of toil and contentment, may migrate from the East to purchase and people their lands in Kentucky and Ohio. The rich capitalists of the East, who have advised, if any of them have advised this measure, will employ those who cannot migrate. They must, at last, by the progress of this measure, be compelled to work for twenty per cent. only of their present wages; because that measure will finally take away all but twenty per cent. from the protection of the manufacturer. He who now earns a dollar a day, must then work for twenty cents; he who now gets seventy-five will be glad to obtain fifteen; and he who now makes out to feed his family for fifty cents a day, must then toil hard, and struggle to keep them from starving, with ten.

Southern men, for whose especial gratification this arrangement has been made, will be enabled by it to see what they have long desired, but never expected to see—what they have long demanded of us to give them—the delightful vision: they will see free white working men in the free States laboring for as low, or a lower rate of wages, than the daily amount earned by their own slaves.

Besides all those men now employed in agricultural, mechanic, and manufacturing labor, there are also in those States many thousands engaged in building ships and various craft for water transportation, or in building workshops, mills, stores, warehouses, and mansions for human residence. Others are engaged in the labors of the forests; others, in the fisheries; others, in transportation by land, or in navigation on canals, rivers, lakes, or coastwise from port to port, in moving all the commerce among the several States; or in that navigation which carries out to other countries, and brings home the foreign commerce of the whole nation. The labors of those men are more directly and efficiently encouraged and protected by that great system of laws and policy which was begun with our present form of Government, and has been continued up to this very moment; but is now, in principle, abandoned in relation to all American free labor, though, in fact, the provisions of this bill do, at this time, surrender encouragement and protection in respect only to the free farming, mechanic, and manufacturing labor of those States which, until yesterday, would, in this hall, have stood against a world in defence of that encouragement and protection. Notwithstanding this, sir, the same feeble and submissive souls, which shall to-day surrender to the menace of the South all protection of the free people who toil in your fields, your workshops, and your factories, those souls will, if they should be here, themselves, at any time hereafter, they will be ready, if a few owners of slaves should look large, and bluster, and speak long, loud words at them, they will be ready to earn their own safety by a surrender of all that protection now given by your laws to those brave and hardy men who labor in your fisheries, your internal, your coasting, and foreign navigation. Nay, sir, whenever the owners of slaves in two States shall threaten the Union, as those of one now do, the spirit, should such a spirit now live here, in this hall, which shall, to-day, at the threat of that one only, give up the protection of a million and a half of freemen, working on the land, will abandon all protection of those gallant men who work your navy on the ocean. They will, at the crack of the same whip, pull down your stars and stripes, haul up and dismantle your ships; and as they have surrendered your labor on the land, for the benefit of free trade with foreign nations, they will surrender the protection of your labor on the ocean, for that degrading security to your commerce, which may be begged, or bought, or borrowed, or otherwise obtained, under the flag of those nations.

Sir, I have said, at the menace of the owners of slaves. Is it not so? Not more than four thousand five hundred men, owning slaves, in seven Southern States, and which are employed in growing cotton, rice, and tobacco, now call for the provisions of this bill, and demand the surrender of that of your system which now encourages and protects the labor of one million seven hundred and fifteen thousand men, working in your fields, factories, machine and other shops; using three hundred and twelve millions of mechanic and manufacturing, and three hundred and sixty-six millions of agricultural capital; producing one hundred and sixty millions of manufactured fabrics, and more than two hundred millions of agricultural products, and feeding, clothing, sheltering, lodging, and educating their own and the families of their employers; in all, not less than seven or eight millions of people. For what cause do these men of the South demand the overthrow of this system, the surrender of this protection of this free labor? They have told you, again and again, for the last six years, on this floor. It is recorded in their speeches so often, and with so many threats pronounced in this House and in the hearing of this nation. The labor of their slaves is worth to them, as they have so often averred, and with so many solemnities—is worth to them but twelve and a half cents a day; while our system of protection, as they also aver, secures to each free white working man, in the whole labor of the free States, not less than fifty cents a day. They do, therefore, demand this surrender, and this bill provides for the surrender of that protection; and we are now called on to vote for the enactment of that surrender; and all who this day shall, by their votes, secure that enactment, must, and will do so, that they may thereby effect this reduction in the wages of all this free labor; bring down the market value of all such labor to twelve and a half cents a day, and place the freeman of the North on a level with the slave of the South.

Can we, at such a call, and for such a purpose, extirpate and destroy the great principle of our national vitality; the whole abundantly productive power of our country? Of such a country too—given to our fathers by God himself, who has hitherto enabled us to defend, and preserve, and sustain that country, under a system of wholesome legislation, in a condition of progressive prosperity. Dare we, for a cause like this, to effect purposes like these, give to our congressional enactments a character so adversary to the hopes of man, and to the beneficence of the Creator? What is there in the treasures of divine munificence which we, as a people, shall not have set at naught, when we have thus sported with and thrown away the blessing of Heaven, now so abundantly enjoyed by this nation?

Sir, this measure not only abandons protection, both in fact and in principle, but, departing from all other purposes of all other impost laws, it ultimately establishes a system of national taxation. It is not a tax according to property, where those who have most to be defended by the laws shall pay most for that defence. It is not a tax upon income, where those whose wealth shall give them most to enjoy, pay the most for their enjoyments. In luxuries, the poor, or the labor of the nation, cannot indulge; but this is not a tax on luxuries. It lays an equal ad valorem burden on the necessities of the humble and industrious, and on the luxuries of the wealthy and indolent. The master of a thousand slaves pays no higher tax on tea, coffee, or sugar, the necessities of free labor, than must be paid by that labor itself.

Besides, sir, those who have hurried this measure into this House have never looked into the various parts of our country, to discover and ascertain what the people, in the different parts of it, from habits of life, and from trade and employments, consume of imported commodities for food and drink, for clothing and dress, for household furniture, for instruments of labor, and in raw materials worked up in their various labors of production. Without this survey, who can tell what East or West, North or South, will pay under this new assessment of taxes to be made by us in one or two hours of the darkness of last night, and one other of the daylight of this morning, and which is to last for ten years, and not to be altered hereafter by any discriminating amendment, lightening its burdens by equalizing its exactions?

Sir, I assert it here in my place, before the American people, and before the world, that, under the provisions of this measure, New England will pay more than twice as much as any equal number of people in any section of the slaveholding States north of the Potomac, including the State of the gentleman [Mr. LETCHER] who brought this measure into the House. If any one deny it, I challenge him to the examination. The proof exists, and diligence and time can produce and lay the facts and confirmation before this House and the nation.

Sir, this inequality of taxation and payment has always existed in all your revenue derived from impost. It had its origin in the habits, labor, and employments of the Eastern States. Indeed, the manufacturing and commercial States, from a kind of necessity, pay more than their even share of taxes, according to their population, under any system of impost designed both for revenue and for commercial regulation. This inequality has been patiently endured by those States, because those laws of revenue and commercial regulation were a system, first, of encouragement, and, eventually, of protection for the whole labor and capital of the country. When this system should have effected its great purpose, that is, when the supply of all the great staple necessities required in our market, whether of agriculture or manufactured production from the land, labor, and capital of our own country; when, by raising the rate of impost duties so as to effect the exclusion of all those staples thus abundantly supplied by domestic industry, then, by removing all impost from raw materials and necessities for the food of labor, not produced at home; and, last of all, by placing high, but not prohibitory impost on imported luxuries not produced in our own country, our revenue would, by such a system, be drawn from the rich to the relief of the poor; and taxes, removed from labor, would fall on the property, under that consumption of those imported luxuries which their wealth would enable the rich to enjoy. Labor, released from taxation, might improve its own condition, and, with a home market secured to home production, the competition of domestic labor and capital would supply that market at the cheapest rate.

Sir, this measure does forever destroy all hope of perfecting that system, and reduces our impost laws to a mere scheme of taxation. The inequality endured while relief was ultimately to be expected by the perfection of our system; that hope cannot now be sustained when that expectation is forever taken away by the destruction of that system. Look back to the time when Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia were their own navigators and merchants. From 1800 to 1810, these States had not abandoned navigation and commerce, as they now have, for the more profitable vocations of growing cotton, rice, and tobacco. They then imported all the foreign commodities consumed by their population, and the custom-house record will exhibit a correct rate roll of their taxation. This, too, was then the fact, as it is now, with New England. Look at the population, and the payment made in those years by those States, and by New England. By the census of 1800, the population of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, was 1,871,529.

In the ten years from 1800 to 1810, inclusive, they paid $25,712,752 35.

By the same census, the population of New England was 1,854,011.

In the ten years from 1800 to 1810, inclusive, New England paid $32,732,576 88.

Each person in those four States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, paid $8 35 in the whole ten years; or 83 cents and 50 mills a head per annum.

At the same time, in New England, each person paid $17 65 in the ten years, or $1 76 and 50 mills a head per annum.

Under that census, the population of South Carolina was 345,541; and that State paid, in that ten years, $6,732,576 88, being $18 13 paid by each person in the whole ten years, or $1 81 and 30 mills a head per annum.

By the same census, the population of Rhode Island was 68,122, and that State paid, in that ten years, $2,630,386 36 cents, being $49 93 paid by each person in the whole ten years, or $4 99 and 30 mills a head per annum.

Sir, this inequality of payment has gradually increased, year after year, ever since 1810, because those very causes which then produced that inequality have, ever since that time, been increasing. It was then the character of New England being more navigating, commercial, and manufacturing, and that of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia being more agricultural and planting, which created this difference in the consumption of foreign commodities, and this consequent inequality in the payment of taxes assessed upon such commodities by impost. These characteristics of New England have, in the last twenty-three years, increased, and now have become established, while those States of the South have, during that time, almost entirely abandoned all commerce and navigation, and, allured by the high profits of cotton, rice, and tobacco, become exclusively planting States. So great is that inequality of taxation and payment, at this time, that I will venture to affirm, Rhode Island, with a population of not quite 100,000 persons, under the last census, paid more into the treasury the last year than South Carolina with a population of more than 500,000 persons; and Massachusetts, during the same time, paid a greater amount than all the seven States south of the Potomac. Nay more, sir; if the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. LETCHER,] who introduced this measure into this House, will undertake the examination of our taxes, and the payment of them, both now and hereafter, under his measure, I will add that State to those south of that river, since he has now united it to them in their hostility to our great and glorious system of encouragement and protection.

Sir, this measure, as a scheme of taxation, will ultimately be, of all others, the most unequal and oppressive in its exactions on the people of the navigating, commercial, and manufacturing States; and those men of those States who have, if any of them have, united with the West and the South in carrying it into a law for the next ten years, will, I hope in God, see their error, and that they will, before the provisions of this law shall have enabled a few men of enormous capital in our country to ruin all manufacturers of middling interest, and to reduce the wages of free labor to their proposed minimum of twenty per cent. of the present amount—they will, I hope, unite with those who this day, at every hazard, and at every sacrifice, oppose this measure; so that, all together, they may, with us, oppose a mound to the current of that ruin which otherwise must overwhelm and sweep away the interests, the prosperity, and the glory of our country.

Trust not, my countrymen, in the relentings of your adversaries. Hope not, as by those who were once your friends you are told to hope, that, if this day you will prostrate yourselves before the proud and angry foes of your prosperity, and permit them to set their feet upon your necks, the gratifying submission will appease their wrath, and they will, in some six or seven years, permit you, in some of their moments of good feeling, should such moments ever come, and you beg submissively, they will permit you to slip your heads out, to get up, shake off the dirt of your humiliation, stand on your own legs, and go about your work again. Hope not for this. These men have not toiled seven years against you; set the whole South, from the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico, in a blaze of animosity against your system; arrayed one State in all the preparations of battle; called every other State to join their league, and to send their Spartan warriors to the field, with each his due number of Helots; they have not done all this to win the victory of this day, to secure their triumph, and your defeat and vassalage, that they might, when they had thus reduced you to ruin, raise you up again, and replace you in your former prosperity. If you now disregard your own great interests, the preservation of your labor, your fields, your factories, your workshops, your homes, your firesides, your wives, and your children; if you surrender all these, and, without a blow given, or a blow received, throw down your arms, prostrate yourselves at the foot of the foe, and give up all to his mercy, remember, if the brave love the brave, he will despise the coward; that foe will spurn you with contempt when you fall in the dust before him, and, looking on you as less worthy of the rights of freemen than the slaves which brush his boots or drive his horses, he will forever hold you down to the prostrate condition where you have, by your own submission, placed yourselves.

Do not, my beloved countrymen, hope from your adversary, if you make this submission; do not, I implore of you, hope from him what his contempt for you, his regard for his own interest, and his unconquerable attachment to his own honor, must forever compel him to refuse.

If you surrender to-day, you will never be brought back from your inglorious captivity until redeemed by those whom, if you submit, you now desert; those who, in this hour of peril for the prosperity and glory of our country, dare to stand up in this hall, and before this nation, in defence of the rights of those men of industry and perseverance, the great working community of our nation, the whole free family of toil and diligence, in every State in this Union: ay, sir, men whose labors, in peace, have earned for us that prosperity, and whose bravery, in war, both by flood and field, has achieved and secured that glory.

Sir, indulge to me a few words concerning the cause which has brought this measure into this House, and which, with a kind of convulsive hurry, is now rushing on with it through all the forms of legislation. I will then be silent, and, as Socrates did, drink the hemlock; first of all imploring God to turn away from our country the evils and miseries prepared for it by this measure. If, for this act of outrage against our own prosperity, this trampling under foot the munificence of Heaven, the current of divine vengeance must be turned upon us, may its consuming stream not reach those who have been deluded and deceived, or who may be ruined by the enactment of this day; but if it reach any, may this retribution not pass over, and go beyond those who have brought this delusion, this ruinous deception upon our country.

Sir, within our walls there is no practised or meditated artifice, no stratagem of legislation, intended to deceive. We sit here, I trust, and am persuaded, in our deliberative halls, surrounded with an atmosphere of purity, and breathing the very air of patriotism. Beyond their precincts, in our lobbies, and elsewhere, it may not be so. It cannot be concealed that a great mart is frequently open in the neighborhood, a political bazaar, where not only pigeons are bought and sold, but where high offices, distinguished honors, and heavy emoluments may come upon the counter. May that purifying spirit, with the same hallowed hand which once overthrew their tables, and scourged out of the sanctuary of religion those who had rendered that consecrated place a den of base traffic, may His spirit forever expel and exclude from these halls of legislation, which have come from our predecessors, to our occupation, pure and uncontaminated; yes, sir, exclude those political dealers in men and measures, who trade in great public interests and great public officers, with the same facility, that more humble, perhaps more honest men deal in corn and cattle, lands and merchandise.

Sir, had this measure been thrust into this House by those proud and angry adversaries from the South, those men with whom we have so long been engaged in flagrant, and, as I trust, honest warfare; had they attempted to overthrow us by their overwhelming power, we should have known how to meet them; and our victory would have been honorable, could we have achieved it; nor had our fall been inglorious, if defeated. Here, in this controversy, if we succeed, we succeed against our friends; if we fall, we perish under weapons drawn against us by our own political associates; men united with us in many a hardly contested and perilous controversy—men, whose names, whose deeds have, by frequent use, become our household words; “nor less endeared and precious to our feelings than our own household gods.”

When, hereafter, this measure, by its consuming enactment, shall settle down on all the free States of our country, and, tithe after tithe, take away the protection of our labor, and the prosperity of our people; and, like the lean and hungry vision of the Egyptian monarch, swallowing up, year after year, the surplus of our former plenty; and still growing more and more gaunt and hungry; then when I meet, as I must meet, with the sons and daughters of toil; when they, men, women, and children, gather around me, and, pale with overwork and scanty food, grasp my hand, and in the agony of their distress implore of me, who have sometimes been to them the messenger of good tidings, to tell them how they, or their fathers, have offended Heaven; or what, or who has brought upon them and their labors this wasting ruin, this “pinning atrophy,” this living death, this dying life; shall I be silent, and let the rocks rebuke my apathy; or shall I cover over truth, and hide the name and the face of hideous deeds, by glosing words, or fabricated tales; and earn, by this, the deep damnation merited by him who preters in his speech, and cheats the ear of anxious and imploring wretchedness!

Sir, I shall, I must, I cannot but say to them, you suffer not for your own or your father's delinquency. You have been put in the market, like the involuntary labor of those regions where men are bought and sold. You suffer this under a great political arrangement; not from the irresistible power of men always adverse to the prosperity of your former condition; but from one in whom you had placed your hope of continual, unyielding assistance and defence; in whose hands and safe keeping you had deposited your “most ancient and domestic” rights and interests; your treasurer, with whom you had garnered up whatever of all things earthly you would make most safe, and where, as you believed, good faith would live on earth until she left the world. A man whose friends were our friends; whose adversaries were our foes; for whom we have toiled, and labored, and travailed; our star in the west; our sun in the storm; our bow of promise in the tempests of our times. He has been the hero of our tales; his deeds the argument of our discourse; his glory the song of our festivals. Whose, whose name was ever so frequent in our flowing cups! Who, like him, ever sat with us at the great political table! We have together taken salt from the same stand, bread from the same basket; he has, with us, dipped the political sop in the same dish; and now he has lifted up his heel against us, and we are delivered into the hands of our adversaries. These adversaries will never relent. Our lovely land must become a desolation. The labor and wealth of the East must migrate to purchase and people the West. This is our only hope: There may be a country for us on the waters of the great river. Those men, once our friends, who have left us to the ruthless power of our and their adversaries, may then meet us with the hand of kindness; and the father of the elder American system, having parted with that to the States of the South, may thus have provided for the birth of a younger son, which those States may never be able to obtain.

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, said that nothing but necessity could induce him ever to differ from his honorable friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURRIS,] young and inexperienced as he was, in comparison to that venerable and high-minded gentleman. But he could not sit and hear what he must denominate calumnious charges, brought against an illustrious and honorable individual, to whose course the gentleman had thought fit to allude. Mr. J. should regret to the latest day of his life doing anything to mar the harmony which seemed so happily about to prevail in that hall. But, believing that the individual referred to would be more immortalized by the very act which the gentleman had vilified, than by any other public act of his bright and useful career, he was unable to remain in silence. Out of a regard to peace, and from a respect to his venerable friend, he would forbear to utter all that he felt at that moment. Suffice it to say, that as a personal, warm, and devoted friend of the individual assailed, he would not hear him charged with infamy without rising in his place to repel the cruel and unmerited slander.

Mr. FOSTER said he did not belong to "the trading community" of which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURRIS] had spoken. He had broken no bargains; he had made none; and he had therefore nothing to say in reply to the two gentlemen who had preceded him.

But Mr. F. rose to make an explanation, lest there should appear some inconsistency in the vote he was about to give. He had, last night, moved to strike from the bill a clause which he then considered unconstitutional; but his motion was lost. Had he remained of the same opinion, that clause would compel him now to vote against the whole bill; but, on further examination, he was satisfied he was mistaken. He had supposed that the valuation of goods, on which the assessment of duties was to be made after 1842, was to be regulated by the existing laws: and under our present system of appraisements, there would inevitably be different rates of duties, not only in the ports of different States, but in the different ports of the same State; thus destroying that uniformity required by the constitution. But on a more attentive perusal, Mr. F. found that the bill provided merely for the assessment of the duties on the home value, as it is called, leaving the regulations under which that assessment shall be made, to be hereafter prescribed by law. This, then, removed the constitutional objection. He, however, was convinced, that whenever this system of home valuation was attempted, it would be found impracticable.

Mr. F. said he had other objections which he would take the occasion to suggest. He considered the reduction too slow, and the period for arriving at the revenue point too distant. He feared, also, that in the intervening time, by reason of the reduction being so gradual, there would be a large accumulation of surplus revenue in the treasury, the scramble for which was easily foreseen; and the corrupting tendency of which must be obvious to all.

Mr. F. also protested against the pledge which seemed to be contained in that part of the bill which provides that "the duties, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected" until June, 1842. We had no power to bind our successors, and Mr. F. would not bind his constituents, or even himself, by any such engagement as that which is alleged to be thus implied. He had great difficulty in bringing his mind to the conclusion to vote for the bill, and he voted for it solely upon the ground of an adjustment of the agitating and distracting question which had brought this Union to the verge of dissolution. As a compromise, he considered it far short of what the South was entitled to; but he was prepared to concede much; to make a willing sacrifice to preserve the union of these States, and to restore peace and harmony to the country. He had therefore expressed the opinion that this object could only be effected by a spirit of mutual conciliation and concession, and it was by this spirit that he was now actuated. In pursuing this course, he had no doubt he represented truly the feelings and opinions of his high-minded and patriotic constituents; but he had no authority to pledge them to any future course of measures, nor would he do it. This bill he regarded as an experiment; and if, in its operation, it should be found to be defective, it will be subject, like all other laws, to repeal or modification.

Mr. DENNY said that he owed thanks to the gentleman from Georgia for the frank and candid expression of the sentiments which he had now given to the House. It now appeared that this bill was considered by the South as a mere experiment, which might or might not prove satisfactory on trial. And was that House to experiment on the livelihood of millions of men? Were they to be driven into the adoption of such a course by a faction existing in a single State? A gentleman from Kentucky, whom it would not be parliamentary to name, had, out of benevolent feeling, proposed the present bill as a compromise of the existing duties between the North and the South. But did gentlemen from the South say that they would accept the bill as a compromise? Not at all. The House had just heard one of those gentlemen declare that he considered the proposition as a mere experiment. Had it been demonstrated to the House that the South would accept the bill, and would rest satisfied with it? It had not. Let the House pass this bill, and next year the Southern interest would come up and drive the House from its position. Once give them the power, and every thing like compromise would depart forever. The State which Mr. D. represented was to be the chief sufferer in this arrangement: it was sentenced to die. But was it certain that they should perish by so slow a death as this bill had provided for them? Was the Kentucky gentleman able to restrain and hold down the fiery spirits of the South? When they came to press the advocates of American industry to the wall, would it be in the power of that gentleman to hold back their fury, and rescue the manufacturing interest from their remorseless blow? He believed not. The bill did nothing more than to hold out to foreigners all that protection and encouragement which ought to be reserved for our own citizens. If the object was to compromise with foreigners, the British themselves could propose no better terms to advance and secure their own prosperity. They would willingly take this bill, because they would see in it the slow, but certain death of the manufactures of our country. Its provisions would give vitality and strength to their own industry; it would diminish the members in their pauper houses; it would make paupers in this country, by feeding the paupers of Great Britain. The friends of the protective system had little expected such a blow from the quarter from whence it came. From the hand of their avowed opponents they might have been prepared to meet it. If it came from them, however it might prostrate the best interests of the country, it might be better borne; but it came with added force from the hand of one who had been himself the strongest advocate of the system. The American people had not looked for any thing like this. They knew that a bill to reduce the tariff had just passed, and they were willing to wait another year to see what the effect of that bill would be; but this was not permitted them. They must here take their leave of the protecting policy. Its knell sounded in this bill, and he had only to regret that the task had not fallen to abler hands of pronouncing its funeral oration. The system of internal improvement was also to be murdered; and where the devastation was to stop, who could tell? But one consolation still remained. The country had its own relief in its own hands. Free-men were not bound, like slaves, to work upon a plantation all their lives, while their masters disposed of them according to their pleasure.

The Tariff.

Mr. D. said he should have liked a greater opportunity of expressing his views of this measure; but no time was allowed. The session was expiring, and the bill must be passed. The manufacturers must be sacrificed without even knowing for whose benefit it was to be done. One gentleman said that he took the bill as offering the best terms he could get at present; but that he did not hold himself bound, by so doing, not to endeavor to get terms still better hereafter. There was one provision in this bill which ought to alarm every man that was interested in the American system. It proposed eventually to equalize all duties, reducing them to twenty per cent. ad valorem. Here was deception on the very face of the bill. All ad valorem duties were necessarily deceptive. A specific duty was known; every body knew, at once, what they had to pay; but ad valorem duties varied continually. The bill laid a twenty per cent. duty on articles of all sorts. All sorts of mechanical work were to be brought down to twenty per cent., while some of them were produced by machinery, and others not. The same machinery worked as well here as it did in Europe, and our mechanics worked at as cheap a rate; but to meet the European, they must work on half wages, because the foreign operative obtained half his living from the parish.

Where was the discrimination under such a bill? The owner of a cotton mill, with his power looms, was to have a protection of twenty per cent. while the poor weaver who sat, from day to day, toiling at a hand loom, obtained no more. In England, such a man obtained the residue of his living out of the parish. Was this pauper system of England to be combined with the slave system of South Carolina, against the free labor of the United States? Must American industry be thus nullified? Must the manufacturers submit, and see all their workshops closed within ten years? Could it be expected that, with such a prospect before them, those who now contemplated investing their capital would continue such a purpose? It could not. The moment the passage of this bill was announced, the whole manufacturing enterprise of the country would at once be paralyzed. The emulation would be, who should wind up their affairs the soonest. As one factory went down after another, the monopoly would increase, from year to year, until, at length, a few overgrown establishments would be left standing in solitary opulence, melancholy monuments in the wide-spread ruin.

Mr. DANIEL said that he rose to perform a sacred duty to a friend who had been wantonly and maliciously slandered on the floor of that House. Whatever the past course of that individual might deserve, in the way of chastisement, he had most richly received from the gentleman with whom he had associated himself. He had, however, the least reason of all to expect that among his bitterest assailants should be those for whom he had sacrificed himself. Had it not been for the proud patriotism from which he had been led to choose a course that threw him into political association with the gentleman from Rhode Island and his friends, he would, at this day, have presided over the nation. When he had joined these new friends, Mr. D. had thought he did wrong, especially in disobeying the expressed will of his own State; but time had proved the truth of all he had predicted, and the vote he gave had been justified by the people of the United States. Those who condemned him at the time, had since been the loudest in his praise. As for himself, he owned that he had seen his error, and so had many more. The present was not the first time that individual had saved the nation from destruction. And what was his crime now? He had saved the nation from the horrors of blood and slaughter—from all the ruthless cruelties of civil war. This was his offence. He was charged with a coalition. It was not the first that had been laid to the charge of that distinguished man. And whence had all his sufferings proceeded? From a coalition with that gentleman and his political associates. But did the gentleman expect that, because he had acted with them for a time, he must go with him to destroy the principles of this Government? He would find himself mistaken. It was possible for the wisest and the most faithful sometimes to wander from the correct track, but, the first moment an opportunity presented itself, he would return. Mr. D. would ever be for treating with the greatest kindness and indulgence a man who had been an original democrat. It had been twice proved that he acted properly in the vote he had given. The South had seen and owned it. And what were they now told? That the whole slave labor of the southern section of the Union was to be united against the free white labor of the Northern States. Did the gentleman suppose that there were no poor white laboring people in the Southern States? There were as many as at the North, at least in that part of the country where Mr. D. lived. How many were there in poor little Rhode Island, a State that a man might put into his breeches pocket? The House had been told that cattle were fed with fish in Rhode Island. And what then did the people consume? Would one man eat as much as two or three cows? He presumed not. The gentleman had been telling the House what Rhode Island paid for five, six, or seven years past, for the support of Government. The gentleman had not the custom-house book to show. This showed the sophism the gentleman wished to play off on the people of the United States. Why, what did the gentleman desire? Did he want the slaves of South Carolina to be sold, that he might put the money into his pocket, or their masters and overseers only?

The gentleman said that this bill was virtually an abandonment of the protective system. The bill allowed the manufacturers a little lifetime to come down to the point to which all agreed that they must at last come, viz. to a revenue duty. How was it an abandonment of protection? He should think that any man, in seven years, with a protection of sixty per cent., might make his fortune. What farmer made half as much? What farmer made twenty per cent. upon his capital? No, he did not make ten per cent., nor five either. But this bill was willing the manufacturers should enjoy their fifty or sixty per cent. until it was gradually reduced to a permanent tax upon the people of the United States of twenty per cent. for the support and encouragement of manufactures. It really seemed to Mr. D. that no man ought to raise his voice against it. It was a free gift—a mere gratuity. What had the great West to do with manufactures? What benefit was it to Kentucky that the manufacturers of Rhode Island should get a bounty on their industry?

H. or R.]

The Twif.

[Feb. 26, 1833.]

They paid a million and a half into the treasury, and got about six or seven hundred thousand dollars out of it, by which they gained an annual loss of about seven hundred thousand dollars. Still they supported the tariff. They supported it because they supposed it was for the benefit of the country. They were not willing, however, to press the system to the separation of the Union. Rather than such should be the result, they were ready to abandon it altogether. He did not believe that one-fifth of the people of the nation would give up the Union to save the tariff. The individual who had recommended this compromise had acted on other principles. He chose rather to retire than to remain in public life at any such cost. He did not seek any office. Mr. D. trusted the people of this country would ever continue to remember him as having proved their political saviour at the two greatest crises the nation has yet known. Who had it been that had saved the country when the Missouri question threatened to rend the Union; and who had now saved it from war and bloodshed? The same individual had effected both these deliverances. And who, he would add, had carried the land bill through the other House? Who but the man so wantonly abused by the gentleman from Rhode Island? Mr. D. concluded by demanding the previous question.

He withdrew the motion, however, at the request of

Mr. BURGESS, who apologized for detaining the House for any reply, and said, the gentleman from Kentucky has reproached me for what I have said in allusion to a distinguished gentleman of his State. Let me say, concerning that reproach, that ancient wisdom has told us, "The rebuke of a man of one character is better than the song of a character very different;" and I will leave it to the nation to determine whether the character of the distinguished individual of the West may not brighten on the page of history under my rebuke, when the eulogy of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] would render that character infamous. I will not reply to what he has said of Rhode Island: it is all neither more nor less than the bray, without the inspiration of a philosopher of the same family which once reproved a prophet of antiquity.

Mr. STEWART said that he was opposed to all further legislation, at this time, on the subject of the tariff. This Congress had already acted upon the subject. We have passed one law, and are functus officio. If the act of the last session, passed with so much unanimity as a final adjustment of this vexed question, is again to be disturbed, let it be by other hands—let us not be driven by a handful of nullifiers into a repeal of our own legislation before it has gone into effect, and before any one can foresee whether its operation is to be beneficial or injurious. If we degrade ourselves by such an act of inconsistency, the world can assign but one reason for our course, and that will be, that a majority of two to one have been compelled to surrender their own deliberate judgment to the threats of a few nullifiers, thereby recognising and establishing nullification, not only as a peaceable, but as an efficient and constitutional remedy, proclaiming to the world that the United States is not a Government, but a thing to be governed by the passions, whims, and caprices of each and every State in this Union. What, sir, is our present position? Last session we passed a tariff, as a final compromise and settlement of the question. South Carolina was dissatisfied, and she has nullified it; she says her will, and not that of the Union, shall govern. The President says the law shall be executed, and South Carolina shall submit—we join the nullifiers, repeal the law, and South Carolina triumphs; Rhode Island, or some other State voting against the repealing act, next nullifies, puts herself on her sovereignty, demands the repeal of this law; and, upon the authority of the precedent now established, you must again repeal this act, and so on, as long as any State in the Union is dissatisfied. The constitution and Government would be by such doctrines subverted and overturned; it could not be preserved, and would not be worth it if it could. Our Union would be a rope of sand, a cobweb to be broken by every breeze. Until South Carolina, therefore, repealed her ordinance, and laid down her weapons of rebellion, he, for one, was opposed to all legislation on this subject. But this objection out of the way, and no sufficient or even plausible reason had been assigned for "posting with such dexterity" to the repeal of our own deliberate act. What were the reasons assigned? Sum them all up, and they were embraced under three heads: 1. To reduce the revenue; 2. To reduce taxation; and, 3. To appease the nullifiers. That the act of the last session would produce too much revenue, was an assumption, he said, unsupported by evidence. The act has not yet gone into operation. No one could say what was to be its effect upon the revenue. He believed that, instead of a surplus, there would be a deficiency of revenue. There is no surplus now, we all know. That there would be a surplus hereafter, no one could foretell.

This argument, therefore, rested upon the assumption of a fact that had no existence now, and which, in his opinion, would have no existence hereafter—a fact not proved, and incapable of proof. The second argument rested entirely upon the validity of the first. If the first failed, as he thought it must, the second, resting upon it, failed of course. For if there was no surplus revenue, no one would contend for a reduction of duties. If the revenue was necessary, of course the duties were also necessary. This argument, therefore, went for nothing. As to the third and last, (the satisfaction of the nullifiers,) he had given his reasons for opposing any change of the law on this ground; but if it was proper to yield to the demands of the nullifiers, this law will not answer the purpose. The nullifying ordinance expressly declares that they will be satisfied with nothing short of a total abandonment of the protective principle; and we are told on all hands that nothing of this kind is contemplated by the bill. Thus you fail to satisfy the nullifiers; you destroy your manufactures; lay waste a large portion of your country; paralyze and prostrate your industry in the fields and in the workshops, render unhappy and discontented, if not hostile to your legislation, more than one-half of your people now contented and prosperous, and you satisfy nobody. A measure of such universal operation, affecting the labor of the whole nation, and visiting the fire-side of every man, even in the remotest hamlet of our country; such a measure, supported by such reasons, he thought, could never meet the approbation of the American people. Even the enemies of protection in the South friendly to the Union were decidedly opposed to any reduction of the tariff under existing circumstances. Their opinions to this effect were published to the world. The editor of the "Charleston Patriot," a leading Union paper in South Carolina, says:

"The Mercury charges the Union presses in this city with insincerity, because they do not advocate an immediate repeal of the tariff, with the ordinance hanging as an instrument of violence and menace over the deliberations of the National Legislature. We should be sorry to lend ourselves to any such purpose of coercion, in this land of liberty. Our Legislature must deliberate and decide without means and instruments of intimidation. The example would be fatal—the precedent destructive of all good government, if Congress should legislate with an edict of nullification suspended over their heads. We care not how soon after the removal of this act Congress engage in the reduction of the tariff. But we are not such 'incendiaries' as to wish the constituted authorities to act under an impulse of fear from factious measures, which are not the less factious from being organized."

The British alone would be benefited by the passage

FEB. 26, 1833.]

The Tariff.

[H. OF R.]

of this bill. They could not now repress their exultation at the prospect of being enabled to crush our rising manufactures, from which they had so much to apprehend. Their presses were breaking forth in raptures on the subject, of which the following was a specimen, from the York (Upper Canada) Reporter, of January 25:

"Triumph of South Carolina, and submission of the manufacturing States.—We copy an article from the Commercial Advertiser of the 12th instant, from which it is apparent how matters are to be settled. The tariff is to be reduced to meet the views of the South Carolinians, and thus is the whole of the United States to be thrown open to European manufactures, upon equitable terms. Much rejoicing will be in England upon this account, as well there may. We shall forever fix a high value upon the Southern character; it has been displayed in a light to command respect and admiration; and their struggle for justice has been crowned with the success such manly efforts seldom fail to achieve."

But even if legislation on the subject of the tariff was at this time necessary, which, however, he utterly denied, the plan proposed, of a gradual reduction of duties, was the very worst, and especially this blind and indiscriminate reduction upon all articles alike, protected and unprotected, without inquiring whether they would or would not bear further reduction, whether it would or would not destroy our manufactures, whether it would or would not increase revenue by increasing imports. He was opposed to thus applying the bed of Procrustes to the tariff, stretching out or lopping off every thing by the same measure, right or wrong. The effect of this indiscriminate, hasty, panic-struck legislation, was to ruin the country, to lay its industry prostrate at the footstool of British power. Under such a system, every thing would be sacrificed in the end. Rather let the blow be boldly struck at once; let the people see and know whence it comes, and who gives it. He preferred this to a secret, silent, insidious, and gradual system of destruction, undermining and sapping the foundations of the national prosperity, producing desolation, decay, and death, by slow poison, administered in "broken doses." Offer this dose of destruction naked and undisguised—tell the people what it is—force them to take it if you can—and they will throw it back upon you. Repeal the tariff, and you will find a recuperative energy in the people, which will rise up, and cast off your unjust and injurious legislation. You can never destroy protection by direct means, but it may be undermined and destroyed by some such secret plan of operation as this. Repeal the tariff, and the remedy is at hand; it would be found in the ballot boxes at the very first election. The sovereign people will take care of themselves, they will look to the yeas and nays, and distinguish between their true friends and the "dough faces," and soon again be erect in their true American position.

When this scheme of reduction runs down to its lowest point, there will not remain in the whole tariff a single protecting duty. Every thing will be reduced to a common revenue standard. All now see and admit that our manufactures are maintaining a doubtful struggle with foreigners for the American markets, aided by protecting duties of forty, fifty, and sixty per cent.; this being the case, who will pretend that they can stand when these duties are reduced to fifteen and twenty per cent.? Protection will be gone, completely gone; not a vestige will be left; and so far as manufactures are concerned, when you sink below the point of protection, it is immaterial to them whether you stop at twenty or at five per cent.; it becomes a mere question of revenue—protection has nothing to do with it. The proposition contained in this bill is simply this: you say to the manufacturer you must die—this is settled—be, as a matter of favor, we will allow you to live five days, provided you will consent to have your left leg cut off the first day, your right leg the second, your left arm the third, your right arm the fourth, and your head the fifth; or, if you prefer, we will begin with the head. Would he hesitate? No. He would say, begin with the head. But this system could not die; it would survive, and, like the Phoenix from its ashes, it would rise stronger and brighter from the blow, and go forth with healing in its wings—with new energy and power, spreading gladness and prosperity far and wide over the land; but if destroyed by this secret, silent, gradual process, it might never recover. The destruction would be the more certain, fatal, and ruinous, from having been protracted and concealed.

Mr. S. said he would not trespass long on the time of the House, but begged its indulgence to say a few words as to the practical operation of this measure upon the revenue, the capital, the currency, and the labor of the country. We have had calculations upon calculations, from the treasury, from the committee, and from gentlemen on all sides, predicated upon the strange and false assumption that an indiscriminate reduction of duties upon all articles, protected and unprotected, whether produced at home or abroad, was to be followed, as a matter of course, by a corresponding reduction of revenue. Was not the mere statement of the proposition sufficient to show its fallacy? Who was so blind as not to see at a single glance, that to reduce the duties on articles now supplied entirely at home, so as to check the home production, and let in the supply from abroad, would, instead of diminishing, greatly increase the revenue? The duties on many articles are now so high as to wholly exclude their importation from abroad, and no revenue whatever is received. Reduce the duties one-half, and import half your supply from abroad, and will you not, by this reduction of duties, add millions to your revenue? Who would deny it? And yet it is assumed as an axiom, that reduction of duties will of course be followed by a corresponding reduction of revenue! To illustrate the argument—Suppose the duties on shoes, hats, cotton, and wool, and woollen and cotton goods, now average fifty per cent. (about the fact,) and that, with the existing protection, we now manufacture and produce for home consumption one hundred and twenty millions of dollars worth of these articles, which was short of the amount: suppose you reduce these duties, as is now proposed, from fifty to twenty-five per cent., and thereby destroy one-half of this home production, and import it from abroad, what is the consequence? This addition of sixty millions to your imports, under this reduced duty of twenty-five per cent., will add exactly fifteen millions of dollars annually to the amount of revenue; yet we are told by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee of Ways and Means, that inasmuch as the duties now derived from the importation of the abovementioned articles amount to twelve millions of dollars a year, under a duty of fifty per cent., by reducing the duties to twenty-five per cent., the revenue will be reduced to six millions: assuming to be true what every body knows to be false, that we would import no more wool and woollens, cotton goods, hats, shoes, &c. under a duty of twenty-five, than we now do under a duty of fifty per cent. It was passing strange that intelligent men could deceive themselves or expect to deceive others by such fallacious statements; he would not follow further this fundamental fallacy upon which this measure rested entirely for its support, for it was emphatically a measure to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government. But in its practical results the opposite would be its effect; instead of diminishing, it would increase the revenue on protected, though it would diminish it on unprotected articles. We now import from Liverpool more than a million bushels of coal, paying six cents duty; reduce the duty one-half, and the import will exceed five millions next year; thus, by reducing

The Thrift.

the duty one-half, you more than double the revenue on coal, and such would be the effect in all similar cases. Hence he had always contended, and still maintained, that the reverse of the course proposed was the true plan of reducing the revenue, and advancing the independence and prosperity of the country. That, instead of gradually reducing duties, and thereby increasing imports, and, consequently, revenue, the true system was to gradually increase duties at the rate of one or two per cent. per annum, on articles which we can and ought to manufacture, until we supply ourselves, when the revenue on these articles would entirely cease: for instance, in 1831, the revenue on woollen and cotton goods alone exceeded ten millions; by gradually increasing the duties, you would stimulate capital to go to work, and you would soon not only save the twenty-eight millions of dollars sent abroad to purchase these articles, but cut off the ten millions of revenue derived from these imports. Whereas, by reducing the duties as now proposed, you will not only destroy your own manufactures, but be obliged to send abroad fifty-six millions of dollars a year, instead of twenty-eight, to pay for cotton and woollen goods, and also increase the revenue, on this article alone, more than five millions of dollars per annum.

He would now say a word or two as to the effect of this system upon capital. As to capital already invested, its effect would be immediate destruction to all small and young establishments; the large and wealthy capitalists might, by pressing down the wages of labor, and the price of agricultural produce, manage to live till they could turn their capital to something else; but as to the capital afloat, what dollar, under this system of gradual, but certain destruction, would ever go into manufactures? Not a dollar. The further progress of capital in this direction would come at once to a full stop. Under this bill, or any other based upon similar principles, manufacturing would soon be at an end. Seeing nothing but final destruction before them, those who were out would keep out of the business, and those who were in would get out as fast as they could, and no one would be willing to take their place.

It is a received theory that high protecting duties operate for the benefit of moneyed capitalists, and to the prejudice of the laboring and agricultural portions of the community. Such is the theory, but the practical operation of the system is exactly the reverse. The great effect of the tariff is to benefit the poor man—it is emphatically the poor man's law; it is a law to benefit labor, whether employed in the fields or in the workshops. The wages of labor and the price of agricultural produce, which together constituted the foundation of the national prosperity, would prosper or decline precisely as the protection afforded to the national industry was increased or diminished. This was as susceptible of demonstration as any problem in Euclid. There is a perpetual contest existing between the labor of our own and foreign countries; and those who can work cheapest will have the market, unless we interpose to give our own labor the preference, by imposing discriminating duties and taxes upon foreign productions, which taxes the foreigner must pay for the privilege of selling in our markets. This must be the case so long as competition is between the foreign and American producers; but when the foreigner is conquered and driven out, then a new contest springs up between the American manufacturers, and from that moment this new struggle will reduce the price by increasing capital, skill, economy, and machinery, to a point greatly below what it had ever been before.

Such was, and always would be, the practical operation of protection upon the industry of the country; the effect was to increase our national independence and national wealth; to give the preference to our own over foreign labor, and that preference would always be in exact proportion to the amount of the protection afforded. Suppose you reduce the duties as proposed, who would it first affect? Not the rich, not the capitalists, but the poor, the laborers of the country. The effect would be to grind down the wages of laborers employed in your factories, your fields, and your workshops. This would be the practical operation of the measure, and no man of common sense or common observation could doubt it. The capitalist would go to his factory and turn his key; to his operatives he would say, "I cannot work at a loss, I must turn my capital to something else, or vest it in stocks; you know that it is with the utmost difficulty I can maintain the competition under the present duties of 50 per cent. Congress have now reduced my protection one-half, you must therefore make a corresponding reduction in your wages, or go idle." To the farmer he would say, "you must make a like reduction on your wool and breadstuffs;" to the mechanic, "you must fall in the same proportion;" to one, "you must be without employment," and to the other, "you must be without a market for your produce." What is the alternative? To submit or starve, take half or nothing. The laborer must take 25 instead of 50 cents a day. The farmer must take 15 instead of 30 cents for his wool, 50 cents instead of a dollar for his wheat, or it must rot on his hands. Thus the evils of your legislation will fall upon the poor and dependent, and upon the farmers of the country; wealthy capitalists could take care of themselves; and it was for gentlemen representing farmers and mechanics to say whether they were prepared to strike such a blow, to gratify British cupidity and Southern rebellion.

We are told that the protective system is a system of monopoly, calculated to make "the rich richer, and the poor poorer." If the proposition were reversed, it would be much nearer the truth. The destruction of this system would not only reduce the laborer of this country to a level with the paupers of England, and the serfs and slaves of Russia and the Indies, but the money of our country being exported to pay for foreign imports, the laborer having lost his accustomed employment, and compelled to work for sixpence a day, what would become of the poor man, and of every man in debt? Their property would be sacrificed for little or nothing, and bought up, by whom? By the rich, who alone could purchase. This was no fancy sketch; for the reality of it, it was only necessary to refer to the heart-rending scenes of ruin and distress that followed the reduction of the tariff in 1816.

Upon this subject, Mr. S. said, there was another theory, adopted too generally by the friends as well as enemies of the tariff; a theory quite as false as the one to which he had just adverted. He meant the theory which asserted that duties were taxes imposed upon and paid by the consumers. This he denied. Wherever, he said, the duty had produced an increase of price, this was true; but in no other case. With regard to articles not produced or manufactured in the country, this theory might be generally correct; though he believed experience had not proved that a reduction of duty even upon non-protected articles had always been followed by a corresponding reduction of price. But where duties had been increased on articles extensively manufactured at home, and where the price was regulated and established by home competition, an increase of price had never followed an increase of duty. He made the general assertion, and he made it without fear of contradiction; not a single instance could be cited to the contrary. On the other hand, the prices had been generally reduced by the increase of capital and skill, and the increased quantity of the articles made and thrown into the market. Duties, in the first instance, all know, are levied on foreign goods, and are paid by the importer. If the price of these goods is not increased in consequence of the increase of the duty, then it is clear the consumer pays nothing, and the duty falls entirely on the foreign manufacturer, who deducts it from his profits, and pays it into our treasury for the privilege of selling it in our market. This is universally the case where American competition has established an American price, which price regulates the market for all. To illustrate this operation, he would present a statement which had just been furnished by a gentleman then in the hall, who was an old and extensive importer of British iron, residing in this District. From his correspondence with his agent in Liverpool, it appears that, shortly after the addition of seven dollars per ton on bar iron, in 1828, he wrote that he was obliged to pay this duty, and could not get a cent more for his iron; that, consequently, the price must be reduced, or he must cease to purchase. In a short time the price of iron was reduced in Liverpool to the full amount of the increase of duty, and so it continued till the 22d of December last, when his agent wrote to him that, in consequence of the reduction of the duties on iron by the act of July last, the price of iron had risen five dollars per ton, and would soon be up to the full amount of the reduction of the duty, and thus the price of the iron here would remain the same as before the duty was taken off. Who, then, paid the seven dollars added to the duty on iron in 1828? The consumers? No! The British manufacturer paid it, and took it from his profits. And who is benefited by the reduction of seven dollars in 1832? The consumer? No! The British manufacturer, who puts it in his pocket instead of your treasury. The consumer still pays the same price; the market price established by the American manufacturers. And what was true as to iron, was true as to woollen and cotton goods, and every thing else extensively manufactured here. A reduction of duties on these articles was not followed by a reduction of price. It was, in fact, a reduction of duties levied upon and paid by foreigners for the privilege of selling their productions in our markets. This was, he contended, the plain and practical operation of the tariff, be the theory what it might.

But, Mr. S. said, after all, he believed one of the greatest sources of mischief and injury to the industry of the nation arose from the fickle, changing, and unsteady course of legislation on the subject of the tariff. No man knew when he was safe. One day we grant protection, and the next day we take it away. But a few months ago we passed a law which was understood to be a final compromise and settlement of the question. With this expectation millions of capital had been invested, extensive establishments had been bought and sold; and now the faith of your laws is to be violated, these men are to be ruined, every thing again involved in doubt and uncertainty, to gratify a few Southern malcontents. By what system of morality were gentlemen governed? Upon what principle of common justice could such a course be defended? You have no right to alter a law under the faith of which rights have been vested, because it is in the nature of a contract which is inviolable. Suppose the reasons of the acts of 1824 and 1828 had been set forth thus in the preamble: "Whereas large amounts of capital have been invested in manufactures; and whereas the prosperity and independence of these United States would be advanced by still further investments: Therefore, be it enacted, that the following duties be, and the same are hereby, imposed," &c. Would not such a preamble truly state the reasons which influenced those who advocated and voted for these laws? No one could doubt it who would read the contemporaneous debates. How, then, after millions upon millions of private capital had been vested upon the faith of these laws, could gentlemen who had voted for them now vote for their repeal, and thus sacrifice and destroy those whom they had thus betrayed? As far as good conscience and sound morality were concerned, would they not be quite as justifiable in voting to alter or repeal a charter under which individuals had been induced to vest their private fortunes? In strict law there might be a distinction, but in morality and justice there was none.

Mr. S. said he would not trespass longer on the time and attention of the House, but he did hope that gentlemen would not be so soon driven from the act of the last session by a few disappointed and ambitious men in the South—men who seemed determined to rule or ruin the country. To yield to their dictation would not only be disgraceful, but ruinous in the extreme. These people of the South have already been spoiled by indulgence; they cannot bear to see any prosper but themselves. What has been their course, and what has brought about the present alarming and unhappy state of things? Let us go back a few years and inquire. Let us see how Southern jealousy has operated, and how it has been indulged. Having, by non-intercourse, embargoes, and war, broken up the navigation of the North, and compelled them to turn their capital and industry to manufactures, they next determine to break down manufactures; and, to accomplish this, what is the plan? First, to hasten the payment of the public debt, and then to repeal the duties, as no longer necessary. And how is the payment of the debt to be hastened? First, internal improvements must be arrested to swell the annual surplus applicable to the payment of the debt. They are indulged in this, and internal improvements have been arrested. Next, the act limiting the sinking fund to ten millions a year must be repealed, and this was also done. Next, the United States Bank, being suspected of affording capital and other facilities to the manufacturing States, must be put down also. They were again indulged last session. The tariff was attacked, and reduced six or eight millions; but, like spoiled children, they grow worse from indulgence. They now demand that the protective principle shall be utterly abandoned, and the whole people of the Northern and Middle States sacrificed at once, or they will dissolve the Union! Grant this, and next we must elect a President south of the Potomac, or we shall have another nullifying ordinance—more threats of civil war and bloodshed; and where was this system of concession to end? It would end only when all political power was surrendered to the South, and the free people of the Northern and Middle States reduced to a condition more miserable and degraded than that of the Southern slave. It was time to stop and tell these gentlemen plainly that we will go no further, and to play out their game of nullification and civil war if they dare—civil war! Where is it to be? and who is to suffer by it? It will be confined to South Carolina. It will be a war between her own people, the union men and nullifiers, and the former would be able to put down the latter with little or no aid from the Federal Government. But why should we of the Northern and Middle States sacrifice our people by repealing the tariff to prevent these madmen of South Carolina from cutting each other's throats? But there was no danger; they were not rash and crazy enough to do so. There can be no war in the North; it would be entirely a Southern affair. They would have all the glory and all the sufferings of this war among themselves. All would commiserate and none envy their condition under this glorious reign of nullification.

Pass this bill, and you will still fail to settle this question. The act of concession, passed in July, it was then said, would satisfy the South, and harmonize the country. Has this been accomplished? No; it has but multiplied their demands, and aggravated the evil. "Increase of appetite has grown by what it fed on." You gave up one-half, and now they demand the whole. They have nothing to lose, and every thing to gain, by this plan of annual compromise and concession; and as long as we continue to give, they will not cease to ask. Let the friends of protection remember that what is once given up, is gone for ever. "Facilis descensus Avernî, sed revocare gradum hic labor hoc opus est." Some gentlemen, however, indulge the hope that whatever is now surrendered, will be recovered hereafter. This, he feared, was a vain hope. But why pass an act destructive to the best interests of the country, with the hope that those who come after us will repeal it? Will such an excuse as this satisfy our constituents? Will it satisfy our own convictions of public duty? But we are told by others that our successors will do worse; that they will destroy the whole system; that they will entirely repeal the act of 1832. We are therefore called upon to destroy this act, to murder our own offspring, lest it might perish by other hands; to cut our own throats, to prevent others from doing it. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Let us live while we can. If the country must be destroyed, let the sin rest upon other heads. Let us do right, and leave the responsibility of doing wrong to others. He, however, had no such fears. He was willing to trust the next Congress, coming fresh from among the people, and full of their feeling, with this subject. He had no doubt it would be safe in their hands, when the excitement and panic which now prevailed will have passed away. Under existing circumstances, to pass this bill would be to establish the principle that the minority are to rule the majority, and thus subvert the very foundation of our Government. When this doctrine is once sanctioned, the Government is at an end, the Union is repealed, our liberties are gone. To repeal the tariff, in obedience to the commands of South Carolina, while she holds her nullifying ordinance in one hand, and the drawn sword in the other, would go far to establish this pernicious principle. He was, therefore, for this reason alone, if no other existed, opposed to all legislation at this time. If, after resistance to the law has ceased, it is deemed expedient to modify it, be it so; but he was opposed to legislation under threats, or by compulsion. A better opportunity never could occur of putting down, without difficulty, and without bloodshed, resistance to the law. South Carolina not only stands alone in her attempt to nullify, but even her own people are almost equally divided on the question. Serious resistance is, therefore, out of the question. Let this insurrection, then, be put down, and we will be troubled no more with the absurdity of nullification. But establish it as a "peaceable remedy," by yielding to its demands at this time, and hereafter, when it has acquired more strength from victory, enlarged its alliances, and multiplied its friends and followers, it will make an attack which may end in civil war, in revolution, and in the dismemberment and destruction of this happy Government, with all its hopes and all its glorious promises to mankind.

The Tariff.

But, sir, if this precedent is to be now established by yielding to the demands of nullification; if the constitution and laws of this Union are to be cancelled by the South Carolina ordinance; if the legislation of Congress is to be repealed at the pleasure of every State in the Union; if our Government, established at the expense of so much blood and treasure, is thus to be overthrown and destroyed, I, for one, said Mr. S., shall escape the sin and the reproach, by voting against this bill. If, sir, the effect of the adoption of this measure shall be (as he firmly believed it would) to sap the foundations of the national prosperity, destroy millions of capital, and throw thousands of industrious people out of employment; if its effects should be to reduce to the level of the paupers of England the free and now prosperous labor of the country, to grind down alike the wages of the farmer and mechanic, to exhaust our currency, and spread poverty, wretchedness, and ruin, far and wide over this now prosperous and happy land, his constituents, to whom he was so much indebted, should never have it in their power to say to him—"You contributed to bring this ruin upon us." I will redeem myself from this reproach, said Mr. S., by voting against this unjust and injurious measure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND next addressed the House, and put it to all who heard him, whether a bill presented in the manner, and under the circumstances that this had been, ought to pass. It was out of all reason. It was against the course of all legislation. The ink was hardly dry with which a bill had been engrossed, and passed at the last session, settling this very question, and settling it by compromise. Would the House be doing justice to those who had relied upon that act, so soon to overturn what had been so deliberately resolved upon—a law which had commanded the votes of two-thirds of that House, and two-thirds of the Senate? But he was told that the bill must pass, because a spirit of opposition had appeared in South Carolina, and was running through all the Southern country, which nothing could allay but the passage of such a bill. On that subject he must be allowed one word of reply. He asked, where did this whole protecting system come from? With whom did it originate? Where was it born? The system was started in South Carolina. It had originated in the early days of this Government, and it had been sustained in Virginia, by one of the ablest statesmen that ever graced that proud and ancient commonwealth. He meant Thomas Jefferson. Yes, it was Mr. Jefferson, who had given it his most decided sanction. He had appeared in his native State, on our great national anniversary, in 1808, dressed from head to foot in homespun. All the military, horse and foot, had paraded in uniforms of American manufacture. And the reverend clergy were clad in the same. And so entirely was the system approved of, that prayers were offered up on that occasion for its maintenance and perpetuity. This House was asked to repeal the protective system, although the very people who brought the system into being, now declared it to be unconstitutional: and although there had not lived scarce a distinguished man, since the revolution, who had not been, or was not now, the approver and advocate of the American system, and its constitutionality. It had been a member from South Carolina, a Mr. Burke, who had first proposed in that House a protecting duty upon hemp, to enable the people of his State to raise that commodity upon their rice grounds. With this view the duty had been imposed. The same individual had then asked a protecting duty upon indigo, all for the benefit of his State and the South; and this duty had, in like manner, been laid on. But now, South Carolina had discovered that every protecting duty was a flagrant and alarming violation of the constitution.

"We think our fathers fools—so wise we grow;
No doubt our wiser sons will think us so."

At the first session of the first Congress, one of the signers of the constitution had offered an address to George Washington, as being the devoted friend to the whole system, which address had been unanimously adopted, by men who were themselves the fathers of our revolution. Southern gentlemen might rave as they would. The constitutionality of that system stood beyond their power. In a debate which had taken place in the first Congress, as to the duty proper to be laid upon tobacco, the celebrated Roger Sherman, a member from Connecticut, had proposed to lay sixpence a pound on that article, avowedly as a prohibition. This was carrying protection to its extreme; and had a single Southern man so much as whispered an objection? Not one. Why should the law be altered now? Protection was as constitutional at this day as it had been at that day.

In 1808, the whole capital and enterprise of New England had been mainly engaged in commerce. The canvass of New England ships whitened every sea. But Congress, to oblige the South, had passed a law which drove that capital from the ocean, and compelled that enterprise to turn itself into the new channel of manufactures. The whole state of that part of the Union had been revolutionized.

And now, when capital had invested itself in buildings and machinery, which could not be abandoned without ruin, the men of the South came to that House, and insisted on driving the whole of that capital back to the sea again. Where were the pledges to the manufacturers which had been so solemnly given? Or what pledge were they now to receive that the whole legislation of the country would not continue to experience these ruinous fluctuations? Did any gentleman talk to him of a pledge here in this bill? What did it amount to? Every body knew that the protective system had received the most decided support of this Government. Mr. Jefferson himself, in the last message he ever addressed to Congress, had avowed himself to be in favor, not only of protection, but of carrying protection to prohibition. That distinguished man, now quoted with an air of triumph by the nullifiers of the South, had, upon the subject of the tariff, set his face against nullification. He had recommended protection—he had advised prohibition.

Mr. S. said that he had lately examined into what had taken place in 1808, in Richmond, that hot-bed of the principles of '98, and he found old Virginia as steady as the mountains, and all right and sound upon the protective system. He had said that Richmond had exercised great power in this republic under all administrations. It was justly due to her, for much political intelligence was concentrated there. But could gentlemen forget that, under the Jefferson administration, a report, coming from the luminous mind of Albert Gallatin, had proposed that five millions of dollars should be loaned for the express purpose of encouraging and sustaining the manufactures of the country? Yet now, forsooth, the country was told that Mr. Jefferson was the great authority for nullification; and precious Mr. Editor Ritchie, he, too, was quoted in support of the same doctrine; a great, consistent, and most undeviating authority! Among all the rest, the House had heard Governor Giles appealed to. Yes, he, too, was a great advocate of nullification. Now, Mr. S. was so fortunate as to have one of this same gentleman's speeches in his possession, an extract from which he would take the liberty to read, for the edification of the House, and especially of Southern gentlemen. [Here Mr. S. read from the speech.]

And now, he asked, whether, with all the lights to be derived from Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Giles, Mr. Baldwin, and all the Georgia and other Southern statesmen, in behalf of the constitutionality and expediency of the protecting system, it would be fair in this Congress, at one blow, to repeal it. A great system of national policy, like this, affecting so many millions of people, and so many hundred millions of property, was a plant which did not grow up in the night. It had taken a long series of years to plant, to nourish, to train, and to foster it; and now the House was called upon to lay the axe to its root. The House had just heard a very eloquent speech on the dreadful evils of civil war; but he asked whether an act like this was not likely to be followed by as wide-spread a devastation as any war that ever swept over the country. It must drive thousands of men, women, and children from their daily bread, and ruin multitudes whose all was embarked on the faith of the Government. And, what was the worst feature in the whole matter, all this was to be done on the ground of a false theory, from a mistaken and unfounded notion of policy. All this loss and desolation was to be inflicted on the Northern half of the Union, for supporting a system which had originated in the South.

Mr. S. had lately read a speech purporting to have been delivered by Mr. CLAY, in the Senate, at the last session, upon the American system. It dwelt in eloquent and forcible language on the multiplied and widely extended benefits which that system had conferred upon the United States. It spoke of villages and cities grown up, as if by enchantment: of mills and factories, of roads and canals, and a thousand works of improvement in every form. And, after dwelling with enthusiasm on the internal prosperity and growing strength of our country, it attributed the whole, in a very important degree, to the wise policy of protecting our own industry, and making the most of our own resources. Could it be that a bill which went slowly but surely to destroy the system, should have been brought into Congress by that same individual? It struck him with amazement. It would strike the whole country with astonishment. He did not believe there was a single man in his district, who had so much as dreamed of such a thing. A gentleman had said, that by this bill the manufacturers were "cheered" with the prospect of a continued protection for seven years to come. Cheered! The bill gave them the prospect of lingering out a wretched, doomed, dying existence for seven years to come. Was this to cheer them? It was the very worst part of the measure proposed. If South Carolina must be gratified at all hazards, and at all expense, let the wide-spreading tree of protection be felled at once. Let not gentlemen lop a branch here, and a branch there, until limb after limb dropped from the scathed and naked trunk, which was reserved to the melancholy privilege of falling last amidst the surrounding ruins of its former beauty. Let them put the axe at once to its root, and let it fall in all its majesty and strength. He called gentlemen to look at the effect of the twenty per cent. duty, now held out as the ultimate hope of the manufacturing interest. Could not British statesmen and British manufacturers calculate the effects of this bill, as well as our own? Send this law to England, and they would put into the hands of our manufacturing rival a chart to guide his future course. It apprised him beforehand, here we are going to take away so much of our own protection, and there we are going to take away so much more; this year the protection is to be forty per cent., that year it is to be thirty per cent., and when it gets down to twenty per cent. our system of protection is to be wound up entirely. So, now knowing all beforehand, you may govern yourselves accordingly. This, to be sure, was dealing very frankly, and no doubt the manufacturers of Manchester and Sheffield would highly commend so novel a magnanimity. Those gentlemen, as was well known, could borrow as much capital as they pleased at four per cent., and with such an advantage they could ruin us at their leisure. Was this protection? Was it? Would any gentleman say it was? Our whole history proved the reverse. And would gentlemen commit so rash an act? Would they destroy in a single day what it had taken so many years to build up? When the day should arrive that laid this system low, then the gentlemen of the South would have achieved what they had long predicted; then the poor men of the North would all have become slaves. God grant that he might never live to see that day: he trusted it would never come: he trusted that the means of education and of intellectual and moral improvement would never be torn from the millions of our laboring classes, and that that accumulation of light, social, civil, and political, with which this country seemed destined to illumine the rest of the world, would never be quenched, especially by an act of our own Government, by reducing free and laborious citizens of the North to a level with the planters' slaves. The Government would lose their hearts, and with their hearts it would quickly lose also the support of their strong arms. The bill inflicted great injustice on the North, especially when taken in connexion with previous acts of the Government: when the previous promises and pledges to the manufacturers should be placed beside an act like this, every honest and intelligent man would blush for his country. Mr. S. did not mean to charge the honorable Senator who had originated this bill with the design to destroy the American system; he did not believe that such had been his purpose, but he did fully believe the policy was a mistaken one, and that such would be its consequences.

That honorable gentleman did not live surrounded with the men on whom this bill was intended directly to operate; his residence was in a portion of the Union which had little or nothing to do with the tariff; but the inevitable effect of his bill would be to bring down upon the American mechanic the competition of foreign labor. The laboring population of France and England were to be brought to compete with us, a new nation, a young people. Could a population situated as ours were, safely enter into the contest with all the old world? We started in an unfair race; all the capital, all the experience, and all the poor rates of England brought to bear upon a people just emerging from the agricultural state, and covered with no higher protection than twenty per cent.! The South knew well that such a protection would amount to little or nothing, and what must be the result? Could the nation maintain itself in its present condition? Never. We were now a prosperous people. But we are said not to be a happy people. And why? Because, in the South, there was a speck of opposition. He did not mean to treat the State of South Carolina with disrespect, but still it was but a speck. The States of this Union could not be made to believe that her system was true, or her grievances such as she stated them. All men of common sense repudiated her fears. So did Mr. S., and condemned her conduct, but still he was for keeping South Carolina in the Union. He found among her sons too many able, and too many gallant men to be willing to part with them or with her. They were now under a mistake. But for the mistake of one State, must the Government throw up at once all that the other States held dear?

But he was told that this Government had no right to compel the States into obedience. This was to introduce general anarchy. They were all influenced more or less by compulsion. They must be regulated by fixed laws. South Carolina was but one star in the system. She must learn to move in her proper orbit. She must revolve in her own sphere. She must not derange the whole system to suit her will and pleasure. It had been said by some that one star would not be missed in the national constellation. Therefore, let her withdraw. But such gentlemen forgot that Carolina was not the only party concerned. The Government had to deal with more than one State. It was bound to sustain the rights and interests of all portions of the country.

In concluding, he would offer one remark in respect to the whole South. He perceived that it had been asked in Virginia, when the people were about to vote for a new Senator, whether the candidate was opposed to the tariff on constitutional grounds. The question had been asked in Richmond, in the very spot where both the constitution and the protecting system had started. If Jefferson could have heard that question, he would have started from his tomb in amazement, and would have asked, is this the doctrine of Virginia? Have you forgotten the year 1808? After the South had riveted upon the country the protection of every Southern staple, they turned about and insisted that, in relation to all who dwelt north of Mason and Dixon's line, the entire protective system should be destroyed. They had enjoyed a tariff for thirty years for themselves. But the moment its benefits were to be extended across that line, the discovery broke upon them that the tariff was unconstitutional. He trusted that no man would vote for this bill on the ground that the tariff was unconstitutional, who did not mean to fly in the face of the father of democracy, and the author of the Declaration of Independence. If gentlemen, from motives of interest, were determined to destroy the tariff, they could do so. But in the name of all consistency, let them not affect to do it because the tariff was unconstitutional.

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina, now rose, and observed that the House had heard three speeches in opposition to the bill, the denouncing speech of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNES,] the violent speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEWART,] and the vociferous speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SUTHERLAND.] Believing that this was quite enough, he demanded the previous question.

The CHAIR inquired whether the motion was seconded.

When the House refused to second the motion: Yeas 65, nays not counted.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, said that he should vote for this bill, not because it was what he wished, but because it was the best thing that could be procured. The bill proposed to impose a less degree of taxation on the country, so soon as January next. Had this bill been offered to him at the commencement of the session, he should have felt himself bound to reject it. Had himself or any of his friends proposed such a measure to the South at that time, he should have felt that he was offering them an insult. But circumstances had since occurred which showed that now the South was willing to accept the bill as a compromise that would settle the distracted state of the country. Such being the case, he was bound to accept it. He rejoiced to find, that somehow, or somewhere, an arrangement had at length been effected. The fact proved either that the injuries complained of by the South were not so serious as they had been represented to be, or that the South had been governed by a laudable patriotism, which led them to assent to an offer which came short of that which they had a just right to demand. He hoped and believed that it was from the latter. He would now say a word or two on the subject of pledges. The House had been told that, having voted for the bill of 1832, they were pledged to leave the subject of the tariff at rest. But Mr. B., though he had voted for that bill, had not voted for it as the best that was possible: he had voted for it as the best he could then get: but he had not considered himself as bound never to get a better, when it should be in his power. He had never pledged either himself or his constituents. Whether it was or was not, in the opinion of some, implied that the system was to remain untouched for eight or ten years to come, was a matter of mere moonshine to him. He had never pledged himself for a single session ahead. His successors, he knew, would act as he had acted, independently.

It had been charged that this bill was a sacrifice to the slave labor of the South. Mr. B. would vote for the bill from a different motive, and for the benefit of a very different people. He represented a class of people denounced by those who considered all who left the mark laid down by their rulers, as the real slaves of the North, the real "dough faces:" but he could tell all such persons that his constituents were a people who understood their own rights, and would maintain them. Every protective duty was a tax upon them, and they knew it. They knew that they were consumers of articles on which the price was enhanced a hundred times more than on those which they exported; for them he acted. He should not inquire where this measure originated: it was sufficient for him that it promised peace to the country: and he hailed it as the harbinger of halcyon days of national prosperity and happiness.

Mr. PENDLETON, of New York, said he viewed the bill as a compromise. It was an exchange of intermediate protection for ultimate reduction: and those who voted for it voted for it as a whole. There was no reason why gentlemen who voted on one side should be more reflected on than those on the other. Gentlemen who chose to reject the compromise can do so; but those who took it, took it as a whole. They consented to the continuance of protection for a certain course of years, for the sake of ensuring its reduction in the end. In his judgment, this was altogether illusory, because this Congress could not bind its successors; for himself he never would consent to take a measure so entirely uncertain.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that he did not believe that the bill made all the concession to the demands of the South which justice required; much more ought to have been allowed. The South had a right to demand more, much more. But he had nevertheless made up his mind to vote for the bill. He wished to give quiet to the country; he believed this bill would give quiet to the country; and in that view he should give it his vote.

Mr. SPEIGHT now moved the previous question: but great objection being manifested in all parts of the House, he withdrew the motion.

Mr. HUNTINGTON demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, said he had no inclination to go into a discussion of the bill, but he wished to state the grounds upon which he should vote against its passage, that he might stand fairly before his constituents, and before the country, upon this deeply interesting subject. He did not share in the apprehension expressed, that the South would not abide by the provisions of the bill. He had no fear on that score, for the bill is an abandonment—gentlemen may say what they will to the contrary—the bill is an abandonment of the protective principle, progressively and slowly, but certainly and fatally. Nor had he any disposition to join in the denunciations, although he shared largely in the regrets of the occasion. Had the cup which the friends of the tariff are called upon to take been mingled by other hands, he could have borne it; but, presented and forced upon them as this has been, it becomes as unpleasant and ungrateful as unexpected.

He would state, that he might be distinctly understood, that the advocates of the protective system admit—

1st. That the revenues of the Government ought to be no more than the wants of the Government; that they do not ask, by way of protection, for a dollar beyond this. But,

2d. They maintain that, so far as the revenue is derived from impost, it ought to be from duties imposed for protection. And,

3d. That, in the apportionment and assessment of duties, reference ought to be had to the condition and wants of the interests to be protected. Acting upon these principles, he said, there would be ample means of protection for all needed purposes; but, in his opinion, the bill under consideration was in utter disregard of every one of them.

So far as derivable from duties on protected articles, this bill will augment the revenue, and thus will diminish protection, while it will increase the demands upon the people.

The duties upon protected articles, it will be observed, are to be progressively reduced to twenty per cent. in 1842, and afterwards at pleasure; but, in no event, peace or war, is the progress of reduction to be stayed; and in no event, after 1842, is the rate of duty to exceed twenty per cent. The bill contains a formal enactment, and gives an express pledge to this effect. And both before and after 1842, in case of a deficiency or excess of revenue, recourse is to be had to such unprotected articles as are not made free by the bill. This he considered an abandonment of the great protective principle. It is an express agreement that the duties for protection shall not exceed twenty per cent., and that duties for the mere purposes of revenue may be imposed upon unprotected articles when they are needed for protection. It is, therefore, not only an abandonment of the principle, but a limitation upon the power. The duties upon the unprotected may transcend the duties upon the protected articles themselves.

But how, he inquired, does this bill propose to reduce the duties? It changes all the specific into ad valorem duties after 1842. In the mean time it reduces them equally, without any regard to the magnitude or wants of the different interests, their importance in war or peace, their character as connected with agriculture or commerce, with necessities or luxuries, with the capabilities or exigencies of the country; it reduces them all as a gardener trims a hedge, cutting every thing to the same level, without reference to any thing but uniformity. Whatever may be the legislation of foreign Governments, whatever the competition and power brought to bear upon a given department of industry, this bill fixes its position and condition immovably, and leaves it at the mercy of those who may choose to assail it, and in any way they choose.

And wherefore all this? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LETCHER] tells us that if Congress does not pass this bill now, the next Congress will do something worse; and before 1842 the South will think better of this matter. It is a sufficient answer to say that, if the people will the destruction of the system, this bill cannot preserve it; and if they do not, neither the next Congress nor any other Congress can destroy it, and a change of principles and feelings in the South is too remote and uncertain a contingency to justify the sacrifice that this bill makes. Mr. B. said that he would detain the House no longer. The victim is bound, and he would not delay the sacrifice. But he could have wished the offering had been made by other hands.

Mr. WILLIAMS now moved the previous question, and the House sustained the motion: Yeas 93, nays 65.

The previous question was put, and carried: Yeas 109, nays 85.

The main question was about to be put; when

Mr. ADAMS said that, before he voted, he wanted to know the meaning of one of the clauses in the first section of the bill.

It being out of order to debate after the previous question had been carried, Mr. A. resumed his seat.

The main question, viz. "Shall the bill pass?" was then put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. WILLIAMS now moved to postpone all the orders of the day, both general and special, which precede the Senate's bill for the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands. He, however, consented to withdraw this general motion, and allow the orders to be called separately.

They were so called; and when the House had reached the bill for allowing the heirs of Winter to sue the United States to try their title,

Mr. PLUMMER made an effort to induce the House to discuss that bill, but the House refused; and, on motion of Mr. IRVIN, it was laid upon the table.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The House having at length arrived at the bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports,

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to postpone this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. IRVIN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion. They were taken, and stood as follows: Yeas 81, nays 105.

So the House refused to postpone the bill.

Mr. DANIEL now moved to lay the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion. They were ordered by the House. He, however, consented to withdraw the motion at the request of Mr. ARNOLD, who promised to renew the same motion.

Mr. ARNOLD then said he should change his course in relation to this bill, in consequence of the House having passed the bill reducing the tariff. Mr. A. was going into some remarks on the mockery of passing such a bill now, when he was called to order by the CHAIR. After trying several motions, with the view of having it in order to proceed in his remarks, Mr. A. relinquished his design, and, according to promise, moved to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded on this motion, and, being taken, they stood as follows: Yeas 58, nays 132.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MARDIS moved that the House now take a recess until 6 o'clock, and demanded the yeas and nays, but withdrew his motion; when

Mr. DEARBORN moved the previous question on the bill.

The CHAIR was ascertaining whether the motion was seconded; when

Mr. McDUFFIE rose, and asked leave to address an appeal to the House.

The SPEAKER was proceeding in the count; when

Mr. McDUFFIE insisted on being heard.

Great confusion arose; but amidst the cries of "order" and "count," Mr. McD.'s voice was heard, saying that all he asked was fair discussion. If gentlemen were disposed to hear the opponents of the bill, he was ready to meet them; but if not, and if he could get forty men to stand by him, he would continue to move adjournments, and call for yeas and nays, until the end of the session.

Mr. CARSON exclaimed, "I will support you, sir." Several other voices cried out in a similar manner.

The SPEAKER called to order.

Mr. BELL rose, and began to speak, but his words were inaudible, from the noise.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved repeatedly to adjourn.

The SPEAKER called him to order, and admonished him that a member was on the floor.

As soon as the reporter could hear any thing distinctly,

Mr. BELL was saying that he had no wish to cut off discussion, if that was what the opponents of the bill desired; and if they were ready to discuss its merits, and not to put it by, he should not sustain the motion for the previous question.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved that the House adjourn.

The CHAIR decided the motion to be out of order, the House having previously resolved that it would, at a certain hour, take a recess, and meet at 6 o'clock.

Mr. WAYNE believed the bill to be right in itself, but yet circumstances might be such as to induce those who thought so to vote against it.

Mr. W. said he should vote for the bill; but if his friends, by cutting off debate, should refuse to him and others the opportunity of expressing their sentiments, and vindicating their own course before the people, he should vote against it, and there were twenty more that would do the same.

Mr. BELL made some remark not heard by the reporter, which led to an explanation between him and Mr. WAYNE, who concluded by moving a recess until 6 o'clock.

A desultory debate on the question of order now arose on an appeal taken by Mr. CARSON on the Speaker's decision that a motion to adjourn was out of order, which ended in Mr. C.'s withdrawing his appeal.

Mr. DEARBORN explained his reasons for having moved the previous question, which was not to prevent fair discussion, but to prevent a circumventive course, calculated to get rid of or defeat the bill.

Mr. DANIEL and Mr. DEARBORN had some further rather colloquial discussion; when, the hour of 4 having arrived,

The House (according to a previous order) took a recess till 6 o'clock.

DISTRICT AFFAIRS.

At the close of the recess the House met, and went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TAYLOR in the chair, and took up, according to order, various bills relating to the city of Washington and the District of Columbia.

The committee took up, among others, the bill in addition to an act vesting in the corporation of Washington all the rights of the Washington Canal Company: [To take back the mall lots, and allow, in lieu thereof, to the city one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.]

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved to amend this bill by striking out the section which authorizes the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to enclose the mall, and lay it down in grass.

Mr. M. supported his motion by adverting to the usefulness of the ground as an open common to the poor of the city: this he thought much more important than for purposes of mere recreation.

Mr. JARVIS, of Maine, opposed the motion. The ground had been originally intended for walks, and open ornamental grounds, and not for building lots. If it was fenced, and laid out in shrubbery, it would be kept to its original destination.

Mr. WARDWELL, of New York, supported the amendment, arguing that the ground might as well be retained without enclosure as with it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

District Affairs.

[H. or R.]

The bill was then laid aside, and the committee took up A bill concerning a penitentiary for the District.

Mr. CONNOR inquired into the number of convicts now in the building.

Mr. WASHINGTON replied, and explained.

Mr. WHITTLESEY asked respecting the appropriation of one thousand dollars for Mr. Carbery's services in planning and superintending the building.

Mr. WASHINGTON replied, and stated his services; he had voluntarily superintended the work for eighteen months, and had disbursed thirty to forty thousand dollars.

Mr. WHITTLESEY supposed that this had been the duty of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings.

Mr. WASHINGTON and Mr. SEMMES explained.

Mr. WASHINGTON moved an additional section allowing the inspectors, during the years 1829 and 1830, the same compensation as to the present inspectors.

Mr. CONNOR opposed the amendment, and asked for information.

Mr. WASHINGTON explained.

Mr. CONNOR moved to strike out the item of allowance to Mr. Carbery.

The motion was negatived, as was also the amendment respecting inspectors.

The committee next took up a bill in relation to the Potomac bridge.

Mr. CONNOR made some inquiries respecting the bill, which were replied to by Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. CARSON wished to know how much the President had recommended to be appropriated. So far he was willing to go.

His inquiry having been answered, he withdrew his objection.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he did not wish to carve out of this appropriation any good fat salary for some man who wished to live at the public expense; he therefore moved an amendment placing the erection of the bridge under the care of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, and allow him five hundred dollars in addition to his present salary.

Mr. JARVIS opposed the amendment, and referred to the management of the Commissioner in relation to bringing in of water to the Capitol, as a presumptive proof of his incompetency.

Mr. WICKLIFFE explained, and supported the amendment, and referred to a salary allowed to somebody for superintending the placing of plank on the old bridge.

Mr. BURD inquired if the Commissioner was a practical mechanic, and had skill in such work.

Mr. WICKLIFFE replied, and referred to what he had done.

Mr. CONNOR opposed the allowance of $500, and moved to strike it out.

This was negatived, and the amendment agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside.

The next bill taken up was a bill for the benefit of Washington City, (granting a loan of $250,000, to pay up subscriptions to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.)

Mr. MARDIS moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. SEMMES appealed to Mr. MARDIS to withdraw his motion. He explained the ample nature of the security, and referred to similar loans granted by States in aid of works of internal improvement.

Mr. MARDIS refused.

Mr. CRAIG thought the constitution did not empower Congress to loan money.

Mr. WASHINGTON went into an explanation of the difficulties and embarrassments of the city. He adverted to the strong claims the city had upon Congress, and mentioned the large sums expended by the corporation in the improvement of spacious streets and avenues: as a resource, they had but waste lots to assess. He referred to the freedom of the Government property from taxation, and reminded the House that the taxes, if exacted from the settlement of the city, would have amounted to more than a million of dollars. The Government had, in the meanwhile, received eight hundred thousand dollars for the sale of lots given to it.

Mr. W. also reminded the House that, in the thirty years it had been located in the city, it had expended but 186,000 dollars; the greater part for jails and penitentiaries. As to the appropriation for the bridge, it was not to be charged to the city as a donation, having been granted for the accommodation of the mail; and the improvement of the avenue had been mainly for the accommodation of the departments and Congress. The only donation to the city had been a number of lots, which had originally cost the Government 3,000 dollars, and no more. The Government property in the city was now valued at 1,970,000 dollars, exclusive of buildings. All nations had some objects of national pride: the Englishman, the Frenchman, boasted of their respective capitals, and the beautiful erections which adorned them. But with us there was little for this to rest on. Mr. W. concluded an eloquent speech, by adverting to the great importance of the loan to the prosperity of the city.

Mr. WHITTLESEY opposed the motion to strike out the enacting clause. He regretted it had come from a citizen of one of the new States, all of whom had experienced much of the liberality of the Government. He adverted to the embarrassed state of the public funds; the liberal expenditures of the citizens; their heavy burdens, and the reasonable nature of the request of the corporation. It was but a loan, and at 5 per cent. interest—a rate that the miser was content with. The Western country had once been indebted to the amount of millions to the Government, from which the legislation of Government had relieved them. There was not a session for years back, that the House had not granted more to Alabama than was now asked as a loan. If the District lay at the extremity of the Union, instead of doubting about the constitutionality of a loan, there would be no hesitation in granting a donation.

Mr. CRAIG went into a constitutional argument to show that Congress had no power to lend money.

Mr. WHITTLESEY replied, and adverted to the loans granted by Congress to the banks of the District, and he believed in some of the Eastern cities also. If it was unconstitutional to loan, let him make a donation; this would relieve the gentleman. Or he might give up the interest. Large grants had been made for the education of young men, in which Virginia had largely participated. If gentlemen would amend the bill so as to make a donation of the money, Mr. W. would go for it.

Mr. DEARBORN said the Government had loaned millions to the Bank of the United States, since that institution had been incorporated. If a surplus was in the treasury, must it lay there unproductive, on a constitutional scruple?

Mr. JARVIS moved an amendment, to get rid of the constitutional difficulty, by granting, instead of loaning. He wished the House not to be beguiled or deceived. Not a dollar of the money would ever be seen again; nor did he wish it. He would not vote it as a loan, but would as a donation.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said it was very ungracious to oppose such measures as this; but he wished to know what had been done with the million of dollars secured by Government on the subscription of the city.

Mr. WASHINGTON said the gentleman was mistaken: the Government was not responsible for that money, nor for the interest on it.

District Affairs.

[FEB. 26, 1853.]

Mr. MASON resumed, and observed, that if the stock in the Canal Company was worth any thing, it ought to be transferred to the Government. But he hoped the bill would either be rejected or modified.

Mr. MARDIS replied to Mr. WHITTLESEY, and called on him to show how Alabama had received such large donations from the Government.

Mr. WHITTLESEY replied, and recalled his recollection to debts forgiven to Alabama to the amount of more than a million of dollars. He did not complain of this policy, or suppose it disgraceful to Alabama. Besides the remission of debt, large landed donations had been made to her; and something was due to the District, as well as to the new States and Territories.

Mr. MARDIS acknowledged the correctness of these sentiments, but said, if Government had not pursued this policy, it would have lost most of the money. As to the donation for the Muscle shoals, Alabama has less interest in it than any of her neighboring States. He protested against the bill, as an extravagant and obnoxious measure, and asked the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. BARBOUR complained of the distrust and jealousy which always existed when any beneficial object was proposed for the prosperity of this District. He replied to Mr. CRAIG's constitutional argument, by advertising to the constant practice of Government in charging interest, and imposing taxes for use of money in the hands of defaulters. He dwelt upon the absolute and despotic power of Congress over the District, and argued on the unlimited power of Congress to benefit it. He put the question to the House, as copartners with the District in canal property, whether they would let all that had been done in that work perish, by refusing aid at this crisis of the District affairs.

Mr. CAMBRELENG viewed this bill as substantially being a measure to aid the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. The security offered amounted in effect to nothing. He protested against appropriation after appropriation for a District, on which Congress had lavished more than on any other portion of the Union. He rendered many thanks to Mr. MARDIS for his motion.

Mr. MERCER replied to Mr. CAMBRELENG, and denied that the bill had more connexion with the promotion of the canal, than the direction in the bill that the city should pay the money for its stock. It did not add one dollar to the stock of the company.

He explained the nature of the security to the Dutch lenders to the company. The real object of the bill was a loan, not to the company, but to the city.

Mr. M. answered Mr. CRAIG's constitutional argument, and insisted that Congress had all the power in respect to the District, which a State Legislature has to the State; and all the Legislatures had made loans to their own citizens. He said he should not vote on the bill, as he held one share (and no more) in the company. He denied that the Government had done more, or as much as it had for other parts of the Union. The great buildings it had erected were all for public purposes—not for the benefit of the District at all: and except these, what had been done, save the paving of the avenue? As to Alabama's interest in the improvement at the Muscle shoals, it was at least as great as that of the District in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thought what Mr. MERCER had stated was the best reason for rejecting the bill. The gentleman had exhibited an insolvent corporation, asking a loan to help them to pay up their subscription, while all their property was mortgaged to the Holland lenders. He would not do indirectly what he would not do directly. He protested against the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that, during all his experience, he never had known so wanton and reckless a proposition as was now submitted—after the corporation had borrowed a million, to ask to lend one hundred and twenty-five thousand more. It was not a loan, but a gift. He trusted the House would not be guilty of such wanton waste.

Mr. CARSON said the proposition was wholly new to him; he was not prepared on the constitutional question. If the Government had a great surplus, it was better to loan at 5 per cent. on good security, than make a donation to the same amount. If there was to be a great amount in the treasury, he would rather loan it than have a scramble for it. The question then was whether the city had the capacity to pay back the money, or to return the interest. He did not admit that the city was insolvent, and would regret that the Dutch lenders should think so. A man might not be able to pay his debts to-day, and yet not be insolvent—but, with time, would pay his debts with interest. Mr. C. would rather never receive back the money, than see the city crushed. He was opposed to dividing the surplus revenue among the States, but would rather loan it at 5 per cent. He should, therefore, vote for the bill, reserving himself on the constitutional question.

Mr. THOMAS, of Louisiana, said he was a father, and asked how he should treat his children in distress? Every father would lend them a helping hand. Had the District any representative on that floor? Yes; in every man there. If, when his children asked for bread, he gave them a stone, he should be a poor father. The people of the District had nowhere else to look. Though they might be in difficulty, they were not insolvent. They had property to the amount of eight millions. Congress only wanted the will, they had the power to aid the District. Good security was offered; and let Congress supply their wants. Yea, more—if they needed it as a donation, he felt his heart say, "take it."

The question was then taken, and Mr. MARDIS's amendment was negatived: Yeas 39, nays 74.

Mr. JARVIS moved to amend the bill, so as to change the loan into a donation. The amendment was agreed to: Yeas 71.

Mr. HOWARD referred to a memorial from the Baltimore Railroad Company, and offered an amendment. He regretted that the memorial had excited so much feeling, that a public meeting had been held on the subject. One of the reasons stated by the corporation of Washington, charged the Railroad Company with censurable conduct, and the memorial only repelled this attack. Mr. H. went into a brief retrospect of the history of the contest between the Canal and Railroad Companies; with a view of exculpating the latter from the blame which had been cast upon it. Mr. H. said the amendment he was about to offer was the very thing asked by the meeting held in the city a short time since.

He then offered his amendment, directing, in substance, the President to appoint three impartial persons to investigate the conduct of the two companies, say whose conduct had been the most fair and liberal, and to pronounce what ought to be performed by either or both (the Canal and Railroad Companies) on principles of law, justice, equity, and a true regard to the public good.

The amendment was rejected without a count.

The committee then rose, and reported the bills to the House, and they were ordered to their third reading, with the exception of the loan bill. The question being on concurring with the amendments proposed to this bill by Mr. JARVIS, changing the loan into a donation, the yeas were 66, the nays 20—no quorum having voted. An adjournment was moved, but negatived.

Mr. WASHINGTON then demanded the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence. They were taken accordingly, and stood as follows: Yeas 68, nays 27.

There being no quorum present,

The House adjourned at 10 o'clock.

Report on the Tariff.—Revenue Collection Bill.

[H. OF R.]

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

REPORT ON THE TARIFF.

Mr. ADAMS moved to discharge the Committee on Manufactures from the consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to the protection of domestic manufactures, and from all other matters referred to them; and asked leave to present a report from the minority of the committee on the matters in the message.

At the suggestion of Mr. HOFFMAN, the motion was divided, and the question first taken on discharging the committee, and agreed to.

Mr. HOFFMAN then said that if leave should be given to present the report of the minority, he would ask for its reading, at least in part.

The report was then presented, [see Appendix,] and the reading of it commenced, and continued until 12 o'clock, when the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate's bill further to provide for the collection of the revenue (the enforcing bill) coming up in order,

Mr. VERPLANCK moved that the consideration of that bill be postponed until the next day, in order that the House should take up the appropriation bills, several of which remained to be acted upon.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed that there seemed to exist a disposition in the House to pass this bill; but he put it to gentlemen whether it was right and fair to postpone the consideration of it so far that those who might be opposed to its passage should have only time enough left them to say no, but not to state the reasons for their vote. The House was bound to allow at least time enough for a fair discussion of the bill. If they preferred acting on it now to taking up the appropriation bills, they would vote accordingly.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the House would take up the appropriation bills; but as there would be probably no need of any debate on the items of these bills, there would be no need of postponing the other. This was the last day of the session on which bills could be discussed. The appropriation bills would have to be read a third time to-morrow—to postpone would be to destroy them.

Mr. BELL trusted the House was not going to occupy another day in determining whether it would take up the bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] must know that it was in the power of the House to suspend the rule which forbade bills being sent from one House to the other in the three last days of the session; and if the bills referred to were of so much importance as gentlemen represented them to be, no doubt the rule would be suspended. He trusted that the House, after having already occupied two days in getting at the bill, would now, when its opponents were prepared to present their views, take it up and act upon it. He trusted other measures would not be suffered to intrude, and push it on one side. It was due to the country, it was due to the friends and to the opponents of the bill, that it should be disposed of.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said that though he had, on a former day, voted to bring up this bill, he was unwilling to do so now. If the House once entered into the debate, it would do nothing else all day, and the appropriation bills must be set aside. The gentleman from Tennessee had observed that the House could suspend the rule about sending bills to the other House; but did not the gentleman remember that this was a joint rule of the two Houses; and that, unless the Senate concurred, it could not be dispensed with? Mr. S. was opposed to taking up any Senate bills at this moment: it would peril the appropriation bills—without which the Government could not proceed.

In reply to an inquiry of Mr. HOWARD, The CHAIR stated that it would not require a vote of two-thirds to suspend the rule: a majority would be sufficient, provided the Senate should concur.

Mr. WICKLIFFE asked whether it was now in his power to demand of the Chair whether the bill did not require to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative. The Chair should give no opinion upon that question.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that the reason given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SUTHERLAND] for changing his course in respect to taking up the bill, was the reason which induced Mr. W. to do the same. It was sometimes well understood in that House, that certain things were to be done when they were not spoken aloud upon the floor; and it might be that a calculation existed somewhere, that, unless this bill should be passed in the House, the other bill lately returned to the Senate, and intended to effect a compromise of the tariff question, would not be passed by that body. Might not some gentlemen be actuated by such an idea? Now it was a calculation of this kind which satisfied him that the House ought at once to take up the bill and act upon it. Let the opponents of the bill argue the question while there was time to argue it. Mr. W., for one, had no idea of having the previous question sprung upon the House at midnight on Saturday.

Mr. DEARBORN inquired whether Sunday was not to be included as one of the three last days of the session, referred to in the rule.

Mr. ADAMS quoted the journal of the House to show that it had been so considered, and that, on some occasions, the House had done business upon that day.

Mr. DEARBORN then said that the House still had Friday, Saturday, and Sunday before it.

Mr. VERPLANCK said it was very true that, if the consent of both Houses could be obtained, the rule might be suspended. But there were a number of highly important bills from his own committee still waiting the action of the House, and in which great difference of opinion existed. Among these were the Indian appropriation bill, and the bill respecting the Cumberland road. All Mr. V. desired was, to do his duty, and not to suffer these bills to perish in his hands; and he appealed to all who had the passage of these bills at heart to aid him. The bill now pressed was a Senate bill, and might be considered on the last days of the session; but the others must be acted on now, or not at all.

Mr. WAYNE inquired whether the object of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VERPLANCK] would not be as well accomplished, if the House should consider the appropriation bills in the evening, after a recess.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped this proposal would be acceded to.

Mr. DANIEL said he never would give his consent again to take up appropriation bills at a night session: for as surely as the House did so, they were sure to give every thing that might be asked of them. He was opposed to having a recess. He was pledged to meet this force bill fairly and openly, and he should do it. If gentlemen chose to take a dictator, let them do it.

Mr. HOFFMAN hoped the bill would not be postponed. Its opponents were ready and anxious to be heard. It would be better to put off the appropriation bills until to-morrow, than to have the debate on this bill deferred to the end of the session. He was desirous of hearing their arguments; and he trusted the time would not be taken up in side-way motions, productive only of delay.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he should vote for the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] but he had one or two words to present to the House. The bill passed yesterday, and now before the Senate, had been professedly designed as a bill of conciliation;

H. of R.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[Feb. 27, 1833.]

it had been held out as the olive branch of peace; as such it had been received. The South had taken it as a compromise. They had accepted it as the olive branch of peace. Now, he put it to the justice of the House—to the magnanimity of the House—whether it was becoming to send this olive branch fettered by an alternative of the sword of blood. Whatever might have been the views of gentlemen heretofore; whatever notions they might have entertained of the rights of the General or the State Government in this conflict, there could be no necessity now for passing such a bill as this. He would add, that if any thing could convert that which had been sent out as a blessing into a curse; if any thing could change an act of conciliation into an act of insult and of provocation, it would be the passage of such a bill as this. Let the House stand still where they were—let this bill be postponed indefinitely, or laid upon the table, and he was confident the previous measure would have a healing efficacy on the Southern part of the Union; but should this bill, or any thing like this bill, pass, Mr. McD. would not be responsible for the consequences. He trusted the House would take measures to postpone the bill finally and forever. If the House were prepared to act upon these principles, he hoped they would accord to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANPLAUX] what he had asked, and that the bill would not be taken up at all. But if the bill was to be taken up and passed, it was indifferent to him when.
